

12827

THE INDEX:

—A—

WEEKLY PAPER,

DEVOTED TO

FREE RELIGION.

VOLUME III.

TOLEDO, OHIO:

INDEX ASSOCIATION, 142 ST. CLAIR STREET,

1872.

BL

2700

I 38

v. 3

TABLE OF CONTENTS.

HORTICULTURAL HALL LECTURES.
Three Short Studies of Christianity, O. B. F.	17
Religion as a Sentiment, John Wesley	25
The Transformation of Piety, Samuel Longfellow	33
Social Ideal, David A. Wasson	41
Political Economy a Necessary Study for the Most Perfect Realization of Moral Welfare, Edward Atkinson	49
The God of Science, F. E. Abbot	57
The Religious Idea in History, M. J. L. Lattin	65
Interpretation of Nature, Samuel Johnson	73
The Character of Buddha, Thomas W. Higginson	81
The Positive Contents of Rationalism in Religion, William J. Potter	97
Sex, C. A. Bartol	105

ESSAYS AND OTHER LEADING ARTICLES.

The Proposed Christian Amendment to the United States Constitution, F. E. Abbot	1
The Demands of the Heart, O. B. Frothingham	9
What Think Ye of Christ? I, Charles Voysey	28
What Think Ye of Christ? II, Charles Voysey	39
The Doctrine of Jesus Concerning God, Charles Voysey	59
The Development Theory, F. E. Abbot	113
Character and Work of Jesus, Charles Voysey	121
The Death of Professor F. D. Maurice, M. D. Conway	129
Romanism a Corruption of Christianity, F. W. Newman	137
Romanism the Natural Development of Christianity, F. E. Abbot	145
The Teachings of Christ, Charles Voysey	153
Organization, Francis E. Abbot	161
Brotherly Love, O. B. Frothingham	169
Jesus as a Teacher of Morals, Charles Voysey	177
Science and Spirit, John Tyndall	185
On Truth and Historical Truthfulness, F. W. Newman	193
Radicalism and Conservatism, Francis E. Abbot	201
Jesus and the Patriarchal Life, Charles Voysey	209
A Plea for Materialism, B. F. Underwood	217
Positivism in Theology, Francis E. Abbot	225
Positivism in Theology (concluded), Francis E. Abbot	233
Romanism and Primitive Christianity, F. W. Newman	241
A Remarkable Discourse, by Alex. J. Ellis	249
Self-Made Men and Society-Made Men, Parker Pillsbury	257
Pagan and Christian Idolatry, F. E. Abbot	265
The Religion of Custom, Charles Voysey	273
The Religion of the Heart, T. W. Higginson	281
On the Vision of Heaven, Francis W. Newman	289
Theology Considered as a Science, E. H. Hall	297
Theology Considered as a Science (concluded), E. H. Hall	305
The Seen and the Unseen, A. W. Stevens	313
The Ascent of Man, Francis E. Abbot	321
On Pain and Moral Evil, I, Charles Voysey	329
On Pain and Moral Evil, II, Charles Voysey	337
The Most Important Belief, A. W. Stevens	345
On Pain and Moral Evil, III, Charles Voysey	353
A Chapter of Accidents in Comparative Theology, Max Müller	361
On Pain and Moral Evil, IV, Charles Voysey	369
The Pearl of Great Price, F. E. Abbot	377
The Doctrine of Hell, W. J. Potter	385
Is Prayer a Power or a Cry of Weakness? F. W. Newman	393
The Last Word, D. H. Clark	401
Robust and Sentimental Goodness, A. W. Stevens	409
Job's Ladder, Francis E. Abbot	417

EDITORIALS.

The Impeachment of Christianity, Francis E. Abbot	4
Act Promptly	5
Our Outlook, T. W. H.	6
Our Responsibility, O. B. F.	7
The Attitude of Free Religion, E. D. C.	8
The Boston Lectures	9
Mr. Beecher's Theory of Preaching	10
Names Wanted	11
Prof. Francis W. Newman	12
Rev. Moncure D. Conway	13
The Vagueness of Free Religion	14
Religion at the South, E. D. C.	15
Superstition and Faith, W. J. P.	16
The Bound Index	17
Sign the Petition	18
Prof. John Tyndall	19
The Christian Conspiracy	20
A Puzzle, O. B. F.	21
For What End? W. J. P.	22
No Deceit	23
Spiritualism and Reason, W. J. P.	24
Drifting, W. H. S.	25
London Topics, Charles Voysey	26
An Hour with James Martineau, M. D. Conway	27
Names Wanted	28
Names Wanted	29
The Duty of the Hour	30
Extra Christian or Anti-Christian, T. W. H.	31
Mrs. Woodhull's Ideas, R. P. H.	32
The Cincinnati Convention	33
The Protest Spreading	34
The Jewel Consistency, W. J. P.	35
Words and Wordsiness, O. B. F.	36
How the Seed	37
Wanted—A Million Names	38
Unlabeled and Penultimate Christianity	39
More Petitions	40
More Petitions	41
Is It Fair? O. B. F.	42
Grounds of Faith in Democracy, R. P. H.	43
Spiritualism and Science in England, M. D. Conway	44
Orthodoxy the True Christianity	45
For Christ's Sake, R. P. H.	46
The Higher Law, R. P. H.	47
False Tendency, E. D. C.	48
London Topics, Charles Voysey	49
More Petitions	50
More Petitions	51
Christianity and Freedom	52
Home or Reason—Which? W. J. P.	53
Education and Religion, E. D. C.	54
Mrs. Woodhull's Letter	55
More Petitions	56
Secular in Consolation, W. J. P.	57
The Logic of Christianity	58
More Petitions	59
No science without intuition, Francis W. Newman	60
Christianity Again, O. B. F.	61
Judicial Swearing, R. D. C.	62

A New Plan	63
More Petitions	64
Morals and Law, R. P. H.	65
An English View of the Situation, Charles Voysey	66
Religious Parliamentarism, E. D. C.	67
To Be, or Not To Be, W. H. S.	68
Tricks Exposed	69
The Use of It	70
Beecher at his Best, T. W. H.	71
More Petitions	72
Democracy Unimpaired, R. P. H.	73
The Demands of Liberalism	74
Scientism, O. B. F.	75
Taking One's Own Medicine, W. J. P.	76
Acrophorus Reform	77
Mr. Butte's Plan	78
The Index in England	79
More Petitions	80
Fair Play for the Rajah, T. W. H.	81
A Carnival of Superstition, M. D. C.	82
Dogmatism, O. B. F.	83
One Thing and Another, E. D. C.	84
Argument and Denunciation	85
More Petitions	86
A New Definition, O. B. F.	87
Home Missionary Work, E. D. C.	88
The Materialist's Grave	89
For or Against, E. D. C.	90
Voysey Establishment Fund	91
Boasts of Two Kinds	92
More Petitions	93
No Fault of Ours, T. W. H.	94
Good Friday Reflections, Charles Voysey	95
Church and State, R. P. H.	96
The Scope of the Free Religions Movement	97
More Petitions	98
P. R. A. Anniversary, W. J. P.	99
A Last Refuge, O. B. F.	100
Faith Among Religions, E. D. C.	101
The Miracles of English Labor, M. D. C.	102
George Jacob Holyoake	103
The Result of the Experiment	104
More Petitions	105
The Annual Convention, W. J. P.	106
What's in a Name? W. H. S.	107
Two Crises	108
Lucifer, O. B. F.	109
Authority in Religion and Science, W. J. P.	110
For a King's Blow	111
More Petitions	112
Sleeping on Guard	113
For and Against	114
More Petitions	115
Parishan Falsity, W. J. P.	116
Loose Foundations, O. B. F.	117
The Scope of the Free Religions Movement	118
The Battle over the Athanasian Creed in England, Charles Voysey	119
Freedom before Fraternity	120
The Immoralities of Christianity, Francis W. Newman	121
On What Basis? W. J. P.	122
Fair Play All Round	123
The Prospect and Future of the Index	124
More Petitions	125
Bible, O. B. F.	126
Slit Down, W. H. S.	127
The Radical	128
List of Officers of the Christian Amendment Association	129
Spiritualism and Science	130
The Index in England	131
The Danger of It	132
More Petitions	133
Annual Meeting of the Free Religious Association, W. J. P.	134
An Hour at the Royal Institution, M. D. Conway	135
The Bible and the Bible	136
Making their Forces	137
More Petitions	138
Liberal Thinkers and Secular Institutions, E. D. C.	139
Religion and Morality, I, W. J. P.	140
Thou Shalt not Steal	141
Escaped Prisoners	142
English Unitarianism, Charles Voysey	143
Joseph Mazzini, R. P. H.	144
Religion and Morality, II, W. J. P.	145
Liberalism—Spurious and Real	146
More Petitions	147
A Sign of the Times, W. J. P.	148
Religion and Morality, III, W. J. P.	149
Notes from the Field, P. P.	150
Distant Matterings	151
A Strange Objection, O. B. F.	152
The Name and the Thing, W. H. S.	153
Exploring Palestine and Exploring London, M. D. C.	154
Notes from the Field, P. P.	155
Stories for Bread	156
A Word on Sunday Schools	157
Heaven and Christ, O. B. F.	158
Modern Quakerism, W. J. P.	159
The Bound Case, Charles Voysey	160
Notes from the Field, P. P.	161
A Voluntary Offer	162
Sitting on Two Stools	163
More Petitions	164
Can't, O. B. F.	165
A Theological Mirror, W. J. P.	166
Notes from the Field, P. P.	167
Emancipate Sunday	168
A Dilemma, O. B. F.	169
Free Religion in France, W. H. S.	170
The Love of Liberty and the Love of Truth	171
Recreation, W. J. P.	172
Free Religion and Positivism, O. B. F.	173
Notes from the Field, P. P.	174
The Study of Fashion, O. B. F.	175
Spunk Out, W. H. S.	176
Notes from the Field, P. P.	177
Freedom in Theological Sunday, W. J. P.	178
A Witness, O. B. F.	179
Modern Scriptures, Charles Voysey	180
The True Question	181
Chronicle Monks, T. W. H.	182
Great Man Theory of History, W. H. S.	183
Parker Pillsbury Still for the West, Parker Pillsbury	184

Is Protestantism Christian?	185
Substance and Shadow, O. B. F.	186
What Radicals Need, W. H. S.	187
Notes from the Field, P. P.	188
The Growth of a Slander	189
Throwing Morality Overboard	190
Charity as a Bond of Peace, O. B. F.	191
Scientific Theology, W. J. P.	192
Notes from the Field, P. P.	193
The Cost of an Idea	194
Praying at a Mark, T. W. H.	195
Scientific Theology Again, W. J. P.	196
The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Heavens in London, M. D. C.	197
Enlargement of the Index	198
Mr. A. W. S. even	199
Necessary Truths, O. B. F.	200
Radicalism in England, T. W. H.	201
The Suicide of the Church, Charles Voysey	202
Christianity and Freedom	203
Signs of Decadence, O. B. F.	204
The Williams' Fund, W. J. P.	205
A Dilemma	206
Wanted—A National Temple to God and Christ	207
The Mask Torn Off	208
Sympathy of Religions, W. J. P.	209
Prayer and Science, E. D. C.	210
Notes from the Field, P. P.	211
Testing Prayer, T. W. H.	212
None to Speak of, T. W. H.	213
Prayer, O. B. F.	214
Prayer in South Place Chapel, M. D. C.	215
English Social Amelioration	216
How Shall we Meet the Labor Problem? E. D. C.	217
Faith, W. H. S.	218
Prayer for Temporal and Spiritual Blessings, Charles Voysey	219
Free Religion and Social Reform, I	220
A Protest, W. J. P.	221
Satisfying Preaching, O. B. F.	222
Prof. Tyndall in Boston, E. D. C.	223
Free Religion and Social Reform, II	224
Max Müller	225
Prof. Tyndall's Lectures, E. D. C.	226
Johnson's "Oriental Religions," T. W. H.	227
The Quakers, R. P. H.	228
Prayer—Martinian—Simony, M. D. C.	229
An Unsolicited Testimonial	230
More Petitions	231
Free Religion and Social Reform, III	232
Preaching and Teaching, O. B. F.	233
The Ministry, T. W. H.	234
Free Religion and Social Reform, IV	235
Father Burke's Lectures, E. D. C.	236
England, M. D. C.	237
Faith in Man, W. H. S.	238
Free Religion and Social Reform, V	239
A Symbol of Double Meaning, E. D. C.	240
Quakers and the Inner Light, R. P. H.	241
A Distinction with a Difference, O. B. F.	242
Spurgeon at his Work, Charles Voysey	243
Free Religion and Social Reform, VI	244
Religion, Power or Disease of the Brain and Nerve, E. D. C.	245
Philadelphia and Brooklyn Conventions, W. J. P.	246
Free Religion and Social Reform, VII	247
Criticisms, O. B. F.	248
Local Radical Organization, W. J. P.	249
The Polytechnic School, E. D. C.	250
Horace Greeley, A. W. S.	251
The Old South Church in Boston, E. D. C.	252
Palme, O. B. F.	253
Spiritual Conflicts in England, Charles Voysey	254
Personal and Impersonal Journalism	255
The Head and the Heart, A. W. S.	256
"Brevity the Soul of Wit"	257
System	258
The Decline of Preaching, T. W. H.	259
Letter from Mr. Washburn, W. J. P.	260

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

Nine Years Old	14
The Wanderer	15
Atlantic Essays	16
Diagrams of the Great Subjects of the Brain and Nerve	17
Dialogues from Dickens	18
The Chemical History of the Six Days of Creation	19
Text Book of Geology for Schools and Colleges	20
Text Book of Zoology for Schools and Colleges	21
Through the Looking Glass and what Alice found there	22
The Wonders of Water	23
A Russian Journey	24
The Revised Prayer Book	25
Insects at Home	26
More Criticisms on Darwin and Administrative Nihilism	27
Two Plunges for a Pearl	28
Janus Unmasked	29
The New View of Hell	30
Short Studies in Great Subjects	31
Speeches on Political Questions	32
Lectures on the Science of Religion	33
Safes; or the Mental Constitution	34
The Infinite and the Finite	35
Radical Problems	36
Mabel Lee	37
The Last of the Mohicans	38
Practical Training	39
The Cranial Appliances of Man and the Ape	40
On Heroes, Hero Worship, and the Heroic in History	41
The To-Morrow of Death	42
Mountain-making in the Sierra Nevada	43
Father Taylor, the Sailor Preacher	44
Legends of the Patriarchs and Prophets	45
The Popular Science Review	46
Three Centuries of English Literature	47
Science Primers	48
Instinct: Its Office	49
Recollections of Past Life	50
Christian Theology and Modern Secularism	51
How the World was Peopled	52
Chapters from the Bible of the Ages	53
A Woman's Experiences in Europe	54
Spectrum Analysis Explained	55
Monks, Popes, and their Political Intrigues	56
The World before the Deluge	57
Yesterdays with Authors	58

	PAGE
Practical Horse-Shoeing.....	306
Passages from the French and Italian Note-Books of Nathaniel Hawthorne.....	306
Christ in Modern Life.....	314
Rhymes of the Times and Other Chimeras.....	314
Straggles and Triumphs; or, Forty years Recollections of F. H. Barnum.....	314
Ancient York and London Grand Lodges.....	314
Three Books of Song, Longfellow.....	316
Boston Illustrated.....	316
The Siling and the Storing.....	316
The History of the Times.....	316
The Pioneers.....	316
Sailing on the Nile.....	316
Paul of Tarsus.....	316
The Pilgrim's Harp.....	316
Tales.....	316
Hebrew Men and Times, from the Patriarchs to the Mosaic.....	316
Huxley's Anatomy of Vertebrate Animals.....	316
Six of One by Half a Dozen of the Other.....	316
The English Life of Jesus.....	316
The Prairie.....	316
The Mental Cure.....	316
The Clergy a Source of Danger to the American Republic.....	316
The Masterwork of the American Republic.....	316
The Problem of Life and Immortality.....	316
The Pennsylvania Pilgrim.....	316
The Forms of Water.....	316
Town Geology.....	316

POETRY.

The Naked Truth, James Russell Lowell.....	12
Devotion, Buckner.....	12
The Resurrection from the Dead, J. H. C.....	15
A Bad "Ism," Helen R. Cutler.....	29
The Inner Music, Kibbe.....	29
The Pagan Hunt of Clematis.....	36
King Out, Ye Bells! D. K. Bonville.....	68
The Sign of the Cross, D. L. L.....	70
By His Stripes are We Healed, Jeanie G. Kinley.....	84
Sonnet, Mignonne.....	92
No More Sin, Eliza Scudder.....	116
To Be or Not to Be, E. C. Towne.....	134
The Hindu Seetha.....	134
To Adversity, Thomas Gray.....	134
To Life, Mrs. Barbauld.....	140
The Ancient Faith, James Russell Lowell.....	148
Listening, Milford.....	156
Philosophy, Milton.....	172
Unwedded, Lucy Larnum.....	180
The Lock of Hair, Leigh Hunt.....	188
The Philosopher in search of a Religion, Randall.....	188
A Prayer, Frederic R. Marvin.....	196
Song, Longfellow.....	204
The True Prophet, Leopold Schaefer.....	212
A Morning in Spring, Mary R. Whitlsey.....	212
Season, Dodd.....	212
Sixty-five, Adeline.....	212
The Burning of Boston, Asterisk.....	212
"Thy Will be done," A. R. B.....	212
Outside the Church, Emma Lazarus.....	212

COMMUNICATIONS.

Missionary Statistics, J. E. Putnam.....	6
The Fruits of Orthodoxy, F. M. Holland.....	7
Missions, Edward L. Crane.....	7
Unitarian Backslider, A. Farmer.....	7
A Story, B.....	7
Prayer as Finance, W. C. E.....	15
Master and Disciple, D.....	15
The Right to Siding H. Ford.....	15
Spiritualism and Reason, J. O. Barrett.....	15
A Queer Case.....	15
Longfellow's Christ, Edward C. Towne.....	23
An Appeal to the Earnest, H. L. Green.....	31
The First Response, W. H. Boughton.....	31
Bible Authority for a Very Criminal Act, Argue.....	31
The Right, Rev. W. M. Loom.....	31
The American Tract Society a Costly Abomination, J. L. Hatch.....	31
Paganism and Inspiration, Eliza Wright.....	34
Another Study of Christianity, Robert Collier.....	36
Spiritism and Spiritualism, Rev. Edward C. Towne.....	47
A Qualification, H. N. S.....	47
Scop all Truth, L. C. French.....	55
To the Point, Geo. W. Wood.....	55
The Moravia Wonders, G. B. Stebbins.....	55
A Success, C. B.....	55
How to Reach the Imbruted, H. L. B.....	63
Orthodoxy Still Preached, Samuel Colt.....	63
A Week of Blasphemy, Edward C. Towne.....	63
Christianity as Freedom, Frederick W. Warburton.....	63
The Necessity of Universal Conception, Edm. Ross.....	70
The Bible, Horace Wadham Nichol.....	70
One More, Geo B. Gill.....	70
Reform, Edwin.....	71
Danger, J. E. H.....	71
A Letter from Mrs. Woodhull, Victoria C. Woodhull.....	79
McChesley Scandal, Edward C. Towne.....	79
Too Much Pepper, Robert W. McLeod.....	87
Paine Celebration, Northman.....	87
Spiritism and Spiritualism, Elizabeth M. F. Denton.....	87
Paint, D. A. W.....	90
Causation in Morals, L. T.....	90
Greeting from Chestnut Street, C. A. B.....	95
Another View.....	95
The True Grit, J. N. Oxbury.....	95
Political Christians, W. F. Jamieson.....	95
The Future of Public Prayer, James Whitlsey.....	95
The Bible Cross-Examined, John R. A. Taylor.....	95
Sense and Nonsense in Theology, Sense.....	103
Theological Nonsense, A. J. Grover.....	103
Non-worshipful Ben. Jones.....	110
The Declaration of Independence, D. A. W.....	110
Milk for Babies Soured, Edward C. Towne.....	110
Olive Orthodoxy a Chance, H. D. S.....	111
Orthodoxy a Practical Failure, Samuel Colt.....	111
What They Think, John L. Newell.....	111
Jottings.....	111
Rectified, C. A. B.....	111
Democracy on Trial, Samuel Colt.....	119
The Real Tyrant, S. N. Wilson.....	119
Judaism and Immortality, Wm. C. Oliver.....	119
A Sudden Judgment, M. D.....	119
A Plea for Denunciation, J. M. McKim.....	127
In a Bad Way, Edm. MacGregor.....	127
The Brahmin A. Key, R. C. B.....	127
Letter from Richard Bedingfield, Edm. Ross.....	127
Protest of West Virginia Ministers.....	127
Words of Wisdom, F. W. Webster.....	135
F. W. Newman-Intuition, G. B. Stebbins.....	135
The One Altogether Lovely.....	143
Back-Shot, Carl H. O.....	143
Sick of Christianity, J. H. Arnold.....	143
Judaism and Immortality, Morris Blumenthal.....	143
La Fayette on the Jesuits, Thomas R. Hazard.....	143
The Sunday Question, H. I. J.....	150
Why they Subscribe for Index Stock, R. H. Ranney.....	151
Worships, James Whitlsey.....	151
Spiritualism at the Bar of Science, Engineer.....	151
Hell Improving, E. L. Crane.....	151
Science and Atheism, Nathan H. Chamberlain.....	154
Pre-Existence, Edwin Abner Davis.....	159
Spiritualism, P. H.....	159
The Religious Constitutional Amendment, A. E. Giles.....	159
President Grant, E. L. Crane.....	159
To the Radicals of the United States, R. D. S.....	167
Indels and Free Religionists, and their Folly, Morris Blumenthal.....	167
Heathenism in Yale College, Edward C. Towne.....	176
The True Messianic Idea Lost to the World, S. A. Tylt.....	176
Christian Massacre of Jews.....	176

The Christ of Miracle, A. J. Grover.....	178
Free Masonry and Atheism, An Infidel Mason.....	183
Scenes from Real Life, Max Pracht.....	183
Unjust Charges Against Scientific Men, John Chappell.....	183
Smith.....	183
Mr. Howard.....	183
Democratizing Tendency of Christianity, B.....	191
Pro and Con, Caroline F. Corbin.....	191
Not Far Off, But Near, C. A. B.....	191
Horace Greeley, Frank Prebster.....	191
The Church Leech, A. K. B.....	191
No Atheistic Masses, John Chappell.....	191
Directed by Henry Edgar.....	191
Blind in Jesus, Edward C. Towne.....	198
Another Good Movement, David Wright.....	199
Deaths in Embryo, K. N.....	199
Missionary Morals, F. M. H.....	199
A Demurrer, John Chappell.....	199
To A. C. E. H. Howard.....	206
Death Beds, Robert H. Pracht.....	206
More Light, L. H. Waters.....	207
Clairvoyance, E. W.....	207
The Genealogy of Jesus, Henry Anthony.....	207
An Unbeliever's Belief, B. Jewett.....	207
Self-Respect, T. W.....	207
Liberalism vs. the Forms of Christianity, J. W. D.....	210
Use and Abuse of Books, Edward C. Towne.....	214
Can the Scientists Reciprocate? J. T. Blakely.....	215
The Boston Library Open at Last, N. C. Nash.....	215
Mr. Underwood's Lecture, C. H. Little.....	223
Earnest Testimony to Spiritualism, Louisa Andrews.....	223
Facts for Spiritualists, J. E. F.....	231
A Noteworthy Fact, Edward C. Towne.....	231
Death Beds, Robert H. Pracht.....	231
New Millard Religious Society, J. S. Thomson.....	231
What is Religion, Eugene Hutchinson.....	231
The Eucharist, J. E. H.....	231
The Sturge Resolutions, G. B. Stebbins.....	238
The Materialist's Assumption, K. N.....	238
Not Unfair.....	239
Theistic Masons, A. M.....	239
The Fog Cleared Away, Morris Einstein.....	239
Religious Feeling, W. H. F.....	239
Dryness, James Emerson.....	246
Parker Pillsbury in Boston, R.....	246
Is it Right to Read? E. A. Davis.....	247
Praying for Light, F. G. Schulte.....	247
What makes the Christian, E. C. Towne.....	247
Complimentary, J. Cook.....	247
Conventional Christianity and Selfishness, Edward C. Towne.....	250
Theism and Atheism, C. E. M.....	254
Mediumism, La Roy Sunderland.....	255
Materialistic Spiritualism, Mrs. M. A. C.....	255
Desires and Mayors, Frank S. Billings.....	255
J. Davis on Christianity, A. E. G.....	255
The Leaven Working, J. S. Byers.....	255
Abraham Lincoln's Beliefs, Edward C. Towne.....	263
A Universal Religion, J. E. S.....	263
The Egyptian Moral Code, Dyer D. Lum.....	263
Miscellaneous, R. S. D.....	271
Conscious and Unconscious Knowledge, C. A. B.....	271
The Gleaner, G. B. Stebbins.....	271
Sleepy Liberals, David Wright.....	271
Counter-Criticism, B. F. Underwood.....	276
Rev. J. D. Patton, E. C. Towne.....	279
Explanatory, J. T. Blakely.....	279
Scripture Old and New, E. C. Towne.....	286
Positivism and Free Religion, C. G. David.....	296
The Spirit of the New Reform, Max Pracht.....	297
Letting the Ball Roll, E. C. Towne.....	297
A Disgrace to this Town—the Infidels, G.....	294
Christianity and the Campaign, E. R. Brown.....	295
What is it to be a Christian? R. H. Howard.....	295
A Pulpit Hero, A. Lover of Truth.....	295
Waked Up, J. F. Ruggles.....	295
The Science of Life, S. P. Putnam.....	295
The New Religion, Dyer D. Lum.....	295
Prejudice, Muscular.....	295
The Temptation of Jesus, J. A. J. W.....	299
Positivism in Theology, Evolutionist.....	299
A Problem, Reader.....	303
Catechism, James Munroe.....	303
Swimburne's Poems, Hugo Anderson.....	303
Hereafter, Geo. H. Holtzman.....	306
Our Brother, Christian Anderson.....	310
Let Us All Unite in Prayer, H. L. B.....	310
Answers to Prayer, R. H. Howard.....	310
Curious Thoughts on Life, M.....	311
The Position of Women and their Future, C. A. B.....	311
Orthodox Prayer—Short Form, O.....	311
A Word on Theism, E. L. Crane.....	318
Orthodoxy and Science, E. C. Towne.....	318
Science and Spiritism Once More, H. L. B.....	319
A Story of Investigation, James Emerson.....	319
Scientific Men and Old-Ladies, Caroline F. Corbin.....	319
Christianity and Freedom, Francis T. Warburton.....	321
Swimburne—Another View, Walter F. Johnson.....	330
Masonic Atheism, O.....	330
Orthodox in Language, Edm. Ross.....	330
Orthodoxy and Freedom, A. W.....	330
Scientific Prayer and Religion, E. C. J. B.....	331
System, Joseph Singer.....	331
The American Splinter, Edward C. Towne.....	339
Do Justice to God, Charles K. Whipple.....	339
Francis Kernan, A. G. S.....	339
Francis Kernan, A. G. S.....	343
Francis Kernan, A. G. S.....	343
Francis Kernan, A. G. S.....	343
Spirit Faces, Louisa Andrews.....	348
A Deathbed Penitent, L.....	347
Truth and Sentiment, Frank S. Billings.....	347
Babes and Sucklings.....	347
A Query, A. H.....	347
Some Homely Thoughts, H. L. B.....	347
The Ball and the Trap, Charles K. Whipple.....	347
Ideal and Historical Christianity, John Ferity.....	355
Miscellaneous Reflections, H. W. N.....	355
Is it Only Faith? Austin Kent.....	355
An Inquiry, Inquirer.....	355
An Antediluvian Paragraph, H. L. B.....	355
The Boston Radical Club, S. H. M.....	356
Matter and Mind, Hugo Anderson.....	357
Organization and Thought, K.....	357
Reply to Mr. Underwood, C. E. M.....	371
The Locality of Heaven, E. H. L.....	371
Knock Down Arguments, F. W. Webster.....	371
The Semite Religions, C. D. B. Mills.....	374
Prayer, Charles K. Whipple.....	374
Willard and Fetter, H. J. B.....	374
The Resurrection of Jesus, A Subscriber.....	378
Plato on Prayer, Alfred J. Wolf.....	379
Two or Three Gathered Together, Charles Collins.....	379
Untruth in the Pulpit, E. C. Towne.....	379
So Slow to Change, H. L. B.....	379
James and Labor Question, L. S. H.....	386
A Straightforward Story, C. F. Corbin.....	386
The Danger of Too Much Machinery, J. W. S.....	386
Faith, L. R. Sunderland.....	387
The Sabbath of Antiquity, C. L. A.....	387
An Appeal to the Musical, L. B. S. Wilson.....	387
The Philosophical Views of Dr. Carpenter.....	394
Something to be made Better.....	396
Exposed Error, C. K. Whipple.....	396
Judicial Christian Creed, E. C. Towne.....	402
The Theology of Spiritualism, J. E. Wallace.....	403
How to Spend a Holiday, H. L. B.....	403
A Letter from Mr. Batts.....	403
Body and Soul, L. Andrews.....	406
Mental Health vs. Mediumism, D. D. Lum.....	410
At a Prayer Meeting, F. W. Webster.....	410
Are We Governed by Law? J. A. B.....	411
The Radical Christian Demand, E. C. Towne.....	418

True Worship, O. A. B.....	419
Horace Greeley Again, P. Gordon.....	419

MISCELLANEOUS.

Liberty of Speech.....	8
The Free Religious Meetings.....	8
A Scientific Cause to Free Religion.....	11
Mr. Beecher's Radicalism.....	11
Compulsory Prayer.....	15
A Liberal Sentiment.....	19
A Clear Sighted Antagonist.....	29
Sunday School Songs.....	47
A High Moral Example.....	63
A Young Positivist.....	67
Dr. Hopkins on Denominationalism.....	71
A New Profession.....	73
Garibaldi on Theism.....	91
Huxley's Reply to a Bishop.....	107
Giuseppe Mazzini.....	107
What Men have Died for.....	107
The Heathen Chinese.....	107
Mr. Darwin and Free Religion.....	115
The Impachment of Christianity.....	122
Mr. Abbot Impeaches Christianity.....	122
A New Free Religious Movement.....	123
Chicago's Sin.....	123
The Christian Amendment.....	123
The Opposing Forces of Christianity and Infidelity.....	131
The Religious Test in the Constitution.....	131
Corious Judgment.....	135
Nations, Apologies by Goethe.....	138
Free Thought in Toledo.....	138
Corious if Authentic.....	139
The Oneida Community.....	147
Science and the Clergy.....	155
Was Washington a Christian?.....	155
Grote in Westminster Abbey.....	155
Christianity Impeached, R. H. Howard.....	168
A Survey of the Times, Duke of Somerset.....	168
Good Friday.....	168
Pastorale Scipione.....	170
A Brave Clergyman.....	171
A Child's Idea of Prayer.....	178
Catholicism at work in Europe.....	179
Catholicism at work in America.....	179
The True Ring.....	179
Church vs. Distillery.....	179
What Phenomena Occur?.....	185
Dickens and his Clerical Trade.....	187
Religion is Sentiment, not Science, O. B. F.....	187
Sealed to Satan.....	187
The Assault upon the Corner Stone.....	195
Jefferson's Advice.....	195
Americans Abroad, M. D. C.....	198
Radicals and Conservatives.....	208
Hitting the nail on the head.....	208
A Word in Self-Defense.....	208
Local Organization: St. Louis Society.....	211
Barnes on Sin.....	211
Hearding the Lion in his Den.....	215
Short of Meat.....	215
A Dream of No God, Richter.....	219
Yearly Meeting of the Subscribers to the Voyage Estab.....	227
Belmont F.....	227
Thomas Carlyle on Future Life.....	230
Fattening up the Bars.....	235
Voltaire and Christianity.....	239
A Touching Incident.....	239
Last Chance.....	239
The Poor Children's Picnic.....	247
Reform in the Church.....	248
Letting the Ball Roll.....	248
The Two Camps.....	248
Japanese Religion.....	247
The Birth of Jesus.....	251
Liberty and Truth.....	251
Little Carrie's Smart Minister.....	251
Ritualism Defined.....	256
The New Style of Prayer.....	267
English Heretics: Bradlaugh.....	274
English Heretics: Voysey.....	278
The Destruction of Mr. Emerson's Residence.....	278
Mistakes.....	278
Babylonia.....	279
Greeley's First and Future Life.....	279
The School Question in England.....	282
The Cloud no Bigger than a Man's Hand.....	282
Fish Hook Christianity.....	287
The Contest to Control the Schools.....	291
Common Sunday Schools.....	291
Scriptural Sabotage.....	291
Science and Superstition.....	291
An Infidel View of Catholicism.....	311
Philip Gould, the Colored Hero.....	311
The Jesuits Few but Strong.....	311
The Pious and the Church.....	314
A Federal Address.....	314
Teaching in Common Schools.....	314
Garibaldi's Last.....	314
The Typical Prayer Reviewed, Thomas Vickers.....	333
Is believing Prayer Certainly Effectual?.....	333
Free Religion and Science.....	333
Of no Permanent Benefit.....	333
Heathenism at a Premium.....	333
The Sources of Christianization.....	333
Christianity and Heathenism in India.....	333
Charles Voysey.....	333
Spencer vs. Martineau.....	333
Protoplast.....	334
Sunday Items.....	334
Science and Human Brotherhood.....	334
Sectarian Pilfering.....	334
London Heathenism.....	334
A Tragic Incident in Prayer.....	334
Idolatry.....	334
The Internationals.....	334
The Character of Thomas Paine.....	334
Angels and Captains.....	334
The Proposed Paine Hall.....	334
Free Evening Schools in Toledo.....	334
A.....	334
Not Bad.....	334
The Baptismal Service.....	334
The Communion Service.....	334
The Appeal of Harvard College.....	334
More Work for Stanley.....	334
H. W. Beecher's Theology.....	334
A Metaphysical View.....	334
Prayer on the Established Church.....	334
Heathen Poetry.....	334
An American Myth.....	334
Compulsory Worship in Colleges.....	334
The True Gentleman, B. M. Palmer.....	334

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, JANUARY 8, 1872.

WHOLE No. 106.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which is very little understood, is seen more prominently in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the characters of this great change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no living place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLIOTTWOOD ARBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOTSEY (London, England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

THE PROPOSED CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

[Read to the First Independent Society of Toledo, Dec. 31, 1871.]

The following Call for a National Convention, to be convened in Cincinnati on January 31, 1872, for the purpose of securing such an amendment to the United States Constitution as shall make Christianity a part of the fundamental law of the land, has been made public through the daily press; and the movement it represents is so evidently assuming an importance which it is impossible to recognize too frankly or too soon, that I propose to make it the subject of my morning's address. The copy of the Call which I shall read is taken from the Cincinnati Gazette of December 9:—

A CALL FOR A National Convention, TO MEET IN THOMAS' HALL, CINCINNATI, O., JANUARY 31, 1872.

GOVERNMENT IS INSTITUTED FOR MAN AS AN intellectual, social, and moral, and religious being. It corresponds to his whole nature. It is intended to protect and advance the higher as well as the lower interests of humanity. It acts for its legitimate purposes when it watches over domestic life, and asserts and enforces the sanctity of the marriage bond; when it watches over intellect and education, and furnishes means for developing all the faculties of the mind; when it frowns on profaneness, lewdness, the desecration of the Sabbath, and other crimes which injure society chiefly by weakening moral and religious sentiment, and degrading the character of a people.

Acting for such purposes, government should be established on moral principles. Moral principles of conduct are determined by moral relations. The relations of a nation to God and His moral laws are clear and definite: 1. A nation is the creature of God. 2. It is clothed with authority derived from God. 3. It is under the dominion of Jesus Christ, the appointed Ruler of nations. 4. It is subject to the Bible, the special revelation of the moral law. In constituting and administering its government, then, a nation is under obligations to acknowledge God as the author of its existence and the source of its authority, Jesus Christ as its ruler, and the Bible as the fountain of its laws, and the supreme rule of its conduct.

Up to the time of the adoption of the National Constitution, acknowledgments of this kind were made by all the States. They are yet made by many of the States. And in the actual administration of the National Government the principle is admitted. But the fundamental law of the nation, the Constitution of the United States, on which our Government rests, and according to which it is to be administered, fails to make fully and explicitly any such acknowledgment. This failure has fostered among us mischievous ideas like the following: The nation, as such, has no relations to God; its authority has no higher source than the will of the people; government is instituted only for the lower wants of man; the State goes beyond its sphere when it educates religiously, or legislates against profanity or Sabbath desecration.

The National Association which has been formed for the purpose of securing such an amendment to the Constitution as will remedy this great defect, and indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all Christian laws, institution and usages in our Government on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the nation, invites all American citizens who favor such an amendment, without distinction of party or creed, to meet at Thomas' Hall, Cincinnati, January 31, 1872, at 2 o'clock P. M.

WILLIAM STRONG,

U. S. Supreme Court,

President of the National Association.

VICE PRESIDENTS.

His Excellency, John W. Geary, Governor of Pennsylvania.
His Excellency, John W. Stewart, Governor of Vermont.
His Excellency, James M. Harvey, Governor of Kansas.
The Hon. James Pollock, ex-Governor of Pennsylvania.
The Hon. Marshall Jewell, ex-Governor of Connecticut.
The Hon. Wm. Murray, Supreme Court of New York.
Felix R. Bruno, Esq., Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania.
George H. Stewart, Esq., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.
John Alexander, Esq., Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.
Charles G. Nazro, Esq., Boston, Massachusetts.
Thomas W. Bicknell, Esq., Commissioner of Public Schools, Rhode Island.

James W. Taylor, Esq., Newburgh, New York.
Prof. Taylor Lewis, LL. D., Union College, New York.
Prof. Julius H. Seelye, D. D., Amherst College, Massachusetts.

The Right Rev. Charles P. McIlvaine, D. D., LL. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Ohio.
The Rev. A. A. Miner, D. D., President of Taft's College, Massachusetts.

The Rev. Jonathan Edwards, D. D., Baltimore, Maryland.
The Rev. J. H. McIlvaine, D. D., Newark, New Jersey.
Prof. O. N. Stoddard, LL. D., Western University, Ohio.
The Rev. M. Simpson, D. D., Bishop of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

The Rev. J. Blanchard, D. D., President of Wheaton College, Illinois.
John S. Hart, LL. D., Principal of the State Normal School, New Jersey.

The Right Rev. John B. Kerfoot, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Pittsburgh.
The Right Rev. F. D. Huntington, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese of Central New York.

The Rev. T. L. Cuyler, D. D., Brooklyn.
The Rev. Levi Scott, D. D., Bishop of the M. E. Church, Delaware.

The following gentlemen of Cincinnati consent in the foregoing call:

The Rev. E. D. Morris, D. D.

The Rev. A. A. Taylor.

The Rev. B. F. Avelott, D. D.

The Rev. A. Ritchie.

The Rev. Joseph Chester.

The Rev. C. E. Babb, D. D.

The Rev. A. D. Mayo, D. D.

Samuel S. Fisher, Esq.

A. H. McGuffey, Esq.

H. A. Merrill, Esq.

Wm. Strunk, Esq.

The Rev. C. H. Taylor, D. D.

The Rev. O. A. Hillis.

The Rev. Renben Jeffery, D. D.

John Shillito, Esq.

T. E. Hon. D. K. Eate.

Peter Gibson, Esq.

The Rev. Thomas S. Yocom.

The Rev. Geo. F. B. Abbott.

The Right Rev. Chas. P. McIlvaine, D. D.

J. H. Feldwisch, Esq.

The Rev. C. Saure.

The Hon. W. VanHamm.

The Hon. M. B. Hagins.

The Rev. Chas. L. Thompson.

Henry Martin, Esq.

The Rev. W. H. French.

The Rev. H. H. George.

This whole document is prepared with consummate ability, and shows a thorough knowledge of the state of the average Protestant mind. Unprepared as the Protestant public may be to-day to carry out the plans of this Convention, there is little or nothing in the Call itself that any thoroughly Orthodox believer would venture to dissent from. It does but state the commonplaces of its creed, as applied to government. It does but lay down consecutively and clearly the propositions to which he listens with acquiescence every Sunday. The singularity of the Call does not lie in its enunciation of any novel principles or ideas, but solely in the avowed of a purpose to carry out, universally accepted doctrine into practice. The first three paragraphs of the Call would be immediately assented to by nine Orthodox believers in every ten, even here in America; the dissent would begin to be heard at the fourth and last paragraph. They are not prepared as yet for such a step as it proposes. Hence I say that the document has been drawn up with consummate ability—with admirable shrewdness, sagacity, and tact. It first rehearses with soberness the A B C of the Protestant Christian gospel, receiving the listener's spontaneous assent; it then simply summons him to act out his admitted convictions, and square his conduct with his professions. This is the gist of the Call. It states conceded premises, and simply draws out their conclusion. It takes the Christian public at its word, and quietly demands performance of it. It recites the Christian catechism concerning government, and simply enjoins obedience to it. That is all. But there is terrible power latent in its simple logic, as events will show.

Now I believe that this Call fully expresses the character of the movement from which it has proceeded. I believe that this movement is the most honest, the most earnest, the most logical, and therefore the most formidable, of all movements now carrying on within the limits of the Christian Church of this country. It is exceedingly impolitic, in one sense of the word, for it must, in proportion to its success, excite intense opposition by its very openness; but impolicy is never the fault of hypocrites. It is also exceedingly fanatical; but fanaticism merely means intense devotion to ideas which you and I do not believe in. Every man of intense convictions is a fanatic to all who disagree with him. The men who are at the bottom of this movement must be grimly and dangerously in earnest—devotees of their idea—fanatics of the old Inquisitorial stamp, who, if they had the power, would relentlessly put you to the rack for rejecting their gospel, not because they are harder-hearted than other men, but because they would think themselves doing God service by destroying heretics. I doubt not there are many cooler-headed Christians who would hold these fanatics back, and advise a more wary and moderate course; but, widely as I differ from them, and sternly as I would oppose them, I yet respect the earnestness which despises caution, and the singleness of purpose which detests a double-faced expediency. It is these out-and-out Christians who propose, not to wait to convert India, but forthwith to Christianize America and extirpate the heathenism at their own doors,—who mean to waste no time on the mere outworks of the enemy, but to attack him in his very stronghold,—that excite in my own mind, I confess, a sentiment of personal respect that I cannot feel towards the colder-blooded Christians whose faith is feeble enough to save them from such fanaticism. There is a dash of heroism about this rash assault on the very citadel of American liberty that commands my admiration, even while it fires every instinct and energy of resistance. Who these men are that are the leading spirits of the movement, I do not know; but I suspect that the titled signers of the Call are not its real originators. Be this as it may, they are men in earnest, who deserve to be met in earnest; and what I have to say will be in earnest.

First, then, let me say that I regard this proposed change in the Constitution as distinctively a Christian Amendment. It aims to make the nation a professedly Christian nation, and the government a professedly Christian government; and it aims to do this by the express recognition in the National Constitution of distinctively Christian ideas. Now I am well aware that many excellent and liberal people think me strangely perverse and wilful and one-sided in giving up the Christian name to the rigidly Orthodox. "Mr. Abbot," they say, "makes his own arbitrary definition of Christianity, and then fires away at his man of straw with great pertinacity; but he never hits at all what we mean by Christianity. He is very unreasonable in thus abandoning the good with the bad, and refusing to make so plain a distinction as that between the true and the false Christianity." Now the reply I would urge to this curious charge is, that I have not made any definition of Christianity at all; that no individual has any right to make any; that, through the utterances and history of the Christian Church, it has made its own definition; that I simply accept this definition ready-made to my hand; and that these good people, evolving some other definition of Christianity out of their own moral consciousness, are the only ones who have arbitrarily defined it. No man has any business to make "his own definition" of it, any more than he has to make his own definition of a hippopotamus. If you want to define the animal, observe it, and let your definition express its qualities as an objective fact of Nature. If you sit down by yourself and philosophize over the hippopotamus, you may turn out an admirable definition that has only one defect—it will not define the animal. That is the trouble with these critics of mine. They dive into the depths of their own minds, and bring out a beautiful definition of—their own dreams. It no more defines Christianity as one of the facts of history than it defines Bunker Hill Monument. I should be ashamed to confess that I had "my own definition of Christianity," for the confession would convict me of great ignorance of the true laws of scientific definition. Definitions are learned, not made—learned by observation and study of facts as they are, not made by a priori speculation on what the facts ought to be. The great Christian Church has defined itself in history, and defined Christianity by the accumulated labors of its greatest minds in the universally accepted formularies of faith.

—the creeds and confessions on which Catholics and Protestants are alike agreed. These are the definitions I accept; and I make none.

Consequently, when I see a body of men uniting to amend our National Constitution by the incorporation of these universally recognized and accepted Christian ideas, I say that the proposed amendment is a Christian one. Nor is this characterization of the attempt a matter of small consequence. It brings home to the mind the fact that CHRISTIANITY IS TODAY ENDEAVORING TO REVOLUTIONIZE THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT. That is the actual fact. It is not a simple Amendment, following other Amendments as supplementary to the Constitution, that is aimed at. No—what is desired and sought by this movement is the CHANGE OF THE PREAMBLE ITSELF, AND A CORRESPONDING CHANGE THROUGHOUT THE ENTIRE CONSTITUTION, SO THAT BOTH MAY BE MADE CONSISTENTLY CHRISTIAN, AND NO LONGER REMAIN PURELY SECULAR. That this statement is true, will appear from the Memorial which, as adopted originally at the Pittsburgh Convention, it is the object of the approaching Cincinnati Convention to recommend to the people for signature. It reads as follows:—

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress Assembled:

We, citizens of the United States, respectfully ask your honorable bodies to adopt measures for amending the Constitution of the United States so as to read, in substance, as follows:

"We, the people of the United States, humbly acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil Government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the Nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority, in order to constitute a Christian Government, and in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquility, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the inalienable rights and blessings of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to ourselves, our posterity, and all the inhabitants of the land, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

And we further ask that such changes be introduced into the body of the Constitution as may be necessary to give effect to those amendments in the preamble.

Nothing can be plainer than that the contemplated change, if made, will involve a POLITICAL REVOLUTION of the most sweeping and profound character. It will be the overthrow of the Free Republic and the erection of a Christian Theocracy in its stead. It will be the formal abolition of the great principle of the separation of Church and State, to which we owe the unparalleled civil liberty we enjoy. It will be the restoration to power and influence of the Christian clergy, as the recognized priesthood of a Christian State. It will be, sooner or later, the destruction of the rights of free speech and a free press, in the interest of Orthodoxy. It will be the return of the Dark Ages, of the persecution of science and free thought, of the frightful tyranny of ecclesiastical domination over the mind, the conscience, and the heart of the people. In short, it will be the utter and disastrous failure of the great American experiment of free popular government, and the earlier or later rehabilitation of ecclesiastical despotism.

If a degree of bigotry should ever be developed in this country sufficiently intense to carry the proposed "amendment" of the Constitution, it will be intense enough to enforce these natural and inevitable consequences of it. How must we meet it? I am no lover of the spirit which hastily appeals to force as the arbiter of controversy. I would oppose the adoption of any such "amendment" by every peaceable means that could be devised. But if Christian bigotry, emulating the spirit of Secession, should open fire on a new Fort Sumter, and should succeed with mad fanaticism in destroying the constitutional guarantees of our religious liberties, it could be met in no other way than the Rebels would have been met, in case they had captured Washington, amended the Constitution to suit themselves, and seized upon the whole machinery of our government. Would the North have submitted even in this dire extremity? Ought it to have submitted? No—a thousand times no! The nation would have fought as never before to conquer back its ravished freedom. So should it be now. We must repel these mad attempts at any cost. We can never submit to the murder of Liberty. We must defend her—peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must. We must make the reign of ecclesiastical despotism on this continent impossible. Rather than see that day dawn upon us, every man who loves freedom and civilization and the integrity of the human soul will shoulder his musket, and march to his death as willingly as he would to a gay and joyous feast. Better that our gutters should run red with blood, and our proud cities be laid more low than poor Chicago in ashes and utter ruin, than that thus the hope of humanity should be quenched in a worse than Tartarean gloom. For one, there is no sacrifice so extreme, no fate so terrible, that I would not rather meet, than behold the glory of this Great Republic thus snatched like a star from heaven, and the bloody banner of the Cross waving from the dome of the Capitol where now stands, benign and pure, the goddess of Universal Liberty.

Does all this seem to you the excited declamation of a mere enthusiast? No matter. You have but to trace out for yourselves the natural, the inevitable consequences of this open crusade of Christianity against Freedom, if by our negligence or apathy or stupidity it is permitted to succeed. Look for a moment at the principles for the spread of which this Convention is summoned.

The very first words of the Call I have read to you are a bold denial of the first principles of American Liberty. "GOVERNMENT IS INSTITUTED FOR MAN."

Note the words. For Man—not by Man! Yet the Declaration of Independence proclaims that, "to secure these [human] rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." The very first words, then, of this Christian Call are a repudiation of free government—a confession of treason to the Republic.

But perhaps you think I overstrain the point; it may not be just to lay such emphasis on the little word for. Very well. Let us read further. "Government is instituted for man as an intellectual, moral, and social, and religious being." That is, [civil] government is to extend over his mind, his conscience, his home, his inmost spirit. Even his religion is not exempt from the control of government, which (so runs the Call) "frowns on profaneness, lewdness, the desecration of the Sabbath, &c., &c." That is, men shall be punished by law for supposed offences against God's dignity, whether by the careless, irreverent use of his name, or by doing on Sunday anything that shall be adjudged "desecration" by the restored priesthood. Sunday laws, and laws against profanity, shall be enforced as religious regulations. Hence the first Amendment to the Constitution, which prohibits Congress to establish any religion at all, will be "amended" out of existence forthwith.

But I pass on, and will read further still. "1. A nation is the creature of God. 2. It is clothed with authority derived from God. 3. It is under the dominion of Jesus Christ, the appointed Ruler of nations. 4. It is subject to the Bible, the special revelation of the moral law." Here are four immeasurable, unfathomable falsehoods. On the contrary—1. A nation is the creature of Man. 2. It is clothed with no authority not derived from himself. 3. It is not under the dominion of Jesus Christ or any other usurper. 4. It is no more subject to the Bible than it is to the Koran or the Book of Mormon. These counter-propositions are all implied in the saying of the Declaration of Independence that governments "derive their just powers from the consent of the governed." The proposed "amendment" involves the overthrow of the Declaration of Independence root and branch, and the erection in its stead of the dismal catechism of the Westminster Assembly as the law of the land.

I might go on, and quote the Call clause by clause to show that every line, every word, every syllable, is dictated by hostility to the grand, universal principles on which this "free government of the people, by the people, for the people," is based. I repeat it most emphatically, the proposed "amendment" contemplates neither more nor less than a complete POLITICAL REVOLUTION. Not a single principle of free government would be left. Christianity is conspiring against the existence of the State—as openly, as virulently, and, I believe in my very soul, as dangerously, as did the now extinct Slave Power of the South. This Call for a National Convention is a new Ordinance of Secession. It shows us that here, in the very heart of the Great Republic, we have a domestic foe in the Christian Church, conspiring openly and with deadly hatred against the whole framework of our political institutions; and it is even now trying to fire the Christian heart with the flames of treason. The parallel is complete. The Church proclaims the absolute dominion of Jesus over the nation, and teaches that every citizen belongs to him body and soul; what is this but to proclaim once more the exploded infamy of "property in man"? It is slavery still that aims the deadly blow at the national existence. Once it was slavery of the body; now it is slavery of the mind. The difference is nothing—the principle is essentially the same. The conflict is between Christianity and Freedom—between the Christian Church and the Republic—between the Christian Creed and the Declaration of Independence. The object of the attack is an absolute Political Revolution—the subversion of all republican principles and the triumph of spiritual despotism. Let the true nature of the conflict be once understood, and the danger is past.

But the nature of the conflict is not understood. Nor is the danger past. The list of appended signatures is the most alarming feature of the case. Here is a body of men, all distinguished in their various walks of life—all educated—all influential—all representative. It should seem as if such men as these should know better what they are about. But they are undoubtedly ignorant of the real tendency of their attempt. Governors and Ex-Governors, Judges, and other officials—Presidents and Professors, Bishops and Clergymen—these men do not know what a terrible upheaval of this country they are in danger of producing. Nor can they be aware of the treason they are committing against their country. They are swept into this movement by causes deeper than they comprehend, and know nothing of the true nature of the uneasiness which makes them join it. They little perceive that Christianity feels itself desperately endangered in this country, and that this is a wild effort at self-preservation. A few of them may understand the real state of the case; but the majority of them are supporting they know not what. They are doubtless good men; but they are ignorant about matters of which their ignorance will cost their country dear.

Here lies the terrible danger of this movement; not that the men engaged in it are evil-intentioned men—far from it—but that thousands and hundreds of thousands of people just as good as these are all ready to be swept into a movement of whose final issue they have not the faintest conception. The real causes of the movement are the harm felt by good, honest Christians at the rapid spread of liberal ideas, and their own conscious inability to cope with them by argument or scholarship. Hence, as a last resort, they look to the influence of a civil government made Christian to stay the "flood of infidelity." But they dream not of the terrible nature of the agency they are invoking, or the avalanche they are letting loose upon the country. Once admit this issue between Christianity and Freedom into politics, and the heat of passion it will develop can only be guessed at by the history of the past. I shudder to think of it. The latent bigotry slumbering in the hearts of the evangelical portion of our population, who now good-naturedly laugh at the wild project, will be awakened most dangerously if it begins to be a living issue—if they are called upon at the polls to side either with their "Savior" or against him. Liberals are just as short-sighted in the matter as the Orthodox; neither party realizes the crisis: both are drifting along to a perfect maelstrom of strife. That a large party on each side will be ultimately formed, if the agitation increases (and I think it will), is hardly doubtful to any close observer of the times. There is danger, great danger, imminent danger, in this movement; there is danger in meeting it, still more danger in not meeting it. The final success of the movement cannot for one moment be thought of; it will surely fail. Yet the embers of religious bigotry are burning unperceived, beneath the covering ashes of apparent indifference, in thousands of Protestant hearts all about us. It will take but a strong breeze to kindle them into a blaze. The Catholics will for their own ends favor the scheme; and in the course of time they will assume direction of it. These Protestants are unconscious accomplices of Rome.

If there is one thing more surprising than another in that list of names, and one that gives great force to what I have been saying, it is the fact that the Unitarians and the Universalists, the two so-called "Liberal Christians" sects, are both represented on it. Rev. A. D. Mayo, of Cincinnati, is a Unitarian. Rev. A. A. Miner, D. D., is a Universalist. I confess to being amazed at seeing their names there. Surely, if the most "liberal" sects of Christianity are not exempt from this terror of free thought,—if even distinguished members of these sects can be frightened into such a movement, what must be expected from the average church-goer? I was not prepared to see such an evidence of what I have all along believed, namely, that the recruits of this aggressive Christian party exist in unsuspected multitudes all about us. It is a melancholy and startling revelation. And the fact that these "Liberal Christians" are more willing, as Dr. Bellows in my own hearing once declared he was, "to go with Orthodoxy in any form rather than with the Radicals," shows how little the army of freedom can count upon any one who clings to the most diluted form of Christianity. The great mass of church-going people are pretty sure to be drawn into the movement, if the agitation goes on. But I can hardly yet believe that a majority of the Unitarians are prepared or can be prepared to go so hopelessly back into bondage as Mr. Mayo has done. The tradition of liberty is still, I think, too strong among them. But Dr. Channing might well blush to see a Unitarian put his name to such a Call as this.

Friends, I believe that the danger from this movement is so real and great, that we cannot begin too soon to meet it. The most active efforts should be made to unite all those who would oppose such a false "reform" as this, in a single organization—very loose, yet sufficient for working purposes. We cannot tell how soon this matter may come to a vote. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." The Liberal Alliance of Toledo furnishes a model for just the kind of organizations that should be multiplied from Maine to Oregon. And without waiting till the Christian petition receives enough signatures to seem important, a counter-petition should be immediately circulated. The days of indifference must be nearly over, unless we intend to allow ourselves to be surprised and captured. Do not think me a croaker or an alarmist; I do but warn you against a danger that will soon become visible to every eye. "Forewarned is fore-armed." If the Liberals of the country are earnest and watchful, they may yet dissipate, by prompt and speedy action, a cloud that bears a hurricane in its bosom. For the sake of peace and humanity, I hope most earnestly that the sense of a false security may not lull the radicals of the land into apathy or listlessness; for the consequences of inaction now may bring upon the country miseries that it turns one sick to contemplate. Never before did I feel such an overwhelming conviction of our common duty to educate the people betimes. Show them the true nature of this movement, and it will not receive a majority of votes. Leave them in ignorance of it, and it is impossible for him who loves his fellow-men to look into the future without dismay. Let us all do, every man in his place, what little he can for the spread of liberal ideas, and for the quickening in all hearts of the great love of human freedom. For in the genial atmosphere of liberty alone can humanity bear its finest fruits, or grow most beautifully upward towards the skies.

LIBERTY OF SPEECH.

[From the N. Y. Christian Union, of Dec. 6, 1871.]

THE INDEX quotes the following paragraphs:—

The National Standard reports Dr. Bartol as stating that "Mr. Bowler says he has thoughts too far in advance of public sentiment for present publication."—Christian Register.

No parent would wrong his little child by forcing upon its tender inexperience all the knowledge which his manhood holds. Just as bad is the wrong done by the teacher who ignores the conditions and wants of his flock, and forces strong meat upon babes. You must give according to men's capacity to receive; otherwise you do not really give at all. But all such reticence and withholding must be simply as a temporary and preparative thing. There must be constant progress in the development of the hearer's capacity, and the unfolding of higher views. Nothing is to be accepted as a final resting-place save the truth and the whole truth.—Christian Union.

Upon these THE INDEX remarks:—

"There is something inexpressibly saddening in such avowals as these. To be sure, Mr. Beecher has the example of Jesus in his favor (if we trust the untrustworthy fourth gospel):—'I have yet many things to say to you, but ye cannot hear them now.' A public teacher of religion, speaking to mixed audiences containing persons of all grades of intelligence, is morally bound to give his highest and best thought, leaving to his hearers the responsibility of rejecting the truth. He is at least bound to offer it. There is great and grave danger that he may deceive himself in withholding it,—that he may be swayed more than he is willing to confess to himself by the fear of incurring unpopularity, of diminishing his influence, of losing place and the honor of men. Such a confession as the above must deprive Mr. Beecher's preaching of all hold upon the truth-loving and the intelligent, for it reveals a political manipulation of truth that throws over everything he says the suspicion of insincerity. What else but this has been the excuse of priestcraft in all ages for keeping the multitudes in ignorance? We want to honor Mr. Beecher, for he has done great services to the cause of human welfare. But we cannot withhold a rebuke, far more sad than indignant, when he avows openly a principle of action, as a public teacher, which we have seen again and again to work like poison in the souls of young ministers. In the name of all manliness, we denounce it,—as will every other who has a deeply rooted faith in truth."

To this we respectfully reply:

1. On the one hand, we advocate freedom of speech to all who believe that they have truth that men need to hear. This right is not impaired by the supposed dangerousness of the truth spoken. A man has a right to utter novel views, unsettling views, unpopular and so-called dangerous views, if he sincerely believes them true and for the public good. His motives are not to be impugned, nor is his name to become odious, simply because his tenets are dangerous. Since the world began, all novel views in religion, in politics, and, for a long time, even in science, have been regarded as highly dangerous by the Stand Stills.

The utterance of unpopular truth ought not to put an honest and earnest man under a ban, or subject him to odium. Moral intolerance and social persecution for opinion's sake are as wicked and as cruel as civil penalties. Fines and imprisonments are easier to bear than unjust hatred and popular odium and social ostracism, for the simple exercise of the right of speaking one's deepest convictions.

For example, we think THE INDEX, and the doctrines it unfolds, are about as far from the truth as they can well be. We should regard the prevalence of the doctrines it teaches and the banishment of the doctrines which it assails, as a misfortune not easily to be measured. But on that very account we should jealously defend Mr. Abbot's right of speech and printing. There is no freedom of speech unless men are allowed to speak things which you do not believe. There is liberty of speech under the tyrant's nose, if only one speaks what the despot likes to hear. May men speak what folks do not like to hear? If a sincere and honest man, such as we cordially believe Mr. Abbot to be, utters dangerous untruths believing them to be benign and necessary truths, he not only has a right to do it, but he has a right to go unharmed in his social and public relations while doing it. No man has a right to make him odious on account of his opinion.

We fought too long on the unpopular side of the great question of Slavery and Liberty, not to have learned to this very core the right of a man to say what the community does not want to hear, and the injustice of making a man odious for speaking unpopular truth. If we had it in our power to shut Mr. Abbot's lips, to break his peaches, to violently suppress doctrines which we deem untrue and pernicious, we would not do it. That is not the best way to combat error. Argument against argument, a better theory against a poor one, larger inductions against inferior ones, in short, better facts, better philosophy, better spirit, furnish the only true and proper method of resisting the injury arising from free speech, when employed in the cause of untruth. Freedom is the very atmosphere through which all aspects of truth descend to the world.

2. Such are the truths necessary on the one hand for the community to hear. On the other hand, no honorable man should judge another's liberty. One has a right to be silent, to form his own judgment of the best method of speaking, of the time and circumstances under which he shall speak. If a man chooses to pour out all he happens to have in him, unsorted, promiscuous, and all in a heap, let him do it, but he has no right to demand that every body else should upset himself in the same manner.

"A public teacher of religion, speaking to mixed audiences, containing persons of all grades of intelligence, is morally bound to give his highest and best thought, leaving to his hearers the responsibility of rejecting the truth." This is true of all ripe and settled convictions, but does not touch the real matter in hand. All the world is stirred up—Religion, Politics, Economy, Sociology, Morals, Philosophy, are undergoing fermentation. Men are in every state of transition, sometimes holding to facts but rejecting a philosophy of them, seeing a better form of truth growing out of old beliefs but not yet disentangled from them. Men in some moods see clearly what in other moods will disappear.

We enter a protest against that rash conceit, that meddling impatience, which would make it needful and that a man should empty himself of all his unripe notions,—that he should every month spread his nebula, project his comet, and leave his congregation of hearers and readers to make the best of his celestial miscellany. To say off hand the product of your fancy, without patient waiting and ripening in time, is the easiest and the most worthless exercise of freedom of speech. We are deluged with trash. Nay, it is beginning to be unpopular for a man to hold anything back—"Let her rush—open every gate and sluice—give her a freer—no matter what—rain, slope, and refuse—let her drive!" Not to do this is "moral cowardice"—is "insincerity"—is being "untrue to one's convictions," and many other dreadful things besides. Because ripe fruit is wholesome, these men exhort everybody to shake their trees, green or ripe, and bolt the unsorted mass upon the market.

In regard to Dr. Bartol's alleged statement, it is proper for the writer now to speak in the singular number. I have only to say, that I have no great store of truths in advance of public sentiment; but that I have a good many thoughts, before and behind and on all sides of public sentiment. But these thoughts are changing. Somedie out. Some change form. Some prove to be old as the hills. Many of them won't ripen, but drop off worm-bitten. I should be ashamed to hide or withhold any truth, of whose authenticity I had, at length, become satisfied; but I should be equally ashamed not to put upon probation those swarms of thoughts with which this stimulating age inspires every thinking man, until time should show which were truths, which half truths, and which tempting illusions.

THE FREE RELIGIOUS MEETINGS.

Comparatively few persons, probably, understand what is meant by "Free Religion." We do not ourselves assume to understand it fully, but may be able briefly to state some of its leading features.

The "Free Religious Association," so called, was an outgrowth from Unitarianism. The anomalous position which that denomination held, claiming to be a Christian church, and yet repudiating the theological system which is the basis of the Christian faith, especially the redemptional office of the author of Christianity and the vicarious atonement, led to an effort at its general convention held in Syracuse, in 1866, to reconcile the apparent inconsistency by the adoption of a creed. This was done, but at the expense of the loss of a few of its most promising ministers, among them Mr. O. B. Frothingham, and Mr. Francis E. Abbot, and others whose names are not familiar to us. Probably the crisis brought these gentlemen face to face with the fact that the term Christianity meant the system of religion as propounded by the original Church, or that it meant whatever each individual might think that it meant. They took the latter alternative, and it is probable that the leaders of the Free Religious movement will say that there is no evidence that the author of Christianity held a divine mission above other men; that his history is too uncertain to make it safe to accept the theological system which takes his name, and that the system itself is purely the work of human minds.

But stepping out of the old religious basis, they still claim that there is a natural religious spirit in man which has in all ages sought for some form of expression, and while they adhere to no particular system of the past, that they have nevertheless as much religion as any sect—in other words, that religion is of the person, and that every person has as much of it as the organization of the person, aided by culture, is capable of having. They take the name of "Free" Religion, because they have no creed whatever, and any person may fellowship with them who chooses, whether he be Armenian, Greek, Jew, Turk, Christian, or Atheist. In short, that religion consists in living good lives, and in adherence to truth, honor, justice and love. This digest of the Free Religious idea is given from some acquaintance with its supporters, and from the address of Mr. Frothingham at Young Men's Hall on Thursday evening. While we are aware of its want of fullness, we trust that it does no injustice.

As our paper is made up on Friday afternoon, we are necessarily precluded from giving details of the meeting on that day.

[The above is from the Detroit Popular Appeal, a new liberal paper very well conducted by Mr. S. B. McCracken, and is written with an evident wish to be as perfectly fair as it is entirely kind. It is proper to add, however, that Mr. Frothingham was not present at the Unitarian Conference referred to, having previously lost all confidence in the possibility of winning that denomination unequivocally to freedom. We are now of the same mind. Furthermore, while the members of the Free Religious Association amicably differ as to the true definition of Christianity, we are of the opinion that the Christian Church alone has any right to define it. We therefore accept its definition, and find ourselves ruled by it outside of Christianity altogether.—Ed.]

Force, force, everywhere force! we ourselves a mysterious force in the centre of that. There is not a leaf rotting on the highway but has force in it; how else could it rot?—Carlyle.

The worst way to improve the world is to condemn it.—Kantus.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"He requested that I would say to you on sending the money that, although he has enjoyed the opportunity of reading THE INDEX all along, when he considers the great importance of it, and how far THE INDEX is in advance of other papers called liberal, which are too apt to give way to some fanaticism or to accept as legitimate some unwarrantable interference with individual liberty, he cannot forbear contributing something."

"I have charge of the Unitarian pulpit here for the present. If you could also furnish me with the first seven numbers of your paper, it would be a great favor. I desire to learn and know the last word from your earnest band of thinkers and writers, although I find in Christianity all the food and strength for my spiritual nature and rejoice in the faith of Jesus Christ."

"I believe you are on the right path, in which all crooked and diverging theological tracks must finally terminate, no matter how carefully religionists may shun it now. We must give up the 'budding' and 'grafting' process, and develop the moral image of God by a practical cultivation of the soil of our humanity."

"From some cause or other I did not receive my INDEX last week. I do not blame you for it; it may be an oversight, or the mail may be at fault. Until this omission, I did not know how necessary the paper was to my weekly measure of enjoyment and solid mental improvement."

"I am rejoiced to see that your stock subscription increases weekly, and would gladly add to its amount myself, could I afford it. I regard your effort as a noble warfare against the superstitions and bigotry that have descended to us from past ages."

"Were my purse as full of money as my heart of thanks, I would send a good subscription; but alas, I cannot now. I am taking this copy for the benefit of my gardener's family here."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held on the Unions, in the new Express Building on St. Clair Street, opposite the Wetzel Dr. J. H. House, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash receipts for the week ending Dec. 5th.—W. H. Burr, $2; N. S. Townsend, 25cts.; L. B. Ugoe, $1; D. Sandman, $2.50; A. J. Grover, 50 cts.; J. W. Springfield, $4; Henry Grady, 25 cts.; Henry M. Cross, 20 cts.; S. L. Hill, $5; P. C. Turner, $2.75; E. Whipple, $2; J. P. Atwater, $2; Dr. E. S. Barrows, $1.50; J. K. Hitchcock, 25 cts.; L. F. Gardner, $2; R. D. M. Turner, $2; A. B. Hildard, 50 cts.; Mrs. L. E. Blount, $10; W. C. Preston, $2; S. H. Emery, $2; R. Johnson, 25 cts.; Magnus Tall, $2; A. S. Ewing, $2; Peter Thompson, $1; James H. Hubert, $2.25; A. P. Hulse, $2; Wm. Gill, $1; Morris Einstein, $2; Morgan W. Ayres, $2; D. Wright, $2; M. B. Bryant, $2; E. P. Hubert, $2; P. R. Johnson, 25 cts.; C. L. Perkins, $1; Chas. Sowers, $1; Mary F. Welch, $1; J. Sedgwick, $2; C. F. Wood, $2; Geo. Allen, $1; Geo. M. Scott, $1; F. R. Merzler, $2; A. S. Carpenter, $10; R. C. Howland, $2; C. N. Boree, $2; James W. White, $4; P. C. Howland, $2; Max Pracht, $10; O. C. Clageton, $4.50; F. E. Abbot, $2.50; F. J. Norton, $2; E. Dillon, 50 cts.; J. F. Lockwood, $1.10; Benj. Halliwell, $4.10; C. R. Purdy, $2.35; Alex. Cochran, $10; D. K. Lamson, 60 cts.; David F. Mender, $25; F. V. Balch, $5; N. Cobb, $2; Mrs. J. P. Angier, $4; A. L. White, $2; N. S. Alcock, $2.75; Samuel Townsend, $2.25; Calvin Cook, $2; Wm. Clarke, $2.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

RECEIVED.

A CATALOGUE of the Officers and Students of Harvard University for the Academic Year 1871-1872. Cambridge: Riverside Press, 1871. pp. 108.

VICK'S ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE and FLORAL GUIDE. 1872. JAMES VICK, Rochester, N. Y. pp. 119.

CONSTITUTION and BY LAWS of the WOMEN'S ECONOMIC GARDEN HOMESTEAD LEAGUE. Second edition. Boston: MAHER & FISKE, PRINTERS. 1871. pp. 60.

THE HEALTH HABITS of WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT and WILLIAM HOWITT, as given by themselves. New York: Wood & Lothrop, 15 Light St. 1871. pp. 30.

THE CHRISTMAS LOCKET. A Holiday Number of OLD and NEW. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 118 Washington St. 1871.

APPLETON'S JOURNAL. Monthly Part. No. 31. Weekly Numbers for December, 1871.

MONTHLY SCIENTIST. A Journal of Science, Culture, and Progress. December 1, 1871. LEONARD A. SAWYER, Editor, Whiteboro, N. Y. $1.50 a Year.

THE NEW CHURCH INDEPENDENT and MONTHLY REVIEW. WALKER & METCALF, Publishers, Laporte, Ind. $2.00 a Year.

WHITTAKER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, January, 1872. WHITTAKER, GILMORE & CO., Milwaukee, Wis. $1.00 a Year.

CHURCH'S MUSICAL VISITOR. Cincinnati, O. Published by JOHN CHURCH & CO., 60 West Fourth St. $1.00 a Year.

PETERS' MUSICAL MONTHLY. January, 1872. Published by J. L. PETERS, 520 Broadway, New York. $3.00 a Year.

THE NAKED TRUTH.

JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.

JANUARY 6, 1872.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGE on last page. Five Hundred Shares, $50,000.
THOMAS MUMFORD, New Harmony, Ind.,	One	100
D. AYRES, JR., Brooklyn, N. Y.,	"	100
MRS. L. E. BLOUNT, Evansville, Ind.,	"	100
"	Defiance, O.,	100
"	Bryan, O.,	100
J. T. BRADY, Sabetha, Kan.,	"	100
"	Northampton, Mass.,	100
MAX PRACHT, Cincinnati, O.,	"	100
O	Boston, Mass.,	100
H. HYETERMANN, Toledo, O.,	"	100
C. FOLKOW, Zanesfield, O.,	"	100
S. O. KASTMAN, Palmyra, Mo.,	"	100
J. O. MARTIN, Indianapolis, Ind.,	"	100
L. T. IVES, DeKalb, Mich.,	"	100
E. W. MEDDAUGH,	"	Two
A. FOLKOW, Boston, Mass.,	"	200
W. F. HEIKES, Dayton, O.,	"	200

252,000

With all seriousness, then, and with intense conviction of the truth and urgent necessity of what I say, I IMPEACH CHRISTIANITY BEFORE THE BAR OF CIVILIZED MANKIND. In the name of all that is best, noblest and divinest in human nature, I impeach it of Because, by this extinction of self-respect, it enfeebles the consciousness of human rights, and thus blights the very idea of natural justice, which is the practical recognition of these rights. No man who despises himself can respect his fellows or reverence the rights inherent in their very humanity. Whatever extinguishes human rights before God will extinguish human rights among men. For this reason Christianity has always been blind to justice.

Because it teaches the impossibility of Humanity's advance through its own natural exertions, and insists that it should rely on supernatural assistance alone—thus extinguishing aspiration and drying up the fountain head of all progress.

Because it teaches despair of human nature, as ru-ed, lost, and deprived—incapable of all salvation that which comes from without, and subject to no natural development but that of degeneration, crying it from bad to worse and from worse to worst. It thus denies the great, hopeful doctrine of humanitarian religion, that Humanity tends by its free efforts to grow better as it grows older, and emerge from a lower into a higher state in accordance with natural laws.

Because it proclaims ideas of God which would give every reflective mind acquainted with modern knowledge into absolute atheism, were it not that modern knowledge itself furnishes the elements of a far higher idea of God in universal Nature. It thus appears as the most insidious enemy of the religious sentiment—the destroyer of that pure and enabling worship which recognizes the Divine throughout all Time and Space, and creates in the soul of man a consciousness of profound spiritual oneness with the vast Whole of which he is a part. In the name, therefore, of Human Intelligence, of Human Virtue, of the Human Heart, of Human Freedom, of Humanitarian Religion, I seriously and earnestly impeach Christianity before the tribunal of Humanity it still continues to outrage and enslave. I impeach it in the name of that which is greater than itself, not lower—in the name of Truth, Morality, of Love, of Liberty, of God; and I summon it to answer at the bar of Humanity, its rightful judge, that it may clear itself of the high crimes and misdemeanors of which I accuse it, or else submit to the sentence of just condemnation pronounced against it by the public opinion of civilized mankind.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT.

ACT PROMPTLY!

In the opening lecture of this first number of the third volume of THE INDEX, I have given my views in great plainness on a matter that cannot be too earnestly considered. "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." I now propose action—immediate action. At every man and every woman who is opposed to the adoption of the proposed Christian amendment to the United States Constitution send to me his or her name, and the names of as many others as can be obtained for the same purpose, authorizing me to append these names to the following counter-petition, which I propose to keep open for signature at THE INDEX Office in Toledo until the proper time shall come for forwarding it to Congress. As soon as the Christian petition is sent in, a counter-petition will be on hand, I trust most numerously signed, to show both to Congress and the people that this regrade "reform" will be met with prompt and vigorous protest.

PETITION.

As Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully and earnestly ask your honorable bodies to preserve inviolate the great guarantees of religious liberty now contained in the Constitution of the United States, and to disavow all petitions asking you to adopt measures for amending the Constitution by incorporating in it a recognition of "God as a source of all authority and power in civil government," if "the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the Nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority." We are against such proposed amendments as an attempt to nationalize the government of the United States, and to destroy the great principles of complete religious liberty and complete separation of Church and State on which it is established by its original founders.

Friend of human freedom should hesitate or delay in the matter. Let the people speak so loudly and promptly that the forthcoming Cincinnati Convention shall be the last ever held for the purpose of destroying our great constitutional guarantees of thought, free speech, and a free press. Roll up a list of names to thousands and tens of thousands.

Let it be a cause of lasting regret to every man who neglects to send his name that he thus has undone the duty he owes to his country and the world. I hereby affix my own name to the petition, and am resolved at the proper time to present it to Congress, even though it should have to go alone. It shall never be said that the petition was sent to Congress without a protest from at least one man in these States.

I respectfully ask every editor in the land who receives this number of THE INDEX, and who is willing to help me in this plan, to publish the petition, and to state to his readers that signature to it should be immediately forwarded to

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
Editor of THE INDEX,
Toledo, O.

OUR OUTLOOK.

It was once said by the eminent theologian, Richard Cecil, that, if one moral and upright man should deny Christianity, he would do the faith of England more harm than all the sneers of Voltaire, or all the sentimentality of Rousseau.

It is not, as I take it, the aim of THE INDEX to harm the faith of England, nor of America, but only to rectify and enlarge it. Yet certainly this remark of Mr. Cecil comes appropriately to mind when our newspaper thus steps forth into renewed life. To be sure, it is no new thing for moral and upright men to "deny Christianity" in the sense he means. There has always been a small body of avowed atheists in America—ranged, curiously enough, under the banner of that avowed theist, Thomas Paine. These men, for all that appears, have been as moral and upright as any others, and have been honorably identified with all good reforms. They have had, too, able and courageous newspapers. But the point of difference between them and THE INDEX is that the writers for THE INDEX generally recognize and respect the religious sentiment, which the others, for the most part, honestly abjure. And that a body of "moral and upright" men should do this, and yet should plant themselves with more or less unanimity outside of the Christian name and fellowship, is certainly a new thing in the history of the world. It makes THE INDEX, to say the least, an interesting spiritual phenomenon.

If these writers were simply a set of light-headed boys, seeking only to air the whim of the moment; or of constitutional scoffers, hating all reputable things; or of selfish sensualists, seeking excuses for indulgence; or of mere reactionaries, driven to one extreme because their fathers went to another; or of disappointed and world-weary men, soured by life's sadness; or of shallow pretenders, just come into the possession of their first idea; then, this movement and THE INDEX, its organ, would represent very little. It would merely add another to the vagaries of the time, and have no more solid significance than the latest device to reconcile Genesis and Geology, or the latest Second Advent interpretation of the "little horn" in the book of Daniel.

But all of these personal descriptions would singularly fail to meet the case of THE INDEX contributors. I speak from a pretty long acquaintance with most of those here represented, when I say they are not boys, nor triflers, nor scoffers, nor sensualists, nor worldlings, nor misanthropes, nor imbeciles. They hardly even fall within the three classes into which Dr. Palfrey classified the Harvard Theological School of twenty-five years ago,—mystics, skeptics, and dyspeptics. Whatever their individual defects or weaknesses may be, they are mostly men who are tolerably clear of youth and (for the present) of senility; who have as good digestions, as good tempers, and as good consciences as the average of men; whose educational opportunities have been fair, and who have long been students; who can express their views with tolerable clearness, and who certainly propose to push them with sufficient energy; who are quite accustomed to a radical position, and hope, so long as they live, not to flinch from it. Most of them have come to their present views by easy growth, and are in fact in the second generation of free thought; others, again, have been trained in superstition, and have learned the preciousness of liberty by having to fight for it. They have come together from a variety of worldly positions and with plenty of opportunity to test in actual life the views they hold. They have tried their opinions in the light of success and of failure, of comfort and of want; they have carried their faith beside deathbeds, within prison-walls, and amid the touching confidences of bewildered hearts. Therefore they claim the right to be recognized as being—whatever else they may be—at least a group of mature, thoughtful, responsible, serious, and resolute men. Varying in temperament and attitude,—recognizing with pleasure the existence of minor differences, that guarantee the individuality of each,—there is yet a firmness of alliance between them such as no Ecumenical Council ever cemented. The proof of this is seen in the manner in which they have arrested public attention, infinitely beyond their expectation, within the last four years. If you wish further information to the same point, dear friends, the path is easy,—a year's subscription to the more firmly established and renovated INDEX will give you the story of the Future.

T. W. H.

OUR RESPONSIBILITY.

In his article on Free Religion in a recent number of the Universalist Quarterly, Mr. Mayo confronts us with our duty to the race in a solemnly sententious manner thus:—"A convention that turns Christianity out of doors as the preliminary to its own vindications practically binds itself to assume the burden of the world's redemption." I quote the passage simply because it voices a loose notion that frequently crops out on the surface of the popular mind. The best answer to it is a plain disavowal of any such responsibility. In fact, the notion itself betrays the existence and the power of one of those desperate fallacies that have from time immemorial bewildered the Christian mind. The fallacy consists in thinking that it is our business or any body's business to "convert" or "redeem" the world. The Christian Church professed to do this, undertook to do it, made itself responsible for doing it. The Unitarian Church, admitting the failure of Romanism and Evangelical Protestantism, modestly takes up the old challenge and blithely accepts the old task. It is a task that we decline, not from prudence, but from principle; not because it is difficult, but because it is not imposed; not because we might not succeed where all have failed, but because to undertake it is irrational and foolish.

In our judgment, what the world needs is not "conversion" but culture, not "redemption" but knowledge of its own needs and capacities. The world is not lost or crooked or out of joint. It is merely crude and unshapely. If we believed "Man to be the father of God," we should address ourselves to the task of bringing our disobedient son back to his allegiance; but believing that "God is our Father," we think it more modest to humble ourselves, return to our allegiance, and ask what He would have us to do. Is it rash to imagine him as saying to us in reply to such a question:—"My children, give up your conceit; fret yourselves no more about the world which I have made; fear not that it will go to ruin unless I make it conform to your views; vex not your souls with efforts to rectify the conditions I have established. Rather study those conditions with a purpose to conform to their requirements; learn what the laws of salvation or health are, and try to get them obeyed. I made the world and furnished it with the needful supplies of force. I am quite able to take care of it; and if, instead of meddling and fussing, you will fall in with my prescribed methods, my intentions will in due time be carried out."

In a word, our business is to help and not hinder,—and to help by considering ourselves as members of the world's organism, and not as critics and repairers of it. That organism does more for us than we do for it. The strength of religion, like every thing else, comes through obedience to its laws, not through correction of them.

The world will rectify itself, if left to itself. This principle is admitted very generally in regard to some concerns of the utmost importance. The favorite maxim reads—"Give Nature room, and she will grow." The physician has discovered the virtue of the sanitary laws. He substitutes the principles of hygiene for the practice of physis; endeavors to assist Nature, and rests his hope of cure on her power to rally, rather than on his power to expel. The reformer studies Social Science, tries to put men in their just relations to one another, and has full faith that the evils of society will disappear as soon as those relations are acquiesced in. The philanthropist lays his theories by, drops his sentimental nostrums, throws away his straight-jackets and cathartics, and adopts the doctrine that the best help you can offer to the sick, the poor, the enslaved, is that which helps them to help themselves. The regenerating power is to be called out, not to be put in. The wise man never thinks now of casting devils out of the insane, of exorcising the demons from criminals. The insane recover soonest under the restorative influences of light and air and cheerful associations; the criminal most quickly regains their moral sense when placed in sympathetic relations with their fellow-men. Give Nature a chance, and she cures her own hurts.

Is there no lesson here for the priest? Shall he be the only one to work on the old theory of dragoning the world into submission to his tactics? If there be spiritual laws, they should be at least as vital and regenerative as the physical and social laws are. It is the business of religion to interpret them and assist them, not to dictate to them and cross them. They do a thousand times as much for religion does for them. In fact they give to religion all the power it has. But for them it would not exist at all. It is their creation, and the only justification it can produce for being is that it gives to them expression and force.

At our recent Convention in Syracuse, a kindly brother of the Orthodox persuasion said that, when Free Religion could show a single soul saved, he would believe in it. Had I thought it worth while to reply to him, I should have said that, when his "Christianity" could show a natural group of men and women, I would reconsider my judgment of it.

O. B. F.

THE ATTITUDE OF FREE RELIGION.

In estimating the value of any movement or sect in religion, it must not be forgotten that everything depends upon relation, and that a phase of truth may at one time represent the most advanced thought and the noblest spirit of the world, and at another become so incruited with superstition, bigotry, and intolerance that it is the greatest stumbling-block in the world's progress. The speculative doctrines may be more or less correct, or of more or less importance; and yet the attitude of the movement towards existing beliefs or institutions may be all-important. This makes the history of sects a profoundly interesting study, in which the radical scholar will find most varied illustrations of the working of the human mind.

How paltry, for instance, would seem to us the dispute about the administration of the cup to the people in the observance of the Sacrament, or "Lord's Supper!" Instead of its being a blessing to the people, many conscientious temperance men discountenance its use, as tending to lead to intemperance. But to the Hussite of the early Reformation the cup represented all human rights, and the demand for it was the demand for equality and human brotherhood. "The Bread for you, and the Wine for me," has always been the division of the good things of life which aristocracy has claimed; and the Hussite made the eternal claim of humanity for recognition and an equal share of the birthright.

Having a profound sense of the value and importance of the Protestant Reformation under the lead of Luther, what a puzzle it is to many liberal thinkers of the nineteenth century to find the doctrines he taught so narrow and false and unacceptable! But it was not Luther's doctrines, but Luther's attitude toward the Church, which gave Western Europe such an impulse towards freedom and enlightenment. We are now as unwilling to believe that it is only by the blood of Christ that we are saved, as by the absolution of the priest; but to Luther, the assertion of salvation by grace alone was a protest, not against a theory, but against a most abominable practice which came home to the consciousness of all his hearers. The Catholic Church, as represented by tenets and dogmas, was not so easy to refute; but the Roman Church sending the Inquisition into every man's home, shutting out education from the people, making civil government subordinate to ecclesiastical tyranny, and taking the people's money to support an idle company of priests and monks, was a thing easily condemned by the common sense of mankind when its pressure was felt in person.

It has been again one of the puzzles of history that Calvinism, a system so highly speculative and so monstrous in its doctrines, should have been the religion of the bravest and best men of their time, and should have produced or accompanied political freedom and lofty morality. But early Calvinism seems to have been a protest of Eternal things against the things of Time. It is magnificent in its assertions, and dwarfs all petty distinctions of earth in its grand hierarchy of Heaven's chosen ones. I can imagine a Wendell Phillips of those days turning against the doctrine of absolution by masses or penance, with the startling announcement of the doctrine of Election. "Saved by a priest!" he might cry, "why, it was pre-ordained before the creation of the world who should be damned and who should be saved." And so far as the priest's interference was concerned, this would certainly be true.

But do we find that the Calvinism of to-day, whose attitude is entirely changed, is the special friend of political liberty and lofty morality? The records of the Anti-Slavery party will tell a story about that. It is easy to recognize a difference between the New England towns where there has been a Unitarian church for many years, and those where the old Orthodoxy has prevailed. The tone of culture and social morals is higher in the former. But is this owing to the peculiar view of the Unitarians as to the nature of Jesus, or to any other of their distinctive theological doctrines, or is it owing to the bold stand which they took for a liberal interpretation of the Scriptures and for the value of reason and the dignity of human nature? Most surely, the latter.

And this is the value of the Free Religious or Radical position to-day. It does not unite people on any doctrines, even on negative ones; among those who adhere to the position are men who differ as widely as Mr. Abbot and Mr. Wasson. But it represents freedom of thought and the recognition of truth and character inside or outside of any old established boundaries. While Free Religion means this, it has great value and power. Should it forsake this attitude, it will become feebler than the weakest of the sects.

E. D. C.

THE BOSTON LECTURES.

The following is the list of lecturers and subjects in the course of "Sunday Afternoon Lectures" at Horticultural Hall, Boston, for 1872:—

Jan. 7.—O. B. FROTHINGHAM, "Three Short Studies of Christianity."

" 14.—JOHN WEISS, "Religion as a Sentiment."

" 21.—SAMUEL LONGFELLOW, [to be announced.]

" 28.—D. A. WASSON, "Social Ideals."

Feb. 4.—T. W. HIGGINSON, "The Character of Buddha."

" 11.—F. E. ABBOT, "The God of Science."

" 18.—RABBI LILIENTHAL, "The Religious Idea in History."

" 25.—SAMUEL JOHNSON, "Interpretation of Nature."

Mar. 3.—EDWARD ATKINSON, "Political Economy a Necessary Study for the Realization of Moral Welfare."

" 10.—WM. J. POTTER, "The Positive Contents of Rationalism in Religion."

" 17.—MARY A. LIVERMORE, "The Religion of Republicanism."

The above lectures, as announced last week, will be published in full in THE INDEX, as soon as possible after delivery; and they will be published in full nowhere else. Friends of THE INDEX are respectfully requested to make this announcement known as widely as may be among the liberals of their own respective neighborhoods. These "Sunday Afternoon Lectures" are the most important course of the year in many respects, as embodying the latest phase of free religious thought; and all reflective persons should make themselves acquainted with it, whether sympathizing or not with the free religious movement.

MR. BEECHER'S THEORY OF PREACHING.

In THE INDEX, No. 101, we criticised some statements of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher which we thought inculcated a low and demoralizing theory of the duty of religious teachers in the public utterance of their convictions. To these criticisms Mr. Beecher replied some time ago in an article which we republish in full elsewhere, having only just succeeded with difficulty in procuring a copy of the paper containing it. Let us frankly confess our surprise and pleasure at the spirit of this reply. Mr. Beecher has disarmed his critic by removing the misapprehension on which the criticisms were based, and by meeting it with a frankness and kindness which convince us that our understanding of his words did him great injustice.

The misapprehension was, we still think, a very natural one, since he compared the "thoughts too far in advance of public sentiment for present publication" to the "knowledge" (not crude and undigested and inchoate notions) which a parent withholds from a little child unable as yet to profit by it. It did not occur to us that Mr. Beecher, when speaking of such "knowledge," meant to include "all that he happens to have in him, unsorted, promiscuous, and all in a heap." On the contrary, the whole analogy he instituted naturally led us to suppose that he referred to settled, fixed, matured convictions which he conceived to be too far advanced for his hearers. There seems, in fact, very little point to this analogy, when taken the other way; for the interpretation we are now instructed to put upon it reduces the "strong meat" to "boarding-house hash," in which bits of bone, potato-skins, and unmentionable miscellaneous ingredients have been all chopped up together.

Let us not be misunderstood. We do not say this in order to insinuate the slightest suspicion of Mr.

Beecher's explanation, but only to show that our misapprehension was not prompted by a carping, captious spirit. What we said, we said very reluctantly; and we are exceedingly glad to find ourselves mistaken in supposing Mr. Beecher to be one of that too numerous class of ministers who defend a "wise reticence in the pulpit" concerning advanced ideas which are not unripe notions, but convictions. His closing words are most noble and manly, and they express with great power the same idea of the public teacher's duty which it was the whole object of our criticism to enforce:—"I should be ashamed to hide or withhold any truth, of whose authenticity I had at length become satisfied; but I should be equally ashamed not to put upon probation those swarms of thoughts with which this stimulating age inspires every thinking man, until time should show which were truths, which half-truths, and which tempting illusions."

Such words as these come from the inmost soul of him who utters them; and, speak them who may, they must strike a responsive chord in every upright heart. They make us eager to undo the unmean injustice of our former article; and we rejoice to express for Mr. Beecher the sincere respect with which they inspire us.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

MISSIONARY STATISTICS.

NEPONSET, MASS., Dec. 13, 1871.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Esq:

Dear Sir,—I have read with very great interest and satisfaction your articles in THE INDEX on Christian Propagandism, and also your controversy upon the subject with Mr. Gladden of the Independent. Heartily coinciding with the general tenor of the articles, and as thoroughly condemning the captious and uncandid spirit of the Independent in regard to them, I feel the more anxious that THE INDEX should continue to keep itself entirely in the right in the argument.

For this reason, I beg to call your attention to what appears to me to be an evident mistake, made doubtless through inadvertence, in your article upon the subject published in No. 102 of THE INDEX.

In referring to Mr. Gladden's second point, you quote from his article as follows:—

"All this calculation is based on the supposition that the number of converts bears a certain uniform ratio to the amount of money expended. But the supposition is not according to fact. During the first ten years of the existence of the American Board about $250,000 was expended, and the number of converts was less than two thousand. During the next ten years the expenditure was about $750,000, and the number of converts was more than twenty thousand."

In your comments on the above extract, you say:— "This ['History of American Missions,'] gives eleven hundred as the number of converts in 1830, twenty years after the Board began its operations, instead of the twenty thousand which Mr. Gladden claims."

By carefully reading over the statement of Mr. Gladden, you will, I think, see that he does not say that the number of converts was twenty thousand for any single year, but for the entire ten years, which would of course give an average of only two thousand converts a year. If this is a correct reading of his statement, as it seems very evident to me it is, you cannot of course fairly convict him of error or "exaggeration," by comparing eleven hundred converts, the result of one year's labor, with twenty thousand converts, the result of ten years' labor.

If, upon a careful review of the article in question, you find that I am correct in what I have stated (as it is quite possible that I may not be, as I have no data before me except those in THE INDEX and Independent), I trust you will anticipate Mr. Gladden in making the correction, before he shall have had the opportunity which, judging from the past, he will be only too glad to improve, of accusing you of "wilfully, basely, and with malice aforethought," misquoting and perverting his language, however innocent you might really have been of any such evil intent.

Trusting that you will excuse this friendly criticism from an entire stranger, but an ardent friend of THE INDEX and of the Free Religious movement, I remain

Very respectfully yours,

J. E. PUTNAM.

[The statement of Mr. Gladden was that the total number of converts made by the American Board during the second decade of its existence (from 1820 to 1830) was 20,000. Our own statement, based on the authentic records of the American Board itself, meant that the total number of converts connected with all the missions of the Board at the end of this decade was only 1,100; and that this number of converts was therefore the net result of the first twenty years of the Board's operations,—not, as Mr. Putnam understood us, the "result of one year's labor." We thank Mr. Putnam, however, for his very friendly letter, which shows our statement not to have been clear; and we print it lest others should be similarly misled. Even in 1863, Dr. Anderson, the Secretary of the Board, reports only 25,538 converts as the net result of fifty-eight years of active operations. Mr. Gladden's extraordinary exaggeration, therefore, remains as yet unexplained. It would have been easy to make out of this gross misstatement a very plausible case of something worse than "prevarication"; but we had no wish thus to imitate a bad example; and we take it for granted that Mr. Gladden's blunder was honestly made. Our argument against foreign missions is too strong to need the aid of personal abuse.—ED.]

THE FRUITS OF ORTHODOXY.

DEAR INDEX:—Accept some proofs of the nature of Orthodoxy as shown in a little town in the North West, where the Atlantic Monthly got forty subscribers at its start, where everybody reads the N. Y. Tribune, and where there has been a flourishing society of Radical Unitarians over ten years, besides an organization of more ultra Liberals, and, in neighboring towns of the same county, a large society of Universalists and another of Humanists or German Materialists.

Nearly two years ago there was a chance of a public reading-room in this town, on a plan admitting all religious periodicals which might be given out, allowing of no purchases in the interest of any sect; and that chance was extinguished by the opposition of some intensely Orthodox people to the diffusion of knowledge through any hands but their own. One Congregationalist minister is reported to have answered the plea that such a reading-room would keep the young men out of the saloons, by saying that he had rather have his children drink whisky than read Unitarian books. A projected course of lectures failed because the Orthodox churches would not open to the lecturers.

A few weeks ago one of the most experienced, faithful and skillful School Superintendents in the state lost his re-election, running nearly a thousand votes behind the ticket, in favor of a man whom no one expects to qualify. The defeated candidate's real offence was his belonging to the Humanist Society above mentioned, though some false and frivolous pretexts have been violently urged, especially his refusal of a first-grade certificate to a teacher who had failed to get even a second-grade one in an examination for state certificates elsewhere. This teacher has been retained on a lower certificate, with an easier plan of studies, and for a much higher salary than he had last year, in spite of these failures and of the withdrawal from the school of his best scholars in disgust at his incompetency, which is considered by the majority of the School Board and the voters, especially the Orthodox ones, as of no importance in comparison with his being such a zealous Presbyterian as to have broken the school-laws by his notes and comments on the Bible,—even going so far as to say that a moral man is in greater danger of perdition than a "reprobate." Those who opposed him for incompetency have been accused of persecuting him for Orthodoxy, and preached against by our Presbyterian pastor, who called it a contest between God and No God, Christianity and Infidelity, the Bible and the Devil, and denounced the friends of education as enemies of God.

Among those thus denounced was the Superintendent, who, however, obtained a unanimous re-nomination as regular Republican candidate, according to the wish of nearly every teacher in the county. All good judges agree in praising his familiarity with his duties, his self-sacrificing industry and his unwavering impartiality. He has done more work than the law required, and worked for less salary than he could have got elsewhere. He has refused even third grade certificates to young men otherwise qualified, because they used profane language and frequented saloons; and advised special and systematic instruction in morality from appropriate text-books interchangeably with reading the Bible, and publicly and privately declared his willingness to have the Bible read, wherever the parents made no objection. In one place, where most of the people were Roman Catholics and so opposed to the Protestant Version as to withdraw two-thirds of the children from school, he advised the teacher to reflect their scruples. He has kept his peculiar views entirely to himself, and done nothing, besides what has been mentioned, to earn the name of infidel under which he has been preached and voted against. On that account he was secretly worked against, while ostensibly retained on the ticket, and just before the election attacked in an anonymous circular issued too late to be fairly discussed, sent around at first clandestinely, and crammed with personalities, misrepresentations and appeals to prejudice. Tickets appeared at the same time printed in the same form as the regular Republican ones, and like them in every respect except that the name of the Democratic candidate was slipped into the place of that of this Republican nominee. Two ministers, a Baptist and a Presbyterian, are known to have carried these circulars and tickets with them as they left our town that Saturday to preach sermons, one at least of which was on that subject, as was another sermon by a Free Will Baptist minister that same day. A fourth minister, the Presbyterian, whose sermon some months before has been mentioned, is known to have brought up at least one voter of this counterfeit ticket, which was undoubtedly voted by some people to whom it was handed as genuine. Thus was an organized and deliberate fraud carried out by the great body of Orthodox people in the county, led by some of their ministers. No Orthodox minister, and but few of the Orthodox church-members, are known to have made any protest against this iniquity, which was indeed promptly denounced by the County Editor and the Unitarian Minister, but otherwise has been sanctioned by almost universal silence. Such is the power of the Orthodox, that even of those who condemn their conduct, few dare openly call it by its right name. Thus mighty in iniquity are our Modern Pharisees who pretend to honor the Bible by bearing false witness against their neighbors and persecuting the friends of education with fraudulently secured votes. Why will liberal men and women suffer so much power—political, social and educational, as well as ecclesiastical—to be held by such unscrupulous hands?

For myself, I feel no such indignation against any individual as against the system which supports them. Towards the sincerely Orthodox who were seduced into this persecution of education, I can feel no anger, but only pity. Our indignation should be partly directed against the corrupt politicians who make Orthodoxy their refuge, but mainly against Orthodoxy itself. It proves itself an evil tree by these evil fruits, a tree whose fruit is persecution, slander, treachery, hatred of knowledge and willing use of fraud. These are not, of course, all its fruits; but they are among its peculiar and characteristic ones. They are fruit to be expected of a system which disparages morality in favor of ceremony and creed.

F. M. HOLLAND.

MISSIONS.

TIPPECANOE CITY, O., Dec. 11, 1871.

MR. ARBOT:—

Whatever may be your faults, I think "crookedness" is not one of them. Upon reflection Mr. Gladden will come to the same conclusion; for he cannot but know that a blind superstition often does as much harm as persistence in a known wrong, and that self-interests have much to do in making blind superstitions, and need exposing. Mr. Gladden can only think you are on the wrong track; but I know hundreds of Christians who in this matter think with THE INDEX.

Foreign Missions you have certainly shown to be a machine which utilizes very little of the power it uses; and that its object is beyond its reach.

Respectfully,

EDWARD L. CRANE.

UNITARIAN BACKSLIDER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The Christian Statesman, the organ of the Society which aims to "amend" the Constitution of the United States by inserting into the Preamble three Calvinistic dogmas as a test of qualification for citizenship and office, in its issue of Dec. 1st publishes a call for a Convention to meet in Cincinnati to promote the interests of that cause. The same paper announces that a Unitarian minister is to take part in the proceedings, and evidently thinks that such a phenomenon should attract a large crowd of spectators and help the enterprise.

Now the second article of the creed which these gentlemen desire to engraft upon the Constitution declares the Scotch-Covenant doctrine of the Divine Headship of Jesus Christ over the nations of the earth, by virtue of his being the co-equal and co-eternal Son of God. But the doctrine of the Unitarians, from Dr. Bellows down or up to Mr. Mayo, is that Jesus was nothing but a good man, and that to ascribe absolute divinity to him, and to worship him as God, is to commit idolatry. Unitarianism is lower down in the honor it gives to Jesus than Arianism, which, in former times, cost the lives of so many thousands of the Athanasians who regarded them as heretics.

If the Unitarian minister aforesaid should succeed with his hyper-orthodox brethren in putting these dogmatic tests into the Constitution, does he not know that he and his co-religionists would be among the first to walk the plank as unpardonable heretics? If he does not know this, then I submit that he is singularly ignorant.

If he does understand it, and goes with his eyes open into the advocacy of "the Political Messiahship of Christ," which is to be one of the dogmas to be discussed at the approaching Convention, as auxiliary to the other three, is he not false even to Unitarianism, in contributing his little influence to a measure which, if successful, would disfranchise all Unitarian voters?

Let me tell Mr. Mayo that, while these grim Presbyterians will pat him on the head for his treason in helping them on in their damnable purpose to enslave the nation to their creed, they in their hearts despise the traitor. And should he dare to intrude himself upon their society because he has played false to his brethren in this one point, they will slam the door of the Church in his face and shut him out, as one still reeking with the foulness of a heresy which forfeits salvation. One of the most despicable of all possible functions is to be made a tool—a cat-paw, in securing results in which the poor dupe of an agent can never share. The retrogressive spirit of some Unitarians, which so lights up the countenances of the Orthodox with hope that the millennium is coming, is not a strange phenomenon to the philosophic mind. Whenever an army of brave men advance into the enemy's country, the cowards fall back, and long for the leeks and onions of Egypt.

A FARMER.

A STORY.

BOSTON, Nov. 27, 1871

DEAR MR. ARBOT:—

Some forty years ago a young minister was settled over one of the leading Orthodox (Trinitarian Congregational) churches in a New England city. He was a ripe scholar and an able man. The people of our beautiful sister city desired to keep him among them; but the excitement on Foreign Missions was at its height, and the American Board needed just such a man to go out and convert the learned Brahmin and the poor Buddhist, who have been "groveling" in the "light of Nature" for a few thousands of years—and bring them to a knowledge of the one only straight and narrow way.

Our friend went, saw, and was conquered. He was converted—converted to the idea that our dear and venerable Mother Church does not contain all the goodness and beauty and truth in the world. He came back and told the A. B. C. F. M. that the children of this world were wiser in their generation than the children of God. (This is not a verbatim report of the conversation, I beg some of your critics to observe.)

The Board had, of course, no further use for him,—perhaps thinking that in this case three fourths of the money spent had been lost, and a bright and valuable soul besides. The young minister retired to his library to read and study and pray, and the result is that he became one of the fathers in the new church of Reason. He does not preach but live the new faith, and, though calling himself a Pantheist, he gives largely of his wealth to any cause which he deems adapted to assist in emancipating his fellow men, to shed over a large circle the light of a pure and noble life. He is a subject for the labors of Rev. Mr. Howard and your critic in the Independent, who by the help of the prayers of other righteous men might turn him from the error of his way.

Those critics who can see no logic in your illustration of the undershot and tourbine water-wheels, and those who cry out against estimating the work of the missionaries in money, seem to me to be blinded. A missionary who goes to heathen lands has to prepare an outfit, then to spend long months and much money to reach his field of labor, then to learn the language of the heathen; and that costs him years more and much expense for teachers and his own support. Then it takes him years more to get himself adapted to the people, and learn where to take hold. He has to civilize them to some extent before they can comprehend the grand mystery of how two and one make one.

Such arithmetical instruction certainly can be measured in money, just as the purely secular instruction of a music or art school can be measured by what it costs. If the people of New York wish to extend material charities, such as food and clothing, to the poor of New Orleans or San Francisco, who can measure the amount of good which may be done? One human life thus saved from starvation may be worth all the wheat in the country. But the food cost so much in money, and no more. So of intellectual and spiritual food. The cost of delivering it can be calculated, and it would be much cheaper for the three cities above named if each were to take care of its own poor, than to waste time and skill and transportation in a costly exchange of charities. The advantages to us in having such missionaries as Chunder Sen come among us are great, and that of having a Christian missionary returned upon us as a shrunken Christian, but as a much greater and better man than he was when sent out, may be incalculable; and it might pay the F. R. A. to send Christians over to Asia with such hopes in view. But a few cases similar to the above might be picked up (Bishop Colenso for one) to show that it is often unprofitable work for the missionary society. Besides, if the people of America will not repent at the preaching of THE INDEX, neither will they turn from their bigotry though one returned from India. God bless all efforts to purify and elevate the standard of religious thought in our own land!

Good speed to your noble little paper! And when, through it and other liberating agencies, all the Book worship and superstition of this country shall be washed out, then we will form a foreign missionary society, have THE INDEX translated, and send it to those still more benighted Christian countries where Peter and Paul and Jesus first preached, and where Christianity has done its perfect work.

R—

P. S.—There is another large expense on which nothing has been said—that of sending the children of the missionaries home to be educated.

A young wife in Camden cured her husband of a disposition to absent himself from home at night by providing him with an excellent dinner, and saying to him afterwards, "George, if you find a sweeter spot than our home, describe it to me, and I will rival it if I die in the attempt." A kiss and a few tears completed the victory.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PARAPHRASES FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be so, "I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Arguments, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist, is appended, giving an account of an epic conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution? Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

THE INDEX.

90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO.

THEODORE PARKER'S WRITINGS.

NEW EDITION.

A DISCOURSE OF MATTERS PERTAINING TO RELIGION. Fourth Edition. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth. $1.50.
SERMONS OF THEISM, ATHEISM, AND THE POPULAR THEOLOGY. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth. $1.50.
ADDITIONAL SPEECHES, ADDRESSES, AND OCCASIONAL SERMONS. 2 vols. 12mo, cloth. $3.00.
SPEECHES, ADDRESSES, AND OCCASIONAL SERMONS. 3 vols. 12mo, cloth. $4.50.
HISTORIC AMERICANS.—Franklin, Washington, Adams, and Jefferson. With an introduction by Rev. O. B. Frothingham. $1.50.

THE TRIAL OF THEODORE PARKER for the Misdemeanor of a Speech in Faneuil Hall against Kildu uppin; with the Defence. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. $1.50.

THE TWO CHRISTMAS CELEBRATIONS.—A. D. I. and MDCCLVI. A Christmas Story. Square 16m, cloth. 60 cts.

A SERMON OF IMMORTAL LIFE. Pamphlet, 15 cts.

Sold by Booksellers, or mailed postpaid, on receipt of price, by

HORACE B. FULLER, Publisher,
14 Bromfield Street, Boston.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.
Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address

THE INDEX,
Drawer B, Toledo, Ohio.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
P. H. BATESON,
A. E. MACOMBER.

President.
Vice President.
Secretary.
Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ANA E. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN CONE, " "
EDWARD HINSELF, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
D. E. LOCKE,	"	"	Fifteen	1,500
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	"	1,500
C. COOK,	"	"	"	1,500
EDWARD HINSELF,	"	"	Forty	4,000
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	Ten	1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	"	1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	1,000
E. F. BARNETT,	"	"	"	1,000
H. E. HOWE,	"	"	Three	300
W. C. FIAT,	"	"	"	300
J. M. RITCHIE,	"	"	"	300
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	300
ALANSON WOOD,	"	"	Five	500
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	One	100
G. F. HOSKINSON,	"	"	"	100
JOS. E. MARX,	"	"	"	100
C. AUGER,	"	"	"	100
ASA E. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Five	500
GEORGE HOADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	Two	200
MISS A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	One	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Tonica,	Ill.,	"	100
J. SEDGWICK,	Palmer,	Mass.,	One	100
CARL POST,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	300
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	500
L. R. SUNDEN,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	100
J. L. WHITING,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	100
LOUIS BARNETT,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	100
J. E. SUTTON,	Olahe,	Kan.,	"	100
S. I. DUNKEE,	"	"	"	100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	Mass.,	Two	200
JON. F. BARNETT,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	200
E. W. WEIR,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	500
FRANK FRATHER,	Wellesley,	Mass.,	One	100
E. F. DUNMORE,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	200
J. T. DICKINSON,	Middlefield,	Mass.,	Fourteen,	1,400
W. J. POTTER,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three,	300
G. C. GLATTE,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	100
W. C. GANNETT,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	100
MISS M. C. FENNER,	"	"	One	100
MRS. S. EMMERSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	100
MISS E. EMMERSON,	"	"	"	100
W. H. DOWNER,	Birmingham,	Ala.,	"	100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing,	Mich.,	"	100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren,	Pa.,	"	100
W. C. RUSSELL,	Ithaca,	N. Y.,	"	100
W. E. CLARKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Three	300
C. L. SMITH,	"	"	One	100
J. N. LITMAN,	Cincinnati,	Ohio,	Twenty	2,000
L. G. FRIED,	Monroe Centre,	Pa.,	One	100
A. FOLSON,	Boston,	Mass.,	Three	300
L. O. BASS,	Colebrook,	Conn.,	One	100
S. E. SEWALL,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	500
ELLEN WHIT,	Detroit,	Mich.,	Twenty	2,000
E. B. WARD,	Dayton,	O.,	One	100
A. D. WILT,	Keokuk,	Iowa,	"	100
S. S. BAKER,	Peckskill,	N. Y.,	"	100
W. E. JONES,	Oskaloosa,	Iowa,	"	100
S. H. DARE,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	100
J. H. YORR,	"	"	"	100
JOS. HAYES,	"	"	"	100
G. P. FOLSON,	"	"	"	100
"A FRIEND,"	"	"	"	100
MRS. H. E. FENNER,	"	"	Two,	200
O.	Boston,	Mass.,	One,	100
WILLIAM GREEN,	Orange,	N. J.,	"	100
"A FRIEND,"	Lewell,	Mass.,	"	100
D. B. STEWART,	Brattleboro,	Vt.,	"	100
Mrs. F. W. CHRISTIAN,	New York, N. Y.,	"	"	100
C. W. FARRIST,	Kelley's Island, O.,	"	Two	200
EDW. M. DAVIS,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	"	One	100
Mrs. LUCRETIA MOTT,	"	"	"	100
MISS M. A. WRIGHT,	Jersey City, N. J.,	"	"	100
A. S. BROWN,	Worcester, Mass.,	"	"	100
EDWIN BROWN,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	500
R. P. HALLOWELL,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three	300
BENJ. RODMAN,	"	"	"	300
H. B. CLARKE,	"	"	Six	600
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo,	O.,	Ten	1,000
M. L. HOLMES,	Houlton,	Me.,	One	100
W. H. BOUGHTON,	New York,	N. Y.,	"	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	"	"	Two	200
E. G. BURNETT,	Webster,	Mass.,	"	200
J. E. POLLETT,	Winona,	Minn.,	One	100
JOS. WARRABER,	Newton,	N. J.,	"	100
T. M. LAKE,	Franklin,	Pa.,	"	100
W. H. DYKE,	Worcester,	Mass.,	"	100
W. H. SPALDING,	Prairie du Chien, Wis.,	"	"	100
LOUIS BELROSE,	Duluth,	Minn.,	"	100
LEWIS KUNTZ,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	"	Two	200
SAM'L WARRABER,	Augusta,	Kan.,	One	100
W. L. RAYNE,	La Fayette,	N. J.,	"	100
W. F. EMMERSON,	Amesbury,	Mass.,	"	100
C. H. HORACE,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	100
MISS J. THOMSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	Two	200
BENJ. HALLOWELL,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	"	One	100
Mrs. M. R. VAN RENSSLAER,	N. Y. City,	"	"	100
R. B. STONE,	Aberdeen,	Miss.,	"	100
W. M. ROYCE,	Fall River,	Mass.,	Two	200
Mrs. J. W. TAYLOR,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Five	500
S. U. ROPER,	Kerkonoon, N. Y.,	"	One	100
Mrs. R. D. FRANCIS,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	"	Two	200
CHAS. BONNALL,	Salem, N. Y.,	"	One	100
G. H. BRIGGS,	Amesbury, Mass.,	"	Two	200
J. T. CLARKSON,	"	"	"	200
C. W. NEWTON,	Castleton, Ill.,	"	One	100
ELIOT KENT,	Toledo,	O.,	One	100
OTTO KLEIN,	"	"	One	100
H. G. NEUBERT,	"	"	Two	200
A. BUNKERT,	"	"	One	100
TOLEDO PRINTING Co.,	Detroit, Mich.,	"	Thirty	3,000
T. K. PACK,	Co. Toledo, O.,	"	Thirty	3,000
"	Westminster, Ct.,	"	Two	200

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.
TOLEDO OFFICE NO. 90, ST. CLAIR ST.
NEW YORK OFFICE NO. 22, VESLEY ST.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two DOLLARS a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.
Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 75 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

LOCAL AGENTS.

HENRY H. RICHARDSON & Co., 22 Vesey St., New York.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, 96 Federal St., Boston.
PARKER PILLSBURY, Salem, Ohio.

GENERAL AGENTS.

A. K. BUTTS, New York City.
H. L. GREEN, Syracuse, N. Y.
L. BERRY, " "

Any person, acting as an agent for THE INDEX, may forward the names of NEW SUBSCRIBERS and retain Twenty per cent. of their SUBSCRIPTIONS.

All Letters and Communications to be addressed to
THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, O.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denison, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 25 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

THE ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORKSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (30 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's Essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (30 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

NEW TRACTS.

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

First Series, No. 1 to 20.

Second Series, Just Published—

1. Fausticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
2. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
3. Who Wrote It? a proper and useful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
4. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
5. Hear the other side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
6. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
7. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy liputation on the divine character.
8. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to our guides.
9. Justice and Love vs. Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
10. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
11. "Even as Others": showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelists" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
12. Do they really believe? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
13. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
14. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children; did God ever lose, can he lose, his children?
15. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
16. Do they really believe? its cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
17. The Boston Revival and its Leader: a method of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
18. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

EITHER SERIES 30 CENTS; BOTH 50 CENTS.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
19 Pinckney St., Boston.

PISTOLS, SHOT-GUNS, REVOLVERS, Gun Material. Write for Price List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents Wanted. [18-106.]

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 8) will be sent postpaid on receipt of fifty cents. These include "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham, and other equally valuable Tracts.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, JANUARY 13, 1872.

WHOLE No. 107.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARBET, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. PUTTICK, RICHARD P. HALLGREN, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOTKEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

(For THE INDEX.)

THE DEMANDS OF THE HEART.

A DISCOURSE BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

The impassioned psalmist whose words have passed into the worship of the nobler portion of the human race declared that heart and flesh cried out for a Living God. His rap soul did doubtless pant for the living God as the stag pants for the water-brooks. But can the same be said of all men, or of men in general? Some say "yes;" and some say "no." Some are positive that the religious sentiment belongs to all mankind; that the human heart everywhere, without reference to age, climate, race, or historical experience, has a natural hunger and thirst for the infinite and eternal. In evidence of this they appeal to the pious usages and traditions of all nations, to the priesthoods that have been ordained and venerated among all peoples; to the temples that have smiled or frowned in all lands; to the solemn rites which every nation under the sun has instituted in honor of its visible or invisible deities; to the hymns of praise and the litanies of worship which have gemmed the literature of every race; to the sacred books and oracles whereof we find the distinct trace wherever our investigations go; to vows and prayers by which the human heart has borne witness to the power of its aspiration, longing and trust, and to the oaths, the obligations, the sacred precepts, by which men have linked their mortal relations to the throne of the Supreme. This breath of holy feeling, they contend, has piled up the monuments that are conspicuous from all the ends of the earth, the everlasting monuments of adoration which continue to stand while all other buildings have perished. This evanescent breath has inspired the great psalms of David that have outlived imperial dynasties and dropped a living blessing on the graves of three thousand years. It is this that finds voice in the music that has pealed for centuries through the dim halls of Time, in the solemn masses and misereres, the noble "Te deums" and jubilant chants of the universal church. It has built the organ and fashioned tuneful pipes. It has fixed itself in Faiths which are but the penitent or grateful tears of the sensitive heart of man. The religious sentiment, eternal and fresh, is always growing beliefs and rituals, bibles and churches. Its forms of expression are various, its essence is one; its voices may change or be silent, but the spirit is never dumb. It adopts as true for all times and places the words of the psalmist: "Heart and flesh cry out for the Living God."

On the other hand there are those who contend that this is an immense exaggeration. The passion for God, they maintain, is not universal. It belongs to a few. There have been always, they say, a great many atheists in the world. We meet people continually who never felt the longing for the Infinite, who do not know what is meant by it, who do not so much as believe that it exists save as an artificial and unreal thing, born of ignorance and reared by priestcraft. Human nature as we know it, human life as we see it, they urge, gives no hint of this passionate yearning for God. Neither heart nor flesh cry out for him. They cry out for everything else first. Instead of building temples, men hardly keep in repair and use those that are built. Instead of ordaining priesthoods they quarrel with them and pull them down; instead of making fresh sacred books, they do not read or care to understand those they have inherited from antiquity; and so far from throwing out new and burning utterances of prayer, they simply repeat by rote with entire unconcern the prayers which a past generation has printed—undoubtedly themselves, rehearsing the words of King David. The world is full, we are told, of radical unbeliefs and denials. The spirit of skepticism and scorn is rife in all modern communities in proportion as the priesthoods will allow it to speak out. Men left to themselves, and at liberty to make a clean breast of their faiths and infidelities, have little hesitation in saying, as plainly as habits and lives can say it, that they have no need of a living God. They may assent as matter of course, or as matter of courtesy, to the assertion of his existence. They may, from long habit, acknowledge in some vague manner his providence. But they do not pretend to say that they could not perfectly well, as far as they personally are concerned, get along without him. Are business men sensible of a crying need of the Infinite and the Supreme? May not all they hunger and thirst for be obtained considerably short of the Eternal? Do intellectual men pant for God as the hart panteth for the water-brooks? Do people of fashion, men and women of the world, have this unquenchable yearning for the fountain of all Truth and Good? Do the working people whose heart is oppressed by care, and whose flesh is worn with toil, sigh and languish for the bread and water of life? Is there anything in the counting-room of the merchant, the office of the editor, the shop of the trader, the wareroom of the manufacturer, the library of the scholar, the studio of the artist, the bureau of the statesman or the financier, the laboratory of the chemist, the show-room of the milliner, or the parlor of the lady, that suggests the Holy Spirit or impels a man to drop upon the floor and pray? What hoarse cry for the present and immanent God ascends from these places where heart and flesh daily puff themselves up or wear themselves away? Curses and blasphemings there are in abundance; words of hate and scorn; very few prayers. The name of Satan is oftener invoked than the name of Deity. Idols enough there are; but they are such idols as the princes were found bending to in the dark, and which suggest anything but divinity.

How shall we judge between these two opposite assertions—both so emphatically made—both so earnestly and plausibly sustained? Must we decide between them, adopting one and rejecting the other? May we not seek some way of reconciling and retaining both?

I wish, in this discourse, to throw out a single suggestion which may, perhaps, contribute towards the solution of the long-voiced problem. The suggestion I would make is this: That one of the classes referred to makes its appeal to human Nature, or to man as he is constituted in the essential elements and interior principles of his being; the other makes appeal to human Character, or to man as he appears under the influence of his temporal condition, as shaped by circumstances, and warped by the interests of common life. Human nature is one thing; human character is another. Human nature finds very imperfect expression in the human character of any particular time or people. Human character exhibits but very little of what permanently belongs to human nature. Human nature may have wants of which a great many men and women are unconscious. Multitudes of men and women may have wants, absorbing if not deep, which human nature would hardly recognize. Orders of people, classes of people, tribes of people, may be sensible of needs that clamor outrageously for satisfaction which human nature would summarily dismiss. We think we need velvet carpets, draperies of foreign cloth, cushions of brocatelle, furniture of walnut and cherry, frescoed walls, and painted ceilings; but we could live without such things perfectly well and be just as happy without them, if our neighbors' possession of them did not make us envious. And there is no man of the least dignity or worth who does not know that he has in him a capacity for satisfaction which all the gew-gaws of the world can only counterfeit. Human nature may be crying out for the living God, while the men and women who are such miserable exponents of human nature, such pitiful burlesques of it, are crying out for satin and broadcloth. Human nature may be testifying profoundly to its faith in a living God, while men and women, as we see them, are bearing witness to their conviction that God is dead. The best way, indeed the only way to discover what are the essential beliefs of man would be to go at once to human nature and ascertain its permanent and constant needs. Find out what heart and flesh do cry out for, and you will find what they have; you will come at the radical beliefs of mankind.

This is an exceedingly difficult thing to do, for human nature lies deeply buried beneath layers of opinion, custom and observance, which it is perhaps impossible to dig through, or clear away. Men and women are full of acquired tastes which can hardly be distinguished from natural ones; the surface of their life is covered with artificial wants that pass for genuine, and that clamor for satisfaction with a noisy eagerness that drowns all deeper pleading. They have been pampered so long that they claim a primary gratification, and are furious if they are not indulged. Just as the appetite may become dissatisfied with plain food, and crave a variety of highly seasoned dishes, and in place of pure water from the spring may insist on the necessity of delicate wines from Germany and France; so the heart becomes dissatisfied with the simple nourishment that would make it sound, sweet and happy, and cannot rest till it has a store of rich delights, aromatic observances, scented beliefs, highly spiced hopes, intoxicating comforts, pledges and promises of foreign growth and costly purchase. It cries like a spoiled child if its luxuries are refused; it is ready to break if its air castles are blown down by the storm-winds of Providence. When its fine glass shivers in its cabinet, and its lace is torn on the fringes of its garment, it complains of destiny, and whines out a denial of God. Its prayer, it whimpers, is disregarded; its desires are unheeded; its divinely prompted hopes are blasted. But as nature does not guarantee to mankind the gratification of every passing desire; as expensive luxuries are not to be had for the asking; as humanity's board is not supplied with daily partridges and champagne, but only with daily bread and water; as humanity's rooms are not furnished with satin and ormolu, but with hard benches and deal floors; so God does not pledge himself to pamper the unnatural desires of this foolish and luxurious heart of ours. It does not need the fine glass or the castles in the air; it does not need the aromatic observances, or the scented beliefs, or the highly spiced hopes; and it is for our needs, not for our wishes, that God promises the supply. God calls us men and women—not ladies and gentlemen. Still these artificial wants exist; they are very earnest in their demands; they pass for real; they pass for the only real wants there are; it is indeed next to impossible to put them aside; and it is all but absolutely impossible to bring out into distinct recognition the essential wants which lie beneath them. Men have always preferred entertaining fancies about human nature and its needs to studying the truth about human nature and its needs. It is more than suspected that "religious" people, so-called, have done a good deal to manufacture spiritual wants for the sake of supplying them. They wanted to make a market for their goods, and consequently devoted themselves diligently to the cultivation of the tastes that would make the goods seem desirable. There were certain beliefs imported at great expense; some of them from Greece, some from the mystic Persia, some from ancient Egypt, some from India, others from Palestine. They are the best products of those famous lands; their material is the finest; their workmanship is the most elaborate and finished. Good judges of such things pronounce them perfect in their kind. Men like Jerome, Athanasius, Augustine, and a great many wise and good people beside, competent judges of their merits, have written down their opinion of them in learned books, and have commended them to all believers. We warrant them the genuine article, and in good condition. Here are fine speculations about deity and angels; here are neat theories about Providence; daintily fashioned opinions respecting man, his nature, fall and redemption; wonderful doctrines of destiny, here and hereafter. We offer you the black dogma of depravity and the crimson creed of atonement, the gorgeous fabric of Trinity, praised in all lands, and the airy manufacture of the God-man held sacred in East and West.

For ages now, those wares have been offered to the human soul and the venders of them have been doing their best to create a desire and a need for them. The chief office of the priesthood has been to these latter days not so much to meet an existing want as to manufacture a want for an existent supply. Did the garment woven for the mind prove a misfit? The fault was not in the garment, it was in the man who tried it on. Did the food fail to find an appetite? The appetite must be created. Did the natural taste revolt at the furniture? The natural taste must be corrected. Does human nature refuse to confess its essential blackness and its radical alienation from holy things? Is it slow to allow its dread of the divine wrath, and its need of a sacrificial redeemer to do for it what it had no power to do for itself? Is it reluctant to fling itself down in a spasm of contrition, to acknowledge its need of miraculous renewal and change? Does it insist on the soundness of its own constitution, the worth of its affections, the rectitude of its tendencies, the wholesomeness of its organic wants? All this must be changed. Human nature is childish and stubborn; it is crooked, wicked, sick. Its notions of what will make it comfortable and happy are exceedingly crude. The heart must be educated to a knowledge of what it requires, and then it will devour greedily what now it so impatiently rejects. And so the poor heart has been dealt with and labored with—tutored and disciplined, catechised and experimented on till it scarcely knows what it does want; or if it knows, is afraid to tell. It can hardly distinguish between its natural tastes and its acquired ones; finds it hard to say what is meat and what is medicine, and discovers that its first and its second nature are so mingled and confused together that it quite despairs of saying what its original needs are; whether it requires one thing or another; whether it wants all, or wants nothing.

When religious people talk about human nature, the natural heart, they mean human nature under this artificial aspect; the human heart as they have made it, by their system of discipline. When they say, "human nature requires this or that," they mean that it ought to require this or that; or that it requires this or that under such conditions and circumstances. And men have been so long accustomed to take human nature at the priest's estimate, that the assertion goes unquestioned. Human nature, we are incessantly informed, needs absolute creeds and authoritative dogmas. Human nature needs vast religious establishments. Human nature needs priest-hoods and altars and sacrificial rites. Human nature needs a belief in Trinity, in Atonement, in the deity of Christ, in Perdition, in an everlasting Hell. Human nature needs religious pomp and pride and display. All this means merely that men and women have been accustomed to such things till they think they cannot do without them. Let their ability to do without them be tried, and it would be soon discovered whether they were necessities of human nature or not. It is very certain that men and women have succeeded in living strongly, virtuously and contentedly, without any of the things deemed thus vitally essential. The Mohammedans lived, spread, flourished without altar, priesthood, ministry or public prayer. The Hebrews, most religious of nations, lived and flourished for centuries, without any definite belief in immortality. All Protestants contrive to live and multiply and gain in civil dignity and virtue, without those special beliefs and practices which the Romish Church considers as indispensable to a right, safe and happy existence.

All liberal Protestants, and they are an immense company, Unitarians, Universalists, Swedenborgians and others fling away the substance of every single thing which the Orthodox Protestants affirm to be necessary to meet the needs of human nature; yet these people exist; they do not dress in sackcloth, or sit in ashes; they do not go about the earth like people who have no friends; they seem to have all the mental and spiritual food that they require; they are equal to their place and work.

The liberals of the liberals, whom people call rationalists, naturalists, sometimes by harder names, undertake to dispense with some things which their more conservative fellows rigidly insist on as primary, universal and ineradicable needs of human nature; but they are able to get on without them; and so far as appears, they have all they need. At all events they do not betray any consciousness of not having it; they are not sensible of an aching void in their bosoms; they do not move about like the men in the hall of Eblis, each with his hand pressed on his heart, to keep down an undying pain. Who shall say then what human nature needs and what it does not? We cannot know till we get into its principles, and those are veiled from sight.

In old times, when books were written on parchment, and parchment was excessively dear, it was customary to use the same parchment again and again, and for very different kinds of writing. Manuscripts would take on several layers of ink. The scroll on which some fine genius had written his poem, might fall into the hands of a stupid monk who would cover it carefully with his silly legends of Saint Madonna. Then a theologian might find it and indite thereon his doctrinal treatise; a ballad singer perhaps would scrawl over it his rigmorale verses; so that, in course of time, the original masterpiece was completely buried and lost. Some of the most interesting works of antiquity have been discovered and brought to light by the removal of sundry such layers of rubbish.

Much like such ancient scrolls are these human hearts of ours. We read them hastily, and they tell some passionate story of love or hate, of hope or fear, of longing or apprehension; we study them more deeply and we decipher a silly legend of superstition, a foolish romance of piety, a sad record of credulity or bigotry. We erase all this as well as we can, we use the microscope to bring out the faded lines of the earlier chirography, we hold the parchment up against the sun or the white flame of the spirit lamp, and slowly, point by point, curve after curve, comes out the original word inscribed by the finger of the Eternal on the living tablets. There it is, the Word, the original word revealed at last.

I am not so presumptuous as to pretend to say just what this word is. Nobody may say yet precisely what it is. The scroll has not been fully deciphered yet, as it will be at some future day. He would be a very audacious man who should undertake to declare the ultimate and essential needs of the heart. But let me announce one of them; not the only one, probably, but I believe the most fundamental one; the central need, if we may so call it, and I have no better way of expressing it than by using the words of this old Hebrew poet. "Heart and Flesh cry out for the Living God." Not for a dead God, not for a God of tradition and memory; not for a God whose revelations are confined to the Past; not for a dogma about God; not for a theological or a metaphysical God; not for a mechanical or an ecclesiastical God; neither heart nor flesh cries out very loudly for this. But for a real God. I believe there is this deep and imploring cry for a God who means something, who stands for something, who is something; a God who works and blesses and inspires continually is a fixed demand of human nature; a God who fulfils the requirements of Deity, not by letting his name appear on a creed, but by letting his life flow into and through the world, always has been, and is more than ever now, the necessity of mankind.

Christianity in its better hours tried to meet this demand and has been honored and loved for its effort. Nay, Christianity grew out of an endeavor to meet this demand. "My Father is always at work, and so am I," said Jesus. "I and my Father are one." "If ye have seen me, ye have seen the Father." That there is a vast deal of atheism in the world I admit; atheism of the Head, atheism of the Conscience, atheism of the Spirit, yes, and atheism of the Heart. There are multitudes who disbelieve in God all over, and with all their disbelieving power. But I always feel that the reason they disbelieve is that they want a living God, and have not been shown him. They cry out for him. They will have nothing else. They reject all other, and the impatience of their rejection is measured by the intensity of their desire—"Show us the Father," they cry, "and we are content."

But how can the Living God be shown? It is not easy even to speak of him. What shall we say he is? The Living God! Of course I do not mean simply a God who is not dead—a God who is alive somewhere to-day; of course I do not mean merely a God who presides over the material universe, who uses the elements as his ministers, and its laws as his working force; a God who flames in the empyrean, and lurks in the abyss; who smiles in the sunlight and weeps in the rain; who sits upon the mountaintops, and lets his providence trickle down into the ground. I do not mean a God who lives in Nature merely, however grandly, sweetly, tenderly, entirely, he may live in it; I do not mean a God whose significance is exhausted or conveyed by the word Force, Law, Element. Nature, if she had a voice, might call this the living God, for he is a God who lives her life; but man cannot. The life of Nature is not our life; the Spirit of Nature is not our spirit; the God of Nature is not our God; the God of the Mountain and the Storm cannot touch our consciousness; the Soul of the Elements cannot be in communion with our soul.

By a Living God I mean a God who lives my life; whose life is in concurrence with mine; who works with my working, feels with my feeling, mingles with my relations, and is concerned in the operations of my existence. I mean a God who lives in and among and with his human creatures; a social God, if I may venture to call him so; that is, a God who adopts human society as the object of his interest, the field of his operations, the subject of his kindness. I deeply believe that heart and flesh cry out for this. Heart and flesh cry out for a God, whose every attribute is woven in with the ties which bind each man to his neighbor, and make all destinies to be at bottom the same; whose power is pledged to the strengthening of every human bond, and to the more compact knitting of all human interests; whose justice is committed to every noble work of civil, social and political reform; whose truth has something at stake in the advance and spread of human knowledge; whose wisdom plans in the wisest human counsel; whose care watches in the tenderest human regard; whose mercy weeps with those that bewail human misery, and smiles with those who labor to relieve it; who makes every worthy cause his own, and adopts the workers in it as his friends.

Am I speaking too much in pulpit fashion? How can I speak differently? When I say that "Heart and Flesh cry out for the Living God," I mean just this—that heart and flesh cry out for human sympathy and the noblest plane and takes nothing else as the suitable expression of the Divine. Man's justice is only God's justice; man's kindness is God's kindness; man's compassion is God's compassion; and no other justice, kindness or compassion will be accepted as divine, or as a substitute for this. There is no unity of God so long as men are divided by hates. There is no love of God while men make of each other a prey. Man's forgiveness is God's forgiveness; man's absolution is God's absolution. God's heaven is realized in brotherly kindness; God's hell in unbrotherly indifference and violence. We cannot help feeling that, if God is to be anything to us at all, he must be human to us; he must not be something above humanity, or outside of humanity, but something in humanity, as far as humanity can receive and express it; and if human society does not manifest him, then he stands unmanifested and there is no power that can make him real to us. The atheisms of mankind keep even pace with the unfeelingness of mankind, and God begins to live when men begin to love.

In all my acquaintance with men, I have found this true: What they want, what they cry out for, is the HUMAN MAN, man's recognition, man's praise, man's approval, man's co-operation, man's compassion, man's grasp of the hand, and smile of the eye, and loving speech of the lips; and, having this, they are satisfied; they feel that they have God. This is no heresy; it is most orthodox faith. The incarnation expresses the heart's cry for a human God. The great thinkers of Christendom say, and always have said: "You cannot see God; you cannot know him as he is; you cannot know anything about him as he is. You should not even pray to him; he is too high for that; but here is Jesus; let him be a God to you; love him; get him close to you; tell out your soul to him; pray to him. If he blesses you, God blesses; if he absolves you, God absolves; if he is brother to you, God is brother." And men believed it; clinging to that form, they felt as if they were clinging to the Eternal; confessing their sins to him, they went away with lightened bosom, and sure of having forgiveness; touching his right hand with their faith, they were lifted up as by the arm of Jehovah; hearing him say, "weep not," they were comforted to the very core of their souls; thinking of him as pitying their condition, commiserating their sorrow, advocating their cause, they were persuaded that the Lord of all the Universe was on their side. He was "Emanuel"—God with them. "How could we venture to draw nigh to God if he was passionless?" writes St. Bernard. "He suffered, in order to learn fellow suffering."

But the incarnation was made to defeat itself. It meant belief in man, joy for his heart, promise for his soul, gladness to his existence, honor for his life, pledge for his endeavor, fruition for his love, reward for his earnestness, satisfaction for his need, rest for his restlessness. It meant the consecration of his earth, the sweetening of his social relations, the lifting of his burdens, the abolition of his death. It came in time to mean just the reverse of this. It is a singular circumstance, that simultaneous with the process of deifying Jesus was the process of demonizing man. The doctrine of human depravity keeps even pace with the doctrine of Christ's divinity. As he goes up to the skies, humanity goes down to the under-world. The sweetness of the human goes away with him; its hardness and sadness remain. In this practical aspect the belief in the godhead of Jesus has been a disastrous thing for Christendom. It is one thing to say that God is human; it is quite another thing to say that one human individual is God. The first saying brings the eternal powers down into humanity—charges the heart with unutterable love and longing, and promises a heaven on earth; the second saying announces that the human creature who is perfectly lovely and adorable is no human creature at all—that men must humiliate themselves before him, and pray to be taken out of their earth into his kingdom. The fact of the incarnation identified the divine with the human; the dogma of the incarnation separates the human from the divine.

What have we to do then, in order to recover the lost significance of the great fact, but to extend and apply the great thought it planted! If the deification of God to humanity implies the elevation of man to divinity; if Augustine is right in saying "God became man in order that man might become God," if Luther is right in saying "we are honored above all creatures, even the angels, since we can boast with truth that our own flesh and blood sits at the right hand of God and rules there; the incarnation is an oven which fuses us all together into one heart," then for the single ideal man we have but to substitute real men and women, and for an imaginary relation a real relation; instead of finding God in Jesus through faith, we are to find him in the noble and good about us by actual acquaintance; find him in numbers of men, in masses of men, through fair and honest dealing; find him in the constitution of society, through honorable commerce, just legislation, humane systems and habits.

In any natural and direct way satisfy this deep need for human sympathy, not on the plane of emotion, but on the plane of truth, justice and manly worth, and you satisfy all other needs. If there be a need for faith in Providence, it will satisfy that; if there be a need for faith in immortality, it will satisfy that; if there be a need for a great hope, a high inspiration, a noble aim for endeavor, it will satisfy that; if there be need for special cheer or consolation, or patience, or joy, it will satisfy that. For if it be indeed true that heart and flesh cry out for such a living God as this, the cry will be answered; the eternal powers will be found living with us. Heavenly homes will be found hidden within these earthly ones; angels will be detected under these perishing forms of flesh; a celestial kindred will disclose itself in these bonds of human relationship; flowers of Paradise will be discovered sleeping in the sods beneath our feet; and human brotherhood will insure the present grace and light of the Eternal.

The town of Kittery, Me., with a population of about 3500, and seven hundred voters, has seven churches, one for every one hundred voters. About $7000 are annually expended for the support of these churches, and only $3000 for its schools.

He who begins by loving Christianity better than truth, will proceed by loving his own sect or church better than Christianity, and end by loving himself better than all.—Coleridge.

A SCIENTIFIC CONVERT TO FREE RELIGION.

[From the New York World of Dec. 29, 1871.]

The Toledo INDEX of December 23 contains the very remarkable announcement that Mr. Charles Darwin had, after mature consideration, allowed the fact to be published that he indorsed "almost every word" of the principles of free religion as developed by Mr. Francis E. Abbot, editor of that sheet. The "Truths for the Times," the title of the little work which the great naturalist so unqualifiedly accepts, was constructed by Mr. Abbot as the necessary upshot of religious thought in the present day, the germ of it being found in a lecture delivered in Boston last spring which was duly reported in THE WORLD. After a careful reading of these so-called "Truths," the most striking thing in the whole affair is that so keen an observer and so acute a systematizer as Mr. Darwin should commit himself to such vague statements as many of them are.

But our surprise must not allow us to disguise the importance of the admission which the free religious movement has thus obtained, nor the further and still more important fact that that movement has not only negations to offer, but that it has affirmations also. The "Fifty Affirmations" which are given as the groundwork of this faith, and the "Modern Principles" which form a synopsis of it, contain hardly a reference to God. Science knows nothing of deity, and free religion is the willing recipient of the scientific dictum. Religion is treated as an historical growth of the human mind, and Christ is assimilated as the founder of a great creed to Buddha and Mahomet. It holds that Catholicism is not a corruption of Christianity, but that it is theology in its most highly developed form as a "religion of authority based on the Christian confession," and that "Protestantism is the gradual disintegration of it." Though there is nothing very new in this statement—it has been held in France for forty years at least—the fact that when stated it makes such a convert as Mr. Darwin is surprising.

That the great naturalist was not a believer in the current theology was very evident to those who had read his books, but that his belief had crystallized into any definite form was what few thought. Every one is now undeceived, and the thick and thin opponents of his system will be sure to plume themselves on their own superior penetration, while his Christian supporters will be left to take such a stand as they think becoming to them. With all respect for Mr. Darwin, who is a great thinker, and without discussing the religious question which his indorsement of "Truths for the Times" renders for the moment prominent, we hardly think that these "affirmations" or "principles" are special enough or definite enough to form the groundwork of a religion, be it ever so narrow.

We have instanced the fact that God is ignored in them, but the position of the free religionist is not made clear in this respect. Can he believe in deity if he likes and disbelieve if he does not like? Or is he, like the Comtist, to say he knows nothing on the subject, and therefore does not bother his head with it, as he has much better things to do? Faith in human nature instead of faith in Jesus Christ may mean much, but it does not tell the world clearly in which of these categories Mr. Abbot and his adherents stand. Nor yet does this "credo" tell us whether they believe in a future state of rewards and punishments or not. This is a very grave omission; for if this great doctrine, one of the corner-stones of Christianity as a moral and political system, be swept away, one is anxious to know what is to take its place. What machinery is the free religionist going to invent that will have the same salutary effect in deterring from crime as did this dogma of the church? But if immortality is believed in, it is a matter of importance even to the outsider and critic that it should be known; for if it is, this scheme is fatally defective in not indicating the preparations to be made for a future state of existence.

MR. BEECHER'S RADICALISM.

[Extract from a sermon by Henry Ward Beecher on "The True Religion," published in the Boston Daily Traveller of Dec. 1, 1871.]

The apostles gave to the world a few elementary truths, and men have taken them, and scoured them, and carded them, and spun them, and woven them, and cut them up, and put them into priests' garments, and deacons' garments, and all sorts of garments; and now they are quarrelling over the "faith which was once delivered to the saints." As if the doctrines which they hold would be recognized by those to whom they are ascribed! There is many a doctrine that is called Pantheistic theology, of which Paul, if it were presented to him, would say, "What stuff is this?" And I think there are very few churches on earth at present that Christ could be made a member of. The qualifications of most of them are, I think, such as would exclude him from membership in them. And men differ and are contending and are filled with violence and temper, on account of the various claims which they have set up. And they go so far that they have not a spirit of true Christian charity. Having received the benediction of the Holy Ghost, and having proved themselves to be lineal successors of the apostles who were appointed by the Lord Jesus Christ himself, and were his representatives, they have shown this spirit of love by burning men up, by throwing them into prisons, and by making them wear chains all their lives. I believe that, much as has been the joy that has been made in this world, more has been the misery that has been made by men who represented religion and called the church the Church of God. The tears have been ocean-deep, and the anguish has been heaven-high; and no historian's pen can ever compass that story of divine anguish. One single monarch—Philip II. of Spain—slew in one nation more than eighty thousand men, and went avowedly to cut off every man, woman and child in the Netherlands. For the sake of his faith he would not have hesitated to devastate the globe. While the Mahomedans were thundering at the gates of Eastern European capitals to propagate their faith, we were thundering back from the West to propagate our faith. The cannon, the spear and the dungeon have for hundreds of years been occupying a very large portion of the time of those that called themselves the descendants of the Lord Jesus Christ.

Now, we have been engaged in this kind of persecution. If a man does not believe just as we do, how sweet soever his life may be, however pure and gentle and large he may be, however much his conduct may be characterized by the spirit of love, if we know that he sets aside the articles of the church, and does not believe in them, that ends it. We put doctrine against love. Though a man has all love, if he has not doctrine, we reject him. Whereas, if there is one thing that is unquestionable, it is that the only thing that doctrine is good for is to make the life what it should be.

And yet the vast system of man-made doctrines, and the vast refine of services, and the vast organizations of the church, have not tended, in the main, to produce gentleness, and peace, and love, and beneficence. On the contrary, they have tended to produce enmities, and jealousies, and conflicts, and cruelties unutterable. And the practice of the Church of Christ on earth for a thousand years has been simply infernal. I know what I say. I speak no hasty words. I declare that through long periods the characteristic actions of the organized external church of the Lord Jesus Christ have better befitted the administration of devils than of men. This externality, with all its pretence of authenticity, apostolicity and traditional regularity, is continually vaunted and held up. And when men say what I have said, and what I say again, and what I will testify to so long as the breath of life is in me, that the spirit of Christ is love; and that he who truly loves God and men is a Christian, no matter in what church he is found, nor in what circumstances he is placed, men say, "You are knocking the foundation out from under things." In other words, the world has taken up the instruments of religion itself, and preferred the instruments.

NAMES WANTED!

The following petition is now circulating throughout the country by the "National Association," for the purpose of committing the United States government to the creed of Evangelical Christianity:

PETITION.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress Assembled:

We, citizens of the United States, respectfully ask your honorable bodies to adopt measures for amending the Constitution of the United States so as to read, in substance, as follows:

"We, the people of the United States, humbly acknowledging Almighty God as the source of all authority and power in civil government, the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the Nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority, in order to constitute a Christian Government, and in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, ensure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare, and secure the inalienable rights and blessings of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness to ourselves, our posterity, and all the inhabitants of the land, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America."

And we further ask that such changes be introduced into the body of the Constitution as may be necessary to give effect to these amendments in the preamble.

The following counter-petition is now open for signature at THE INDEX Office in Toledo. It will be forwarded to Congress as soon as the proper time shall arrive:—

COUNTER-PETITION.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully and earnestly ask your honorable bodies to preserve inviolate the great guarantee of religious liberty now contained in the Constitution of the United States, and to dissmile all petitions asking you to adopt measures for amending said Constitution by incorporating in it a recognition of "God as the source of all authority and power in civil government," and of "the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the Nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority." We protest against such proposed amendments as an attempt to revolutionize the government of the United States, and to overthrow the great principles of complete religious liberty and the complete separation of Church and State on which it was established by its original founders.

Send your own name, and as many other names as possible, authorizing me to append them to the above counter-petition. Roll up the list to thousands and tens of thousands of names. Let such a protest be heard as shall put a speedy end to this fanatical attempt to subvert the fundamental principles of this free republic. Address

FRANCIS F. ABBOT,

Editor of THE INDEX,

Toledo, O.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I feel well pleased with the manner in which THE INDEX has been conducted the past year; and I trust that success will crown your efforts. I would be glad to give you more aid for THE INDEX, but I am in feeble health and have but little of this world's goods. The papers received the past year have been read and all distributed among friends of a liberal mind. I have also purchased and circulated some of Frothingham's sermons, and tracts published by the Liberal Tract Society. The majority of people in this town take but little interest in religious matters. And the few that are interested are so completely psychologized by 'orthodoxy' that they will not read Liberal publications. I was formerly a member of the 'Campbellite' Church in this place; but I took to reading the writings of Theodore Parker, O. B. Frothingham, and some books on the evidences of Christianity, and I soon found that I could no longer believe in Bible infallibility nor retain my position in the Church. I therefore sent a letter to the elders, stating frankly my change of belief and the causes that led to it; and I further requested that my name be stricken from the church-roll and I no longer be considered a member. I heard that the letter was received, but neither the minister nor the elders have said a word to me about the subject from that day to this. (This happened some four years ago.) It was immediately reported that I had become a Spiritualist; and soon after I received a tract entitled 'Spiritualism Self-Condemned.' In return I sent to the minister Finney's pamphlet on the Bible; and have occasionally sent him a copy of THE RADICAL, and am now sending THE INDEX. I hear that he reads them, but he never had a word of conversation with me about them. The Church refused to turn me out and claims that I have no right to withdraw my membership. Thus the matter stands."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the OGDON, in the NEW EXPRESS BUILDING on St. Clair Street, opposite the WHEELER OPERA HOUSE, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

SOCIAL RE-UNION.—Members and friends of the First Independent Society are invited to meet at the residence of Mrs. A. L. WIRTH, on Summit street, Wednesday Evening, Jan. 17.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Quash receipts for the week ending Jan. 6th.—A. P. Hules, $2; D. Branson, $10; Wm. F. Heikes, $1; D. Crall, $2; E. W. Gunn, 60 cts.; N. S. Townsend, $2; John Benham, $2; J. M. P. Batchelder, $7; Mrs. A. J. Pancoater, $3; J. E. Sulton, $2; A. L. Munroe, $2; Miss H. M. Hastings, $2; A. J. Griffin, $2.50; Mrs. M. N. Adams, $2.50; Eliza Wright, $2; A. Hall, $2; John J. Chandler, $2.50; Orlando Davis, $2; Alfred E. Giles, $2; E. T. Billings, $2; H. D. Howe, $2; H. L. Holloway, $2; E. H. Minor, $2; C. W. Newton, 75 cts.; S. Wabbase, $2; Asa Rye, $1; Buckiel Walker, $2.10; C. C. Sloan, $2; E. Chapman, $2; Morgan Devoe, $2; Henry Blanchard, $2; G. H. Briggs, $2.40; E. Marston, $2; Alf. J. Wolf, $2; S. H. Morse, $3; W. E. Lukins, $2.40; David Porter, $1.50; J. H. Cook, $2; T. M. Cook, $2; Henry Root, $2; Samuel Cook, $2.10; Rev. O. K. Crosby, $1; Thos. McClinton, 10 cts.; E. H. Wicks, $2.50; John Hoffman, $2; Kate Harrington, $2; Geo. P. Thayer, $2; S. E. Milliken, $2; John Gardner, $2; John Cowan, $2; Geo. S. Winslow, $2; N. P. Hollowell, $4; G. N. Jennings, 35 cts.; Wm. Russell, $12; H. Paiphlamand, $1; Sophia B. Carter, $2; Morgan W. Ayers, 10 cts.; W. W. Moore, $1.15; L. D. Warren, $2; L. E. Goodwin, $2; T. V. Leslie, $2; Charles T. Fowler, $1 cts.; J. L. Miller, $2; C. Bonvall, $2.10; R. C. Spencer, $1; W. P. Ewing, $1; Dyer D. Lum, $2; Sarah B. Berry, $2; J. H. Williams, $2; J. H. Lull, $2; Eliza A. Rabbitt, 50 cts.; Geo. Soule, $2; Miss Clara F. Sheldon, $2; C. Cowling, $2; A. M. Haskell, $2; J. N. Osborn, 35 cts.; E. F. Robbins, $5.00; Mrs. Bell Hardy, $2; Toledo Printing Co., $20; P. H. Bateson, $10; J. R. Fletcher, $2; J. F. Olney, $2; Mary A. Brown, $2; S. Griffiths Morgan, $1; J. B. Watkins, $2; Rev. Robert McLeod, $2; Rev. H. M. Hodges, $2; R. F. Binkedell, $1; J. J. Nichols, $8; E. W. Dickinson, $2; F. Bradley, $2; J. Frasier, $2; J. T. Brady, $2; M. P. M. Cassidy, $2; Geo. Adams, $2; J. T. Dickins, $2; Rev. C. A. Bartol, $2; Jas. Fisher, M. D., $2; A. H. Wimshish, $2; Rev. J. D. Croftsant, $2; Jacob Hoffman, $2.50; C. H. Lord, $2; L. O. Ross, $10.50; S. E. Dorr, $2; Mrs. S. H. Whittemore, $2; C. H. Lunt, $2; Mrs. J. R. Williams, $2.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand, will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

RECEIVED.

GOD IS SPIRIT. A Sermon by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached at Lyric Hall, New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871.

THE OVERBULGING GOD. A Sermon by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, Nov. 12, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871.

THE SCHOOL OF ADVERSITY. A Sermon by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, Nov. 19, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871.

CHRISTMAS EVE. A Sermon by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached in Lyric Hall, Dec. 24, 1871. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1871.

THE YEAR-BOOK OF THE UNITARIAN CONGREGATIONAL CHURCHES FOR 1872. With Calendar adapted for use throughout the country. Boston: AMERICAN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION, 42 CHURCH ST.

HAND-BOOK OF RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION. Part First: The History of Religion. Part Second: The Christian Religion. Translated from the Dutch of J. H. MAROVIEUX, by FRANCIS T. WASHINGTON. Boston: UNITARIAN SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY, 42 CHURCH ST. 1872.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. JANUARY, 1872. Edited by Mrs. M. CORA BLAND. Indianapolis. $1.50 a Year.

THE SCHOOL LABORATORY OF PHYSICAL SCIENCE. Edited by Prof. GUSTAVUS HYNGERUS. Published Quarterly by the Editor. Iowa City, Iowa: GROSS, WATSON & DAY, PRINTERS, Davenport. $1.00 a Year.

Poetry.

DEVOTION.

Devoutly look, and naught
But wonders shall pass by thee;
Devoutly read, and then
All books shall edify thee;
Devoutly speak, and men
Devoutly listen to thee;
Devoutly act, and then
The strength of God acts through thee.

RUCKERT, Wisdom of the Brahmin.

The Index.

JANUARY 18, 1872.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 26, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED ON LAST PAGE, FIVE HUNDRED SHARES, $50,000
THOMAS MUMFORD, New Harmony, Ind.	One	100
D. AZEBA, Jr., Brooklyn, N. Y.	"	100
MRS. L. E. BLOUNT, Evansville, Ind.	"	100
Defiance, O.	"	100
Bryan, O.	"	100
J. T. BRADY, Sabetha, Kan.	"	100
Northampton, Mass.	"	100
Cincinnati, O.	"	100
MAX PHAOGY, Boston, Mass.	"	100
O—, Toledo, O.	"	100
H. HETEMANN, Zanesfield, O.	"	100
C. FOLSON, Palmyra, Mo.	"	100
S. C. EASTMAN, Indianapolis, Ind.	"	100
J. O. MARTIN, Mich.	"	100
L. T. IVES, Detroit, Mich.	Two	200
E. W. MEDDAUGH, Boston, Mass.	"	200
A. FOLSON, Dayton, O.	"	200
W. F. HEIKES, Sus'n Bridge, N. Y.	One	100
HIRSH COIT, Samuel Coit, Worcester, Mass.	Two	200
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass.	Two	200
		$52,400

PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN.

In response to our invitation to become an editorial contributor to THE INDEX, we have just received a very sympathetic letter from Prof. Francis W. Newman, of England, the distinguished author of the "History of the Hebrew Monarchy," "Theism," "The Soul," "Phases of Faith," and numerous other works. Being out of his usual health, and also suffering from the effects of excessive use of his right hand in writing, Prof. Newman somewhat hesitates to promise articles for our columns. But, enclosing a lecture in pamphlet form, and very kindly stating that he will forward others, he says (the italics are his):—"You have inserted one long piece from my pen, that on the 'True Temptation of Jesus.' Possibly you might choose to reprint some others, and may thus make good to your readers the statement that I have consented to be one of your writers. I permit you to make this announcement, if you think you can do it in good faith; understanding that I will write for you if I can."

The requirements of good faith seem to be met by stating Prof. Newman's qualified acceptance of our invitation in his own words. We should not feel justified in placing his name with those of the other editorial contributors to THE INDEX simply because he forwards for our use his previously printed papers; but the strong sympathy his letter expresses for the cause to which THE INDEX is devoted convinces us that during the year he will send us more or less original matter. Even an occasional letter from his pen on the great questions of the age would be eagerly welcomed by the multitudes who have learned through his works to admire the writer and to love the man. So much as this we confidently anticipate, notwithstanding the delicacy of his health; and with this anticipation, which is confirmed by the closing words of the above extract, we add his name to our list of contributors. It is a name which represents even better, perhaps, than that of any other living man in England, the protest made against historical and dogmatic Christianity by the deepest religious feeling of our times; and it will remind thousands of the dignity and beauty of a life which has emancipated itself from the external restraints of Christianity only to show how sacred and mighty are the self-imposed restraints of a freely obeyed ideal. It suggests the heroism of pure and lofty thought, treading a path full of pain, yet unflinchingly pursuing it without once turning back to seek relief in the abandoned comforts of venerable error.

For the information of such of our readers as may not be familiar with the biography of Prof. Newman, we will refer to a few of the leading facts of his career. Two brothers, John Henry and Francis W. Newman, both reared in the Church of England, have in a most remarkable manner illustrated the interior contradiction of Protestantism, as an attempt to blend the opposing principles of authority and of private judgment. Both men are endowed with logical minds. The elder Newman, cleaving to authority, has been forced into the Roman Catholic Church, and is now one of its ablest and purest champions. The younger Newman, cleaving to the right of private judgment, has become a thorough rationalist, and stands at the head of English Theists. His history is full of instruction. Converted to the Evangelical belief at the age of fourteen years, and being confirmed as a member of the English Church in 1821, he found no rest of mind or heart in his adopted creed, and passed through various "phases of faith" before he could thoroughly escape the tyranny of the popular religion. In 1830 he was persuaded to go to Bagdad as a missionary, and stayed two years. But here his rationalism grew apace; he was accused of heresy by his friends at home, and subjected to most annoying and bitter persecution. He returned to England, and by degrees gave up Calvinism entirely—Trinity, Depravity, Atonement, the sinlessness of Jesus, the inspiration of the Bible, and finally the whole claim of Christianity to be a supernaturally revealed religion.

In this private experience, beginning with the narrowest Orthodoxy and ending with the most unqualified rationalism, the experience of modern Christendom is epitomized. It too is passing through these same "phases of faith," and is destined to arrive sooner or later at the same goal. Prof. Newman is one of the finest representatives of educated radicalism, inclining to the intuitional rather than to the scientific school of Free Religion, but adhering with uncompromising fidelity to the principles of free inquiry. The decay of Protestantism through its own inherent and fatal weakness is strikingly illustrated in the unlike careers of the brothers Newman. But while Dr. Newman, the elder, represents merely a backward eddy in the current of modern thought, Prof. Newman, the younger, represents the great current itself; and, with all the generous and chivalrous devotion to truth which marked his earlier days, he now extends to younger workers in the same cause a veteran's hearty sympathy and such help as his feeble health shall render possible. For this we most sincerely thank him; and we expect that our readers will before long have the pleasure of reading an editorial contribution from his pen.

REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY.

Our readers who have taken THE INDEX from the beginning will remember the kind letter of Mr. Conway in our third number, extending a friendly hand across the Atlantic to assure us of his sympathy in our new enterprise. Since then we have republished several papers and articles sent by him. His recently published and fascinating volume entitled "The Earthward Pilgrimage," and his widely admired letters in the New York World, the Cincinnati Commercial, the Radical, and other American publications, have given him so high a reputation as a brilliant and most interesting writer, that we feel very sure our readers will welcome the announcement that he has just promised a series of ten or twelve original letters, to appear monthly in the columns of THE INDEX. Mr. Conway is the rationalistic preacher at South-place Chapel, Finsbury, London, and enjoys the rarest facilities for intercourse with the best minds that congregate in that vast metropolis of the world. It is a piece of great good fortune for THE INDEX that we have secured the promise of original articles from his pen; and we most gladly enroll his name in our list of editorial contributors. We might have given interesting extracts from the friendly letter which authorizes us to do this, if it were not for the provoking little postscript—"Don't print any of this letter!" We obey this time, but shall take our revenge by printing the whole of the next he sends us.

THE VAGUENESS OF FREE RELIGION.

The New York World, in its issue of December 29, republished in full our late editorial on "The Coming Empire of Science," together with the whole of the "Truths for the Times;" and on our third page will be found its editorial comments on the subject. The sensational headings prefixed to the articles which it quoted (and for which it honorably gave due credit) were rather amusing; and one of them—"The Great Natural Selectionist Subscribes to a Creed"—was slightly inconsistent with the World's own criticisms. For instance, the World speaks of many of the statements "subscribed to" as "vague;" and it notes particularly the absence of declarations concerning "God" and a "future state of rewards and punishments." Now we respectfully submit that this criticism should itself effectually dissipate the misconception that Mr. Darwin has "subscribed to a creed;" for if the "Truths for the Times" is a creed, it is a creed that confessedly omits what all creeds are supposed to contain—definite declarations on those very topics. In fact, it is not a "creed" in the proper sense of the word, nor has Mr. Darwin "subscribed to it" in the sense of accepting it as one. He has expressed a general agreement with it, but for the very reason that it is not a "creed."

The truth is that the World, although generously giving two columns and a half to a statement of the principles of Free Religion in the words of one of its adherents, is puzzled to comprehend a non-dogmatic stand in matters of religion. The "vagueness" it complains of is merely the absence of definite dogmas. So difficult, indeed, is it for the public to understand the mental state of one who values religion for something better than dogmas, and who refuses to let himself be bound by them, that many so-called radicals have made the same complaint of "vagueness" against the "Truths for the Times." They want categorical assertions that God does or does not exist—that man is or is not immortal. They cannot conceive how there can be anything more important than these assertions. They find the scientific attitude, waiting and studying, patiently searching for the truth and steadfastly refusing to put assumption in the place of knowledge, to be absolutely incomprehensible. They demand a yes or no answer on questions that are open, and cannot be shut by either answer.

Now the "Truths for the Times" is a compendium of facts and principles, not of doctrines. It teaches plainly enough that all doctrines, to be stable, must be the product of the human intellect scientifically used,—thus quietly excluding all doctrines whatever that are based on grounds which science cannot recognize as valid. This is a general or abstract principle. It will not solve the special problem whether man is immortal, or whether God exists, or any other special problem. It merely means that all problems must be solved by the same fundamental faculties of human intelligence—that the mind must apply itself with all its faculties to the solution of every problem—that there is no special, extra-scientific faculty to take cognizance of religious problems, but that all problems come under the same universal laws of investigation—that all conceit of a special revelation of truth is a delusion and superstition. Hence, without giving either an affirmative or negative answer to the questions of God and immortality, this principle nevertheless requires the human mind to meet these questions like all others, and throws it back on the study of Nature for a reply. How else can truth be won? How else can men escape the dictation of arbitrary systems, or the vanity of special illuminations? Science alone possesses a method of investigation which has been proved trustworthy by its results. Demand, then, that science shall study religious problems as faithfully as it studies problems of chemistry and physics—compel it to a new and higher task—and abide by its adjudication. For from it there is no appeal.

If, then, the search for truth be an essential part of religion, this principle that all truth-seeking must be governed by the laws of scientific method, however "vague" it may seem to those who desire instant replies to the most serious questions that man can put, is broad enough, for the very reason that it is not "special" or "definite," to form the ground-work of religious thinking. We venture to say that it is the only ground work of religious thinking that will ever permit the mind to move in perfect freedom. The "vagueness" which the World considers a reason why Mr. Darwin should not "commit himself" to such a statement as the "Truths for the Times" was undoubtedly a feature of it which especially won his approbation; for it was not "vagueness" in his eyes, but rather the largeness of a universal principle of research. Instead of foreclosing debate on the questions of God and immortality, and taking either an affirmative or negative answer for granted, Free Religion must welcome the boldest and freest investigation, provided it is governed by the scientific laws that should govern all investigation, and provided no appeal is made to any authoritative "revelation." In other words, Free Religion demands that these questions shall be met, like all others, in the spirit of science, in the love of truth, and in utter disregard of all consequences of the inquiry. When science shall have given its final reply to those questions, that will be the final reply of Free Religion.

There is nothing whatever "vague" in this position. It is the attitude held by every mind which perceives that much can be said on both sides of these questions, and believes that the only honorable or even possible terminus of existing doubts must be the scientifically established truth. The minds which cannot endure to hold this attitude, and prefer to lean on the arbitrary assumptions of ecclesiastical or intuitional "revelations" rather than to bear the uncertainty which is synonymous with thought, will necessarily find Free Religion "vague," because it seeks to learn and persistently refuses to be seduced into dogmatism. But this is an attitude which is perfectly familiar to men of science. Without it science could never have achieved its dazzling results. It is because Mr. Darwin recognized this long-familiar attitude in the "Truths for the Times," and saw that Free Religion as here presented plants itself intellectually on the solid rock of the scientific method, that he was able to express sympathy for it. But he is as far from "subscribing to a creed" as he ever was.

The World, however, expresses perplexity as to the position which the "free religionist" holds with reference to the great problems it indicates. Its inquiries are perfectly reasonable, and ought to be frankly met.

We reply, then, that Free Religion does not exact uniformity of opinion even on these highest and most important problems of human thought. It only requires sincere love for the truth, an honest attempt to find it, and an earnest effort to live it. Among its ranks are theists and atheists, spiritualists and materialists, and persons of all opinions. But they all wish faith in man and his noble future; wish to attain this future as much as possible, and find their duty of union in a common endeavor to realize in the world the true, the beautiful and the good. At the true is, they do not undertake to say in on. Perfect freedom of thought and of speech is this. They are willing to trust the human mind to discover the truth in the natural exercise of its faculties, and therefore have no common creedlessness. If this position seems a long and disappointingly "vague" one to those who desire an exact schedule of the "beliefs of free religionists," we cannot help it. But nobody can defend Free Religion until he comprehends its position.

On its intellectual side, therefore, Free Religion asks each individual to form and hold his individual opinions as best he may, refusing to any principle of fellowship less "broad" perfect liberty in perfect love; and it has no in of doctrines about God or a future state—bond of union or basis of organization—is the usual meaning of the word "creed." The World inquires what "machinery" Free Religion is going to "invent" to save society from us reply—none whatever. The Christian "machinery" has not saved the world from crime; any other "machinery." Instead of relying on methods, which experience has proved ineffectual, Free Religion must rely on education, civilization and social science. Whatever industry has really done towards suppressing crime has been accomplished through these natural means. Free Religion will use them also, and the theological nonsense which has done to impair their efficiency, and endeavoring to remove the causes of crime by abolishing the conditions which tend to produce it. It will make the "preparations" for a "future state of existence" be made in the nature of things, by endeavoring to make the present existence as sound and as pure as possible. This is the dictate of common sense; and upon common sense Free Religion will not attempt to improve.

RELIGION AT THE SOUTH.

It is useful sometimes to look at systems of religion not in their best phases, but in their worst; not as modified by better culture and habits of thought around them, but as growing in a rank soil and developing all that would naturally grow out of them.

Such an opportunity do we find in the state of religion at the South, especially among the colored people. We may there observe the effect of that religion of excited emotion and outward observance of pious rites, divorced from all relation to reason or morality, which is more or less to be found in all the Evangelical sects, but especially among the Methodists and Baptists, who have the widest influence among the colored people.

In the more intellectual regions this phase of religion is modified by the influence of the surrounding world; and even the Methodists now have their schools and colleges, and would not venture to take a stand against general education. But at the South the Church preaches directly against education as a hindrance to the soul's salvation; and in times of revival the children are often kept from school, lest interest in their lessons should distract them from the all-important object of working up the nerves to a pitch of excitement in which they will feel an assurance of having "got religion." Religion is with them a charm to keep them out of the Devil's clutches. As the Chinese beat gongs and ring bells to keep the fiend away, so the negroes shout and dance and scream, to secure the presence of the good spirit and to keep away the bad. It is a piece of good luck to "get religion"—like the finding of a four-leaved clover to bring good fortune, or a horse-shoe to keep the witches away. Those who cannot persuade themselves of having acquired it are ordinarily so much impressed by the ideas of others around them that they esteem themselves to be very unfortunate, and, if not blamable, at least somewhat degraded, as not being admitted to a privilege which others enjoy. Very great pressure is brought to bear upon young minds to mould them into the required form. The teachers of the Freedmen's schools have often been met with a refusal to sing patriotic or even temperance songs because they are not revival hymns. Nothing must be allowed to break the spell of excitement which is woven around them.

This being the idea of Religion, it is entirely severed from any connection with morality. Many of the ministers who have great influence over their congregations are men of notoriously corrupt lives. They owe their power to a certain rude eloquence which works upon the nerves of the hearers and produces the desired intoxication and glorification. Of course human nature asserts its value occasionally, and there are ministers who work earnestly for the real good of the people; but, according to the testimony of various witnesses, they are rather the exception than the rule. I have heard a colored minister preach a sermon in which he gave a great deal of good, shrewd, practical advice to his hearers; but it was not morality based upon religion nor taught as a part of religion. One pious man was heard to say to one of the unconverted—"It is safer for me to cheat or lie than for you, because I have the seal on my forehead, but you have not,"—meaning that the Devil would have free chance for his unsealed friend if he did anything wrong.

The old superstition in regard to kissing the book is very prevalent. A teacher, suspecting that one of the pupils had stolen something, tried in vain to make her confess it. She stoutly denied it until the others exclaimed—"Make her kiss the book!" The Bible being brought, she was required to kiss it, and at once confessed her guilt.

Another teacher asked her pupils—"What is religion?" They answered—"Praying." "Do you mean," said the teacher, "that if a man only prays enough, he can be a pious, good man, even if he lies?" "Yes," was the immediate response. "But supposing he steals?" continued the teacher. "Yes," they answered as readily. "But if he commits murder?" The natural conscience here spoke, and they hesitated to carry out their principle any farther.

Now there is the same result here which M. Coquerel described as existing in France. One class of people are entirely absorbed by this superstitious form of religion; and the young vigorous minds whose natural sense, aided by their new freedom, revolts from it, are left without any religious life whatever.

It is on this class of minds that the future of that portion of our Union, whose welfare is inevitably bound up with ours, largely depends; and if we have any faith in the good influence of pure religion and enlightened morality, it seems highly important that it should be offered to their acceptance. I believe that many of them would receive readily the principles of simple rational religion and morality, taught without burdensome formula. The negro mind is imaginative and excitable, it is true; but it is also simple and direct in its receptive power. They will listen to anything that is spoken in earnest simplicity, so that they can understand it; and I think one can, in addressing them, often strike below this superficial layer of superstition to the rich veins of natural religion which lie below it. It seems cruel that such precious opportunities as the day of leisure and the weekly sermons offer should be thrown away upon such worthless stuff as is ordinarily given to these people. It is one of the great questions which are offered to America to solve to-day, how to bring this mass of semi-barbaric, semi-heathen ignorance into a civilization and enlightenment which shall help forward our national progress instead of being a constant clog and hindrance to it.

R. D. C.

SUPERSTITION AND FAITH.

We should do a great injustice to any religion, were we to characterize all of its faith as mere superstition; and we should be equally far from the truth, were we to say of any historical religion, even in its best and purest form, that it is absolutely free from superstition. There can be no doubt that Paul's faith, when he stood on Mars' Hill and called in question the Athenian altar "to the Unknown God," was much more rational and enlightened than was the faith of the common populace of Athens who were still given to idolatry. Yet, had old Socrates been alive, very possibly he would have been able, with his searching, cross-questioning logic, to convict Paul of holding some superstitions, and others of the early Christians of holding still more. The superstitions were not all on the side of the Greeks, nor the truth all on the side of the Christians. In that very altar "to the Unknown God," the Greek mind had expressed one of the finest elements of true religion—the humility that shrinks from the claim that the Supreme Being is fully revealed in any finite form, and has made himself anywhere so far "known" that He cannot also be said to be "unknown." Science, and the religious spirit that is imbued with the spirit of science, are coming to-day into harmony with that utterance of ancient Greece. And Paul himself was broad and just enough to recognize in the Grecian faith and culture something of the very truth that he wished to teach; for he quoted from one of the old Greek poets a statement of the Divine Fatherhood. And could Paul and Socrates have met in the streets and markets of Athens, I think they would have been a fine study for each other—a good intellectual match,—and would have found themselves kindred and congenial souls.

Thus, at least, should the religions of the world meet each other,—thus are they meeting each other in the methods of modern scientific research into human history,—not as if any one were all truth and the others all error, but as if all were sincere attempts of the human mind to know and express the truth, while none can claim to have discovered and expressed it wholly or with entire purity. Studies in comparative theology are disclosing abundant evidence of the fact, that superstition is not anything that can be set off by a distinct boundary-line from what is popularly called a true religious faith, but that it is a relative thing—a spiritual phenomenon of degrees and shades; and that it appears in connection with all historical faiths, and is indeed very closely allied with faith itself. Not a few persons of learning and thought, observing how general is the alliance between religion and belief in supernatural phenomena, are ready in fact to declare that religion is wholly a matter of superstition, and that, under the influence of reason and increasing knowledge of natural laws, all religion and religious institutions, as anything apart from ethics and the sentiment of philanthropy, will gradually pass away and become obsolete.

Such persons do not, as it seems to me, accurately interpret all the facts of human history and experience. Yet their criticism and judgment are of great value as a protest against the prevalence and power of superstition in the province of religion. Frequently, indeed, the rationalistic religious believer finds himself little at variance with their opinion, but only with their way of expressing it. What they would call the natural allegiance of the human mind to truth and right and goodness, and the natural effort of man to realize his ideal of truth and virtue (this being, as they would say, merely a moral quality), he would call the essence of the religious sentiment and the underlying vital significance of all religious systems and faiths. Yet he would agree with them that this elemental and universal aspiration, which is the root of religion, has developed a vast deal of irrational belief; that it has, in fact, gathered about itself such a mass of superstitious opinions and practices that it seems as if, under the reformation which the application of reason and science must inevitably bring, that which is popularly called religion, that which makes the most noise and show in religious faith, must gradually lose its hold on the human mind and become a thing of the past. The rational believer in religion sees that it is a point of the utmost importance that every form of faith should be left freely open to the influence of developing reason and to the light of advancing knowledge, in order that the very seed of religion may be preserved against suspension of vitality and decay. Why is it that science, literature, philanthropy, are in Christendom so largely divorced from religion? Why is it but because religion has appeared so nearly synonymous with irrational dogma and superstition? The Christian church to a great extent has been the nurse of irrational dogma and superstition. It clings to beliefs and ceremonies with the grasp of sentiment long after reason has outgrown and abandoned them. Hence people of scientific minds, of masculine vigor of thought, people that are grappling with the vital intellectual and moral problems of the age, have been to no small extent repelled from the church and from the religion which the church seems most intent upon cultivating.

The truth is, Religion needs to make "a change of base." It has been depending for supplies too long on the dogma that Deity is irrational, supernatural, and arbitrary power. This dogma is the root of superstition. Faith must find a basis which reason will not resist, which science cannot undermine. It has been in the habit of clinging to tradition, to specific epochs of revelation, to special Providences, to miraculously endowed prophets. It must learn to rely on the orderly method of Nature and the inspiration that is uttered in the universal consciousness of man, and that is summed up in the natural processes of history. In fine, faith must come to be synonymous with reliance on the order and integrity of the universe. If religion is to do the practical work in the world which most needs to be done, it must not be a matter of one book, or of one day, or of any special place, but of all books, and all days, and all places. It must get out of churches into homes; out of consecrated places into ware-houses and custom-houses and rail road offices and legislative halls; out of creeds and ceremonies into the social life of neighborhoods; out of prayers for specific gifts from God into an earnestness of purpose and effort that shall set the soul and life in the very current of the eternal energy, and make them instruments in the bestowing of the divine gifts. Then will religion be brought into oneness with every effort of reverent reason, with every established conclusion of scientific investigation; and will come to be regarded not as an enervated sentimental experience, looked at askance by thinking people as something to be kept out of sight, but will be seen to be the highest natural health and vigor and balance of our natural faculties.

W. J. P.

A correspondent inquires:—"Are you sure that Mr. Darwin's theory, which a friend of mine calls (and it is the best definition I have heard) the 'Dialectic of Nature,' is 'original' with him?"

To which we reply that Mr. Darwin did not originate the general idea of the evolution of species, or even that of Natural Selection, which was imperfectly stated by Aristotle himself. But his originality consists in the intellectual creativeness which has fused innumerable facts and previously unperceived relations into theoretical unity, and organized a guess into a law. There is no such thing as absolute originality. The only creation is that of form, and in this sense Mr. Darwin is a creator. Prof. Haeckel, of Jena, justly compares him to Sir Isaac Newton, on the ground that the Darwinian theory is as important to biology as the gravitation theory is to physics. Coming ages will confirm this estimate, and recognize Mr. Darwin as the peer of the greatest and most famous discoverers of the past.

THE BOUND INDEX.

For the information of several correspondents we state that bound volumes of THE INDEX for 1871 will be ready for delivery within a few weeks—probably quite soon. Orders for it will be filled without any unnecessary delay. We cannot furnish a complete file for the year in any other form.

Last year nearly the whole number of volumes bound was ordered in advance; but, according to public notice, they were reserved till paid for, in order to avoid all financial embarrassment. The failure of a considerable number of these subscribers to remit the price left many of the volumes on our hands. These have been nearly all sold, however, and it will soon be impossible to furnish a bound volume for 1870 at any price.

Notwithstanding our very explicit advertisement, there has been misunderstanding of the price. In order to make the matter clear, we call especial attention to the fact that the price of each volume is $2.50 in every case, payable in advance. The postage required is 72 cents for each volume; and if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser, the volume will be sent by express at the purchaser's expense. Persons ordering bound volumes will please observe this notice.

We trust no malicious person will suggest that THE INDEX is getting into bondage because it is getting into binding. Remembering the declaration of Paul (2 Tim. 2:9) that "the word of God is not bound," devout Christians may argue that THE INDEX cannot be the word of God. Very likely. It professes only to be the word of thinking men. But the word of thinking men is the only word of God for these thoughtful days. And though bound never so strongly, THE INDEX for 1871 will be as free as though it were still flying over the country in loose sheets.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

NINE YEARS OLD (Macmillan & Co., 38 Bleecker St., New York) is a child's story book of 215 pages, printed on tinted paper with illustrations by L. Frölich. The story is a simple one, pleasantly told. We cannot say much in praise of the illustrations.

THE WANDERER (J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston) is a "colloquial poem" in blank verse by William Ellery Channing. The verse is too often deserving of its name. Very blank and monotonous are many of the pages. But there runs through the tame neutral tint of the poem the golden thread of a true love of Nature, which at times even causes forgetfulness of the coarse rhythmical texture of the fabric itself. Mr. Channing has something of the poet's sensibility to the finer suggestions of natural scenery; but he has very little of the poet's art of expression, without which poetry degenerates into prose. Mr. Emerson bespeaks generous reading for the little book in a very characteristic preface, which chiefly convinces us of his own determination to appreciate a difficulty perceptible merit. But what shall be said of a poem which demands a generous mood in the reader? All admiration is worthless that is not extorted. We remember that Thoreau used to speak warmly in praise of Mr. Channing's poetic gift; but we thought then, and think now more than ever, that his fame will scarcely survive the friendship that created it.—The price is $1.25. For sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

ATLANTIC ESSAYS (J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston) is a treasure sure to be eagerly sought by all who have ever read an article from the pen of Thomas Wentworth Higginson. These are essays which he has published in the Atlantic Monthly from 1858 to 1871, thrown into book-form for more convenient preservation. It is a volume for which no appeal need be made to the generosity of the reader. It will extort admiration from every one qualified to distinguish between the admirable and the passable. America has no littérateur whose familiarity with elegant letters gives him a better right to discourse on "Literature as an Art," or to make a "Plea for Culture," or to demand "Americanism in Literature,"—no author better adapted by thorough education, long practice, and brilliant success as a writer for papers and periodicals, to give sound advice in a "Letter to a Young Contributor,"—no scholar better qualified by knowledge of and sympathy with the Hellenic mind to do justice to "Sappho" and the "Greek Goddesses." As a master of the finest modern style, Col. Higginson has no superior. Simplicity, freshness, symmetry of artistic structure, good choice of words, thoroughness of preparation and finish,—where can be found finer examples of these qualities, which he considers the cardinal literary virtues, than in his own writings? Were it well to advise young writers to imitate the style of any one, we should mention Matthew Arnold and Col. Higginson as equally excellent models; and as it is, we can recommend no book within our knowledge as more sure than the "Atlantic Essays" to foster a pure taste in this respect. It would be giving our readers, however, a very poor idea of it, should we forget the matter in the style, the substance in the form. Here are noble and manly thoughts, such as should be sown in every American mind. Often has the darker side of culture been forced upon our notice, when we have seen men of large acquirements in science, philosophy, literature, and art, forgetting that they are men and that "nothing human should be alien to them," turn away with cynical contempt from all reformatory movements, and look down with a strange conceit of superiority on those who feel every burden of humanity as a weight laid upon their own shoulders. "I do not care a damn for my fellow-citizens," exclaimed one of great intellect and high education, when we urged the duty of enlightened minds to shed their light on a superstitious world. Such culture creates a svan, but annihilates a man. What we thank Col. Higginson for above everything else in this charming book is that the charm is not only on its surface, but lends an added grandeur to the manhood at its heart. The dignity of ideas, the sublimity of pure moral purpose, are never once forgotten in its pages. Here is held up to America the ideal by which its future must be shaped, if its history is not to be a repetition of the disappointing past. These are the words of a true prophet of to-day:—

"It is worth all that has been sacrificed in New England to vindicate this one fact, the supremacy of the moral sentiment. All culture, all art, without this, must be but rootless flowers, such as flout round a nation's decay. All the stern, long reign of Plymouth Rock and Salem Meeting-house was well spent, since it had this for an end,—to plough into the American race the tradition of absolute righteousness, as the immutable foundation of all. This was the purpose of our fathers. There should be here no European frivolity, even if European grace disappeared with it. For the sake of this great purpose, history will pardon all their excesses; overwork, grim Sabbaths, prohibition of innocent amusements, all were better than to be frivolous. And so, in these later years, the arduous reforms into which the life-blood of Puritanism has passed have all helped to train us for art, because they have trained us in earnestness, even while they seemed to run counter to that spirit of joy in which art has its being. For no joy is joyous which has not its root in something noble."

We wish we could put "Atlantic Essays" into the hands of every reader of THE INDEX. This being impossible, we hope that every reader of THE INDEX will procure it for himself. Sold by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo; price $1.50.

Rev. J. S. Bacon, of Syracuse, N. Y., immediately after the Convention of the Free Religious Association, preached a flaming sermon with the title—"Stand by the Old Flag!"—an abstract of which was published in the Daily Standard of that city. His eloquence was more than Ciceronian, as witness the following extract:—"He stood, however, with those who stood for God and the Bible, not with those who call the Savior of the world Mr. Jesus Christ, and spell God with a little g." This is utterly annihilating. The Kingdom of Heaven cometh by a right use of capitals, and all who hope for salvation must follow the Presbyterian spelling-book. The Free Religious Association must not only "mind their p's and q's," but also their g's as well,—though how this reverend gentleman discovered any deficiency in Free Religious g's by listening to oral addresses, it is difficult to tell. If any of our number was really guilty of saying "God" without a distinctly enunciated capital initial of the most pious and reverential description, by all means let him be expelled from the Association, and sent to the gallows for blasphemy. Such a profane contempt of capitals is deserving of capital punishment.

A London telegram of Dec. 28 announced that the Prince of Wales was recovering, and added:—"The Archbishop of Canterbury has ordered the discontinuance of the special prayers for the recovery of the Prince."

If the Prince should have a relapse and die, the Archbishop must bear the blame, then. He assumed a terrible responsibility. Alas for the English nation, if he made a mistake!

Is it a conceivable thing that God could manage the universe without consulting the Archbishop?

We are very sorry that the little Iconoclast, of Washington, D. C., has been obliged to suspend publication. It was conducted with signal ability, and Mr. George M. Wood, its young editor, has proved his capacity for doing most excellent service to the liberal cause.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE RESURRECTION FROM THE DEAD.

N. COMPOS MENTIS, a Baltimore man,
Whose life had run half of its natural span,
One day was seized with those blue-devil whims
Which play the "Old Nick" with one's body and limbs.
Soon, in convulsions of fancy so strange,
His physical man underwent a queer change:
Aye, a long series of changes, all queer—
A town-clock, a tea-pot, a French Grenadier;
Tall, now, he reaches to ceiling from floor;
Now short, and too broad to be pulled thro' the door;
Fixed, in one moment, for aye to his bed,
The next, doomed never to stand on his head.
Thus, for a twelve-month, this pitiful wight,
Though changing full oft, yet improved not his plight;
When, metamorphosed by Death, as he said,
He laid himself down and declared: "I'm stone dead!"
Then all in vain the physicians essayed
To bring back from Hades poor M.'s vanished shade;
"Dead," said he, "I am, and dead I will be,
And not resurrected by any M. D."!
But Doctor Jason (original man)
Conceived and brought forth a most wonderful plan;
Said he: "A dead man no doctor can save,
So fetch a stout coffin and dig a deep grave.
Brought was the coffin, and dug was the grave;
Instructed, the friends of the dead man did rave;
Laid in his casket, the cover left loose,
The dead heard the doctor: "He's gone to the dance!"
But not a sign yet this dead man did show—
That into the grave he selected to go;
So a mournful cortege—doctor and friends
And pall-bearers four—toward the grave slowly wended.
Now Doctor Jason, with forehead complete,
Had pointed good sentiments all up the street.
Slow move the bearers—the bells, muffled, toll;
Cries sentinel one:—"Halt! who is that poor soul?"
"Poor Mr. M.," the good doctor replied,
"Has gone from the world; yester-morning he died."
"Pity he hadn't departed before!"
The sentinel said: "So that villain's no more!"
And sentinel two and sentinel three
In question and answer did fully agree
While sentinel one; while sentinel four
Said: "The Devil's got him, he'll sure want no more!"
And now, a trove with you, sceptics, who doubt
A dead, coffin'd man from his chest may come out;
For "poor Mr. M.," in full wind-sheet,
Uprone and chased Calumny fast down the street!
Much metamorphosed as poor M. had been,
The best transformation was this he had seen;
And, though each slanderer best his best speed,
Of coffin and shroud he no longer had need;
For, fuming with rage, and glowing with heat,
His cure by this treatment was quick and complete;
So, let each blue-devil man be assured,
By summoning Jason his case may be cured.

Many "good Christians" there are in our day
Who need the sound treatment of wise Dr. J.;
Poor hypochondriacs, out of the head,
Forever exclaiming:—"In sin we are dead!"
Reason may draft its prescriptions in vain,
Each phase of the malady Logic explains;
Let one potent remedy still be preferred—
Like Jason, quick take the deceased at his word.
Man be the Judge; his own witness the "dead."
His self-pronounced sentence with gravity read;
Then from each coffin will rise, in "new birth,"
A full-redesmed mortal—immortal on earth!

J. H. C.

NORTH ANDOVER, MASS.

PRAYER AN FINANCE.

ITHACA, NOV. 25, 1871.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

Accompanying this please find the "History of the Consumptives' Home." Read it, and you will see that you may get your fund made up without so much anxiety as you seem to feel, or, if you cannot, then that you can go on without it and find your bills provided for as they mature. According to this book, if you will make your paper attractive, inspire people with confidence in it, show the world that you are unselfishly working for others' good, and, when you have a bill to pay and no money in the drawer, will pray to God to send you some, sooner or later it will come. If the paper really succeeds and engages general sympathy for its courage and truthfulness and gentleness, you will have nothing to do, when wages have to be paid, but to tell Jesus, and, as sure as you are a good editor, the needful will be collected.

In conscience I ought to add that one reason for sending you the book is that I want to get it out of the house. I have four boys, and they have begun to read it; and, as they will have nothing in the world but their talents for support, I should be sorry to have them confused by this new method. Dickens taught a good moral lesson by his picture of Micawber and his life of failure; but this doctrine of trusting that something will turn up, enforced by a truly religious spirit and clinched with abundant proofs of success, is calculated to bewilder the young idea. Intellectual "consumption" might injure, prove more than physical, and our churches might become Groenhalls for patients suffering from worse than tubercles.

My wife says that she will not have this excellent man who founded the "Consumptives' Home" ridiculed. Nor do I wish to express anything but honor and sympathy and gratitude for his efforts on behalf of the suffering. Nay, I will do what little I can to help him, and I wish him all success; but I cannot avoid calling your attention to his method.

We are not altogether satisfied with the success of THE INDEX. It is now just large enough, just strong enough; and it exactly fills a place in our intellectual economy. We fear that, when it shall become a great paper with its various departments, the little drop of living water will be lost in the tide of success.

However, you have done a good work already, and have succeeded, even were you never to issue another number; so that if, by dint of good thinking, good writing, advertising, and this new method which I now suggest, you shall build up a large weekly, which I shall never be able to read, I shall still always remain your debtor for what you have done.

Yours truly,

W. C. H.

"MASTERS AND DISCIPLES."

TROY, N. Y., Dec. 19, 1871.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—You and your highly able and cultivated associates are courageously and diligently questioning the intuitions of the soul, of the good and wise of all ages, in respect to the truths of ethical and religious philosophy and science. And you are doing a noble work, and, in my opinion, you turn up much highly valuable ore. Yet, methinks, in resisting all intellectual tyranny, you deny the rightful authority of those highly gifted minds which appear at long intervals to illumine and bless our race. Although imperative necessity and natural bias exclude the great mass of mankind from any thorough investigation of the great problems of spiritual life, you unreasonably urge that every man should, uninfluenced by others, construct his own spiritual theories. But, my dear Sir, you and your companions are assiduously doing the very thing which you deprecate. You are most powerfully influencing the minds of most of your readers. You and they signally hold the relation of masters and disciples.

And, for myself, I do not in the least complain of this, for I believe that there is inspiration in the contact of mind with mind. Strong and well-informed minds are potent thought-batteries. It is impossible for me, through lack of time and ability, to climb to the head-springs of the mountain. Therefore I content myself with the artesian well, whose contents are abundantly refreshing. Although not wholly a stranger to the drama of Greece, of France, and of Germany, I find that of Shakespeare incomparably superior. And although I have paid some little attention to Plato and the Vedas, as translated, I can yet find nothing whose soul-quickenings effects approach those of the Gospels.

"Then, claiming reason for your guide," might answer your contributor W. H. S., "you in reality make a guide of Jesus Christ!"

But what if reason convinces me that Christ's interpretation of the soul's intuitions is sound and correct? Will it greatly harm the young (or old) artist to visit the Louvre or the Vatican?

I heartily thank THE INDEX for the good it has done and is doing. I shall strive to profit by such portions of its contents as command my assent, and to ignore what does not. But I will not forego all helps, save my own reason and intuitions.

D.

[We think the concluding paragraph of our esteemed correspondent's letter is the best possible corrective of his previous statement that THE INDEX writers and readers "hold the relation of masters and disciples." Mr. D. means to profit by whatever in THE INDEX he finds to be true, and to ignore the rest; and in this position he undoubtedly speaks for every one of our subscribers. Truth is truth, wherever found; and truth itself is the only "master" that any radical will own.—Ed.]

THE RIGHT TO EDUCATION.

NASSAU, NEW PROVIDENCE, Bahamas, {
Dec. 23, 1871. }

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—Your address at Toledo on "Compulsory Education," contained in THE INDEX of 25 Nov., suggested the following propositions:—

1. That progress is the law of Nature, and therefore the law of God, and is absolutely necessary to the happiness of every one.

2. That education is the means of progress: therefore every person has a natural right to have it, as every one has a natural right to the pursuit of happiness.

3. That no person has a right to injure himself or another, for the definition of right action is—that which injures no one, and benefits some.

4. That he who puts an impediment in the way of education, is injuring some person.

5. That the powers of all Governments are limited to protection from injury.

If Herbert Spencer had defined the power of Government as limited to protection from injury, which I think is his idea, instead of to "the protection of life and property," I think he would have covered the whole ground. It certainly would have covered such objections as were raised by Prof. Huxley.

It may be said that what is commonly called education is not the only means of progress. Still every experience that a person has in life is education, and tends to progress.

If there is anything in the above that will tend to sustain the views expressed in your lecture, use it as best you can. Yours fraternally,

WILLIAM GREEN,
of Orange, New Jersey.

SPIRITUALISM AND REASON.

"The assaults that have been made in modern times on the marriage institution under the auspices of religion have all been made on the basis of a religion that claims to rest on a specific outward revelation. Mormonism claims to rest, not on reason merely, but on a special revelation similar to that given originally in Christianity and intended to supplement that. Socialism in certain religious communities, as at Onida, makes the same claim. And Spiritualism, which is charged, though unjustly as a whole, with undermining the marriage relation, traces its origin, not to reason, but to certain marvellous occurrences transcending reason. It claims that the same sort of miracles which it commonly alleges, established Christianity have been performed in this day to authenticate itself."

Glancing over the pages of THE INDEX of Dec. 9, I find the above extract, signed by W. J. P., which I cut from a good article of his, reviewing the inconsistent position of Rev. A. D. Mayo—a clergyman who, by the way, has just joined with the Orthodox in calling an ecclesiastical convention for the purpose of putting God into the Constitution of the United States.

The writer classifies Spiritualism in the same category with Mormonism, miraculous Christianity and communistic Socialism, on the charge that it, like these religions, "traces its origin, not to reason, but to certain marvellous occurrences transcending reason." Mr. P. evidently judges Spiritualism, not from the standpoint of actual examination, but from popular estimates. A few isolated exceptions ought not in justice to be applied as the full moral measure of the Spiritualist movement.

I am a Spiritualist and speak what I do know. Spiritualists, as a body, are utterly disgusted with the theology of the church, because it abjures and stultifies reason. We have turned into the realm of Nature, where reason invites us to find a basis for a new and practical religion—new in expression, but eternal in principle. With us there are no marvels, no miracles in the universe.

I deny that W. J. P. can furnish proof from any well informed Spiritualist or convention of Spiritualists, or Spiritualist paper, or Spiritualist book generally endorsed as a representative organ, that accepts "certain marvellous occurrences transcending reason" as the data of Spiritualism.

Spiritualists accept no say so of prophet, apostle, or oracle, as final authority. They have no finalities of opinion; their belief to-morrow may be different from that of to-day. They question God, Christ, angels, mortals and every thing to learn truth. The "spiritual manifestations," appealing to reason, open up in the investigating mind new philosophies of life and destiny. Every wise oracle, every wise Spiritualist places reason in the van, that, understanding what we are about, we may build up a scientific and practical religion in harmony with the spirit of our age. They analyze all communications, subject them to criticism, measure them by known laws, rejecting every thing contrary to reason and common sense.

When "Free Religionists" come to the Spiritualist oracles with unprejudiced wills, satisfied even with the rudiments at first, listening patiently, inquiring persistently for months and years—for their science is vast as the universe—and searching from very love of truth, no matter whence its origin, they will find no chance to belittle a religion which the world cannot afford to lose.

J. O. BARRETT.

GLEN BEULAH, Wis., Dec. 1871.

A QUEER CASE.

BOSTON, Dec. 15, 1871.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I clip from The Graphic again of Nov. 25.

Yours very truly,

"A Mr. William Tarr, now in Manchester Gaol for refusing to have his children vaccinated, has complained to the visiting justices of the refusal of the prison chaplain to allow him the use of a Bible. It seems that Mr. Tarr is of 'no religion,' and that as he only wanted the sacred volume to pass away the time, and had no uneasiness on the subject of unbelief, the chaplain declined to grant his request, quoting Matthew vii. 6, in justification of his refusal. We are curious to learn the answer of the visiting justices."

COMPULSORY PRAYERS.—The Faculty of this institution have never been over-ready to comply with the wishes of the students when they called for any change. But we wish that for once they would give a little thought to our desire in regard to chapels. We do not know of any other institution in the country, claiming to be first-class, that condemns its students to such penance, in the way of compulsory prayers, as this. Nearly all the other colleges long ago gave up evening prayers. But we still have evening prayers and morning prayers and Sunday services at the rate of thirteen a week, and to make bad worse, the chapel is never warm during the cold months.

We know, personally, of one man who only spent two winters here, and who to-day is a sufferer from a chronic disease of the throat, brought on by sitting in the cold chapel. The discomfort is enough to give us a right to complain, but when it becomes a source of ill health, the policy which forces it upon us seems to us almost criminal.—Williams (College) Vidette.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapters and verses in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the system of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution? Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Stated and Answered from a Bible Standpoint, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

THE INDEX.

90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO.

Robert Collyer's Works.

NATURE AND LIFE.

TENTH EDITION.

Price $1.50. Fine edition, bevelled boards, gilt edges, with fac-simile of Mr. Collyer's Autograph stamped in Gold, and a View of his early Home. Price $2.00. Sent by mail on receipt of price.

THE LIFE THAT NOW IS.

With an excellent Steel Portrait of the Author, engraved by Perkins. Price, $1.50.

Fine edition, bevelled boards, gilt edges, price $2.00. A new volume, by Robert Collyer, of Chicago, is announced by Horace B. Fuller, of Boston. That it will be a treasury of wisdom and wit, of the most delicate insight, the most humane of sympathy, the most poetic imagination, all who have heard the eloquent preacher, or read his delightful "Nature and Life," will be sure.—GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, in Harper's Weekly.

HORACE B. FULLER, Publisher,
14 Bromfield St., Boston.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM E. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.
Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.
Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription. Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
P. H. BATESON,
A. E. MACOMBER,

President.
Vice President.
Secretary.
Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New York, N. Y.
ASA K. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN CONE, " "
EDWARD HISELL, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

Name	Location	Shares	Amount
D. R. LOCKE	Toledo, O.	Twenty Shares	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER	" "	Fifteen "	1,500
C. CONE	" "	" "	1,000
EDWARD HISELL	" "	" "	1,000
P. E. ABBOT	" "	Forty "	4,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY	" "	Ten "	1,000
GUIDO MARX	" "	" "	1,000
P. H. BATESON	" "	" "	1,000
H. E. BARNETT	" "	Three "	300
H. E. HOWE	" "	" "	800
W. C. FINE	" "	" "	300
J. M. RITCHIE	" "	" "	300
V. KEEN	" "	" "	300
ALANSON WOOD	" "	" "	300
WILLIAM KRAUS	" "	Five "	500
J. G. HOLZMANN	" "	One "	100
JOS. E. MARX	" "	" "	100
C. ANDERSON	" "	" "	100
ASA K. BUTTS	New York, N. Y.	Thirty "	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON	New Bedford, Mass.	R. I., Two "	200
ALEX. COCHRAN	Franklin, Pa.	Five "	500
Geo. HOADLEY	Cincinnati, O.	Two "	200
Miss A. HALL	Defiance, O.	One "	100
G. N. JENNINGS	Northampton, Mass.	" "	100
J. SEDGWICK	Tonawanda, N. Y.	" "	100
CARL POST	Palmer, Mass.	Three "	300
HENRY MILLER	Monroe, Mich.	Three "	300
L. R. SUNDERLAND	Sacramento, Cal.	Five "	500
J. L. WHITING	Quincy, Mass.	One "	100
LOUIS BILMIST	Boston, N. H.	" "	100
J. E. SUTTON	Croydon, N. H.	" "	100
S. L. DUBRE	Olathe, Kan.	" "	100
J. M. HADLEY	" "	" "	100
S. L. HILL	Florence, Mass.	Two "	200
W. H. SPENCER	Haverhill, Mass.	" "	100
JON. P. BARNETT	Boston, Mass.	" "	100
E. W. WEIR	La Grange, Ind.	" "	100
FRANK PRATHER	Boston, Mass.	Five "	500
E. P. DIMORE	Wellsville, Kan.	One "	100
J. T. DICKINSON	New York, N. Y.	Two "	200
W. J. POTTER	Middlefield, N. Y.	Fourteen "	1,400
G. C. GLATTE	New Bedford, Mass.	Three "	300
W. C. GANNETT	Kendallville, Ind.	" "	100
Miss M. C. PERKINS	Boston, Mass.	One "	100
Mrs. S. EMMERSON	Dorset, N. H.	" "	100
Miss E. EMMERSON	" "	" "	100
W. H. DOWNER	Birmingham, Ct.	" "	100
B. B. SMITH	Lansing, Mich.	" "	100
R. B. SMITH	Warren, Pa.	" "	100
W. C. RUSSEL	Ithaca, N. Y.	" "	100
WM. CLARKE	Toledo, O.	Three "	300
C. L. SMITH	" "	One "	100
J. N. LYMAN	Cincinnati, O.	Twenty "	2,000
L. G. FELCH	Monroe Centre, Mass.	One "	100
A. FOLSON	Columbus, Mass.	Three "	300
L. O. BASS	Colbrook, Conn.	One "	100
S. E. SKWALL	Boston, Mass.	Five "	500
ELIZUR WRIGHT	" "	" "	500
R. B. WARD	Detroit, Mich.	Twenty "	2,000
A. D. WILD	Dayton, O.	One "	100
S. S. BOSE	Keokuk, Iowa	" "	100
WM. JONES	Peekskill, N. Y.	" "	100
S. H. DANE	Oskaloosa, Iowa	" "	100
J. H. YORK	Dorset, N. H.	" "	100
JOS. HAYES	" "	" "	100
G. P. FOLSON	" "	" "	100
"A FRIEND"	" "	" "	100
Mrs. H. E. PERKINS	" "	Two "	200
WILLIAM GREEN	Boston, Mass.	One "	100
"A FRIEND"	Orange, N. J.	" "	100
D. B. STEEDMAN	Lowell, Mass.	" "	100
Mrs. F. W. CHRISTIAN	Brattleboro, Vt.	" "	100
C. W. FARCIOT	New York, N. Y.	" "	100
EDW. M. DAVIS	Kelley's Island, O.	Two "	200
Mrs. LUCRETIA MOTT	Philadelphia, Pa.	One "	100
Miss M. A. WRIGHT	" "	" "	100
A. S. BROWN	Jersey City, N. J.	" "	100
EDWIN BROWN	Worcester, Mass.	" "	100
R. P. HALLOWELL	Boston, Mass.	Five "	500
BENJ. RODMAN	New Bedford, Mass.	Three "	300
H. B. CLARKE	" "	" "	300
FRANK J. SCOTT	" "	Six "	600
M. L. HOLBROOK	Toledo, O.	Ten "	1,000
W. H. BOUGHTON	Houlton, Me.	One "	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON	New York, N. Y.	" "	100
E. G. BURNETT	" "	" "	100
J. E. FOLLETT	Webster, Mass.	Two "	200
JOS. WARRABEE	Winona, Minn.	One "	100
T. M. LAMB	Newton, N. J.	" "	100
W. H. DYER	Franklin, Pa.	" "	100
W. H. SPALDING	Worcester, Mass.	" "	100
LOUIS BELROSE	Prattville, Ala.	" "	100
LEWIS KURTZ	Duluth, Minn.	" "	100
SAM. L. WARRABEE	Philadelphia, Pa.	Two "	200
W. L. RATH	Augusta, Kan.	One "	100
W. KENNEDY	La Fayette, N. J.	" "	100
C. H. HOBBS	Amesbury, Mass.	" "	100
Miss I. THOMPSON	Boston, Mass.	" "	100
BENJ. HALLOWELL	Dorset, N. H.	Two "	200
Mrs. M. R. VAN KENNELAER	" "	One "	100
R. B. STONE	Sandy Spring, Md.	" "	100
WM. ROTH	Albion, N. Y.	" "	100
W. M. ROTH	Fall River, Mass.	Two "	200
J. WHITAKER	New Bedford, Mass.	Five "	500
S. H. HOPKIN	Keokuk, N. Y.	One "	100
Mrs. R. D. FRANCIS	Boston Highlands, Mass.	Two "	200
CHAS. BONNELL	New York, N. Y.	One "	100
G. H. BIGGS	Salem, O.	" "	100
J. T. CLARKSON	Amesbury, Mass.	Two "	200
C. W. NEWTON	" "	" "	200
HENRY KLEIN	Castleton, Ill.	One "	100
OTTO KLEIN	Toledo, O.	Two "	200
H. G. NEUBERT	" "	One "	100
A. RUNFERT	" "	Two "	200
TOLEDO PRINTING CO.	Detroit, Mich.	One "	100
T. K. PRICE	Toledo, O.	Thirty "	3,000
	Westminster, Ct.	Two "	200

$50,000

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO OFFICE NO. 90, ST. CLAIR ST.
NEW YORK OFFICE NO. 22, VESLEY ST.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1868. We ask the friends of the cause to represent to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black Morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

LOCAL AGENTS.

HENRY H. RICHARDSON & Co., 22 Vesey St., New York.
H. H. RICHARDSON, 98 Federal St., Boston.
PARKER PILLSBURY, Salem, Ohio.

GENERAL AGENTS.

A. B. BUTTS, New York City.
H. L. GREEN, Syracuse, N. Y.
L. BERRY

Any person, acting as an agent for THE INDEX, may forward the names of NEW SUBSCRIBERS and retain twenty per cent. of their SUBSCRIPTIONS.

All Letters and Communications to be addressed to THE INDEX, Drawer 38, TOLEDO, O.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucetta Mott, Prof. Denison, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORT for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (50 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's Essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (20 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER,
Secretary.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

First Series, No. 1 to 20.

Second Series, Just Published—

11. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
12. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
13. Who Wrote It?: a proper and useful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
14. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
15. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
16. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
17. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
18. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
19. Justice and Love or Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
20. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others": showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelical" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children: did God ever lose, can he lose, His children?
35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader: methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

EITHER SERIES 30 CENTS; BOTH 50 CENTS.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE,
19 Pinckney St., Boston.

RIFLES, SHOT-GUNS, REVOLVERS, Gun R. Material. Write for Price List, to GREAT WESTERN GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers, &c., bought or traded for. Agents Wanted. [S-108.]

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 8) will be sent postpaid on receipt of fifty cents. These include "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham, and other equally valuable Tracts.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, JANUARY 20, 1872.

WHOLE No. 108.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM B. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Rev. CHARLES VOSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONROE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these Lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio."

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1872.

THREE SHORT STUDIES OF CHRISTIANITY.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

[First Lecture: in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, January 7, 1872.]

I bring you to-day three short studies of Christianity. Short studies on a great subject, you will say. True; and, to narrow the subject, I will define it. My studies, then, let me add, are not in the Christianity of the New Testament; or in the Christianity of the first two centuries; or in the Christianity of the Middle Ages. Nor are they studies in the social relations or achievements of Christianity in any particular age, or in any particular country.

These are great problems, with which I confess my inability to deal, and which I willingly leave to more capacious minds. That there are such minds it is gratifying to know, even though their grandeur overwhelms us. I read with awe the following passage from an article on Free Religion, in the Unicorn Quarterly Review. Speaking of Christianity, the writer says—"Even in its worst days, and amid its half-pagan corruptions, it exalted men's ideas and faith, rejuvenated personal character, moulded society, changed barbarous tribes into civilized nations, awoke the depths of human nature, and gave an impulse to art, literature, science, such as the world had never seen; remodelled human society; introduced constitutional government; and made the civilized world what it is."

This is impressive and important, and may be true. But I am a little confused by the statements of other writers, of no great weight to be sure, but of some consideration, on these same matters. Thus Guizot [History of Civilization, Vol. I., p. 72, Bohn's Ed.] an author of the last generation, but still remembered, ascribes the progress and preponderance of domestic manners and the consequent importance of woman to the feudal system. Mr. Lecky, who perhaps is no authority, charges upon the Christian doctrine of celibacy a fearful degradation of woman. "To it we owe," he says, "the long and fiery disquisitions on the unparalleled malignity, the inconceivable subtlety, the frivolity, the unfaithfulness, the unconquerably evil propensities of women, which were the terror of one age and which became the amusement of the next." [Rationalism in Europe, Vol. I., p. 98.] Milman, who commonly is regarded as an authority, says that "in the conflict or coalition of barbarism with Roman Christianity, Christianity gave to barbarism hardly more than its superstition and its hatred of heretics and unbelievers." [Latin Christianity, I, 394. Widdleton's Ed.] Are the "exalted ideals" and "rejuvenated personal character" and "remodelled human society" illustrated by the Bishop of Tours, who burnt a man alive to obtain the deeds of an estate which he coveted? Or by the Archdeacon who conspired to murder the Archbishop of Rheims, when he was at prayers? Or by the Pope who publicly cursed his dead rival, or by the Cardinal who called on the church to sing a jubilee over an emperor who had been judged, condemned and consigned to hell? Indeed, if Dean Milman is to be believed, Christianity in those half-pagan times when it is credited with such muscular reforms, was in a most chaotic state. Popes were charged with adultery; priests were assassins. It had no rebuke for the polygamy of Charlemagne or the shameless licentiousness of his court. Clotilde, undenounced, married two sisters at once. "The religion scarcely interdicted incest," Salvian said; "among the chaste barbarians we alone are unchaste." The church held slaves as property, enacted stringent laws to protect them, and returned them when they had escaped. "A pagan emperor first placed slaves under the protection of law." "The abrogation of slavery was not contemplated by the Church even as a remote possibility." The household of Pope Symmachus was composed of slaves. Lecky says, what all know to be true without his assurance, that "in every prison the rack and the crucifix stood side by side, and in almost every country the abolition of torture was at last effected by a movement which the Church opposed, and by men whom she had cursed." [History of Rationalism, I, 333.] The same writer recalls the fact that in the great majority of instances the early Protestant defenders of civil liberty derived their political principles chiefly from the Old Testament, and the defenders of despotism from the New. It is commonly thought that the Christianity of the "Ages of Faith" exerted a most disastrous influence on art. That science owes so heavy a debt to Christianity is a recent discovery, made by the sage of the West. And as to literature, it is admitted now by competent judges that the revival of learning in the twelfth century, which wrought a change in the intellectual habits of Europe and fairly started the modern mind into existence, came from the study of the Latin classics, and reached its climax in the diffusion of the knowledge of Greek, and an acquaintance with the philosophy of Plato. There were great minds in the church, but literature has little to thank them for. They did their best to repress the activities of the human intellect from which literature proceeds.

Ernest Renan, who, though a Frenchman and a Liberal, is a scholar, proves that the Moorish philosopher and heretic, Averroes, stirred the whole intellect of Europe with his kindling infidelity, and for two or three centuries left his mark on its greatest mental productions. Christian theologians thought that the reign of anti-Christ had begun; and Christian artists painted him among the damned in hell.

But I will not pursue this subject; for it suddenly occurs to me that I may have misunderstood the writer I am alluding to. Our Hebrew Professor at Cambridge had a way of explaining the failure of the Old Testament prophecies by telling us the prophets wrote history in the future tense. They described things past as if they were to come. On a similar plan the ingenious essayist may have intended to write prophecy in the past tense. His purpose may be to tell all his readers, not what Christianity has done, but what it will do, when Unitarianism shall have expelled all other forms of religion from the country. And this interpretation of his language seems on reflection the more probable, as the gentleman invariably speaks for the people of the great West, who have not had much to do with the past, but are expected to have a great deal to do with the future.

But I must present to you my three studies. They were made last summer in Europe, where I spent a long vacation.

THE FIRST STUDY.

The first was made in a Roman Catholic Cathedral. It was a superb structure, many centuries old. Our largest churches are like baby-houses compared with it. Beneath its vast stone floor the gloomy underworld was represented in subterranean crypts and chapels. Under the canopy of its mighty dome floated the pictured forms of evangelists and angels.

The fretted vault of the nave was upheld by clustered columns of stone that shot up like frozen fountains, and lost themselves in the dim spaces. The choir was bloody-red from the flaming windows that made the blessed sun portray the agonies of the crucifixion. On either side of the edifice within, on glass and plaster, the story of redemption was painted; here the angels of terror, and there the angels of promise, frightening the sinners with images of wrath, or winning them by prizes of heaven. The great doors were of bronze; and the arched door-ways, guarded by stone pillars, confronted the approaching stranger with forms of cherubim. The façade was rich with holy emblems, mosaics, and carvings of scenes from sacred writ. Figures of the saints stood thickly in niches under canopies of stone, capped the pinnacles and fringed the cornices. Above, from the great towers, peering over the edges and glaring on the profane world below, were monstrous shapes of beasts; and higher up reached the spires that clustered round the golden Madonnas who, on the highest of all, seemed to be losing herself in the skies. Into the wonderful creation all the ages and all the nations had built their faith. Every religion on the globe had its symbol there. The music of humanity was frozen there in marble. At every turn the eye fell on something that recalled a dead and almost forgotten worship. It was a mausoleum of antique religions, a monument of souls, once living and believing, now departed. Many an unknown emblem, many an unintelligible sign, many a piece of quaint moulding in brass or stone, many a bit of mural decoration, contained an unremembered secret of the spiritual life. Every touch of color, every graven line, every inch of tracery, was a silent witness that no one heeded. The form of the building recalled the ancient pagan edifices it copied, and behind these again the solemn places where men who were at once kings and priests sat in judgment, and all the arrangements and decorations suggested conveniences that had long passed away. To enter the door-way was to leave the modern world behind, and to pass out of the living faith of men into the recesses of worships so old that they had become hateful.

Just within the porch stood a vase of holy water. It was placed there by the shadowy hands of pagan priests who had used it in many a temple of now pulverized stone; and they had received it from the shadowy hands of Egyptian priests whose very mummies had decayed. Whence they received it, we can only conjecture.

An altar was placed in the middle, at the point where the transverse beam of the cross intersects the main stem. The altar had held the same position in fane whose stones have been calcined by time, and whose site has been lost. What lines of white-robed priests had ministered before it, in Palestine, Assyria, Babylon, Thebes—in far-off Persia, and India, remoter still!

The altar was surmounted by a cross, most antique and most universal of symbols—found on Druidical monuments that were ruins when Christianity appeared—found in Buddhist temples when Christianity was as yet unborn. The Roman tribunals were built in the form of it. Plato said the universe was constructed on the plan of it. It was the symbol of generation before it was the symbol of regeneration. It stood in the bed of the Nile to mark the point of the river's rise and overflow. It had probably stood in the same way in the bed of the Ganges and the Indus. It was carved on Egyptian obelisks, and engraved on Phœnician medals, and honored in shrines of Krishna and Serapis. Even the man hanging on it had hung on it from time immemorial.

The form that my eye lighted on soonest was the form of the serpent. It trailed or coiled everywhere. It decorated the great chandelier that hung down from the ceiling. It served as a bracket against the pillars to sustain the lamps. It was painted as twining round the crosses or lying at the foot of it. Whence came it there, and how? From what caves and dim ruins of antiquity had it crept forth? Through how many sheddings of its coat had it passed, in crawling through Asia, Africa, Palestine, Greece, Rome? How had it survived its strange experiences of idolatry, savage and refined—the fearful worship of barbarians, the mystic homage of orientals, the lifting-up of Moses, the alternate blessing and cursing of nations? How had it outlived its violent changes of fortune, at one time being regarded as the symbol of the evil demon, at another as the spirit of good—now loathed as the incarnation of the being that wrought the fall of man, and again revered as an incarnation of the power that renews life—here associated with death, there with immortality—under this dispensation placed in hell as the undying worm, under that raised aloft as the sign of salvation? These are as yet unanswered questions. But, answered or unanswered, the old serpent lives yet, and does service in the Christian cathedral as faithfully as he had ever done in Hindu cavern or Egyptian chamber of the dead.

All about are statues and pictures representing the holy people of the Church. There is Peter with the keys of the Temple of Janus in his hand. There is Moses, by Michel Angelo, wearing on his head the horns of Jupiter. This is St. Denis; this is Dionysus or Bacchus. Near him stands St. Cosmo; this is Cosmos, or the universe. A side-chapel has two charming paintings; one of Aura and Placida, two female saints, the other of Perpetua and Felicitas, two female martyrs. The Aura and Placida were personifications of the aura placida or gentle breeze of a Latin poet; the Perpetua and Felicitas were embodiments in art of the perpetua felicitas or perpetual felicity supposed to be the portion of the good soul.

I found myself gazing in admiration on a masterpiece of art, a mother and child by Perugino. "Yes, there she is again," I exclaimed—"Devaldi with the child Krishna, Maya with the babe Buddha, Juno with the infant Mars." The artist has made an exact copy after the pictures drawn by Hindu or Greek painters, the prints of which may be seen in Creuser's Symbolism. There she is again—Maria Illuminatrix, Stella Maria, Regina Caeli, Cybele, Ceres, Mother of Plenty. Above her head is the Dove, the Assyrian emblem of fruitfulness.

On another canvass she is receiving the gifts of the wise men. I recognize the oxen that graced the sweet picture when it hung in India, and the kneeling figures, and the rich vessels filled with presents. Nothing has been omitted in the description.

That huge statue of a sitting figure now called a saint, the founder of the Christian Church, did duty long ago as Jupiter in a Greek temple. One of the profane says Jupiter and the Jew Peter are the same. If you examine the back of the huge chair, you may still perhaps see the sign of the Zodiac engraved on it. In a curious old mosaic set into the wall, an honest heathen river-god is doing duty at the baptism of Jesus. On exploring the crypt, I find, in a picture, our old friend Mercury conducting a soul to the supreme tribunal at which are seated Pluto and Proserpine, rebaptized with the names of Jesus and Mary.

On every altar there are lighted candles. They have been burning a great while, thousands of years, in fact. They had burned on the altars of Isis and Ceres. They had shed their radiance in the holy places of Israel. They had blazed in the shrines of the ancient Sun-Worship. The God Baal had used them in his courts. They are the attenuated successors of the huge torches that flared before the images of the awful deities, when devotees brought to them offerings of blood. The thick-headed, bull-necked priest who lighted them was far from suspecting that he was following the example of his brethren of faiths the very names of which would be abhorrent to him, if he ever heard them.

As I lingered about the building, preparations were made for celebrating the high mass. Into what depths of antiquity the ceremonies carried me back! To the mysteries of Eleusis; to the sacrificial rites of Phœnicia. The boys swung the censers that had been used in the adoration of Bacchus. The officiating priests took their dresses from the same old wardrobe that had supplied their order with sacrificial garments from time immemorial. The girdle and cassock came from Persia. The veil and tonsure were from Egypt. The alb and chasuble were prescribed by Numa Pompilius, whose sacred books are said to have been discovered some two hundred years before Christ. The stole was borrowed from the official who used to throw it on the back of the victim that was to be sacrificed. The white surplice (or surplis, as the simple woman called it) was the same as described by Juvenal and Ovid. The agnus dei, which he wears on his breast, a little case of wax with a lamb stamped on it, was taken from the neck of a Roman school-boy, who wore it as a charm against evil spirits. He turns and bows and curtsies precisely as the old Etruscan priests and their predecessors did. My head swam as I looked on the pageant—the trance-like performance by men who seemed alive, of actions whose significance had died with their authors, centuries on centuries ago. A strange phantasmagoria it was. It suggested Kaulbach's picture in Berlin of the ghostly Huns who left their dead bodies on the field of battle, but continued their conflict in the upper air. These men were ghosts. Their performance was spectral; the drama was a shadow, an illusion.

The actors themselves appeared to feel it so. They showed absolutely no intelligence. Their movements were mechanical, their faces dead, their countenances void of expression; their words sounded like echoes of old pagan rituals, snatches of incoherent prayers that had been offered to Mercury, Apollo, or Bacchus. They doffed and donned their painted coats, relics of ancient heraldry, as if they were automata worked by wires. Of fresh veneration there was none. A verger who was waiting on a group of visitors left them an instant to kiss the pudgy hand of a greasy priest who was passing; then, returning to his party, took down from an altar one of the lighted candles, blew out the flame, and used it as a wand to point out the beauties of a picture.

A preacher ascended the gilded pulpit to preach a sermon. Nobody listened; it seemed to concern nobody. A priest left his place, beckoned to a company of Americans, and, while the mass went on, took them behind the high altar, led them into the sacristy, and only manifested emotion on receiving his fee. A huge monk, while reciting the offices, took snuff and trumpeted on his enormous nose. Ten others, venerable-looking men, looked round, as they sang, on the strangers in the church. The worshippers were more interested in them than in the rites. Hideous waxen heads and musty skeletons adorned the sacristy; the robes were soiled, the persons of the monks filthy.

I rubbed my eyes. Was it a dream? I seemed to stand in the very presence of the ancient faiths of Egypt, India, and Greece. The ancient Fetishism, the old worship of Orpheus and Bacchus re-appeared without pretence of disguise. These were the priests of Osiris, Demeter, Apollo. They had forgotten to consult the almanac, and taken the churches of Jesus and Mary to be their own. The roaring modern street broke the dream, but only started the speculation.

This was the prevailing form of Christianity in a great European city, in one of the grandest churches in all the world. In what relation did it stand to the age? That were hard to tell. Did it perform the duties of a religion? If it be the function of a religion to collect able-bodied young men in monasteries to be trained in the same kind of dumb show, it did. If it be the function of a religion to take the finest young women out of the world and shut them up in nunneries, it did that. If it be the function of a religion to quench human intellect, to make existence aimless, to produce the narrowest souls in the dirtiest bodies, this also it faithfully performed. If it be the function of a religion to turn people away from all active interest in the world, and fix their attention on the future life, this it would do, if it possessed the smallest power to make the future life real to the fancy or pleasant to the hope. If it be the function of a religion to depopulate society, it would do this, if human nature were not too strong for it. It would be a disorganizing force, if it were not a spectacle of decrepitude. The more closely we study the phenomenon, the more we become persuaded that it is an anachronism, the spectral re-appearance of a buried life. From the shade of an effete Nature-Worship, what has the modern world to hope?

THE SECOND STUDY.

My second study was made in the high places of England, the leading Protestant nation of the globe. One Sunday morning I sat in Westminster Abbey, in the poet's corner. The ground beneath me, the walls around spoke with silent but eloquent lips of human genius, and its power to make itself immortal. The preacher's drowsy voice scarcely penetrated the atmosphere, thick with the breath of departed spirits. The preacher's gospel of mechanical redemption by a Savior's blood sounded dreary and hollow amid the memories of these potent men whose native force of intellect had compelled the house of God to take them in. Chaucer and Spencer, Beaumont the play-wright and rare Ben Jonson, Drayton and Davenant and Cowley, Dryden, Prior and Addison, what memories these names called up! Close by was the plain slab that marked the grave of Charles Dickens. Was it wonderful that the people writhed on their seats, looked stealthily about, and crept round on tip-toe to stare at the monuments and read the inscriptions, more curious to read what was written on the gravestones of the living dead than to hear what proceeded from the lips of the deceased living?

Into the walls of this Church a nation had built its reverence with its history. For more than a thousand years it has enshrined the ideals of the national adoration. Fourteen kings and thirteen queens sleep their last sleep under its pavement. Their wars and sorrows and crimes are over, their dynasties reconciled, their quarrels ended. In the "Chapel of the kings," St. Edward the Confessor had his shrine inlaid with mosaic work. Near him are the altar tombs and effigies of Edward III and his queen Philippa; of Edward I and his queen Eleanor; of Richard II and his queen. There is the altar tomb and bronze effigy of Henry III; the altar tomb and chantry of Henry V, the hero of Agincourt, the helmet, shield, and saddle of the warrior not far off from their wearer. In his chapel of wondrous beauty, behind gates of oak, overlaid with gilded brass wrought with various devices, Henry VII has an altar tomb and effigy—he who twined the white rose of York with the red rose of Lancaster. On either side, in opposite Chapels, silent and peaceful now, repose under stately tombs, mounted by regal effigies, the lion-hearted Elizabeth and her ill-fated rival, the queen of Scots. In the same grave with Elizabeth is the sister Mary who had her imprisoned, and would have had her dead. Memorials of England's renown face you at every turn. Marble and alabaster and monumental brass do their best to preserve the likenesses of beautiful women and princely men, of archbishops and abbots, dukes and earls, great chancellors and high court favorites, lords and ladies whose names once sounded loud as the loudest in the halls of splendor, whose lives were epics, whose story even yet makes the blood leap or starts the tear. The earth is holy as that of a campo santo. The walls themselves are monuments. Statesmen like Clarendon and Temple, Halifax and Pulteney, Pitt, Fox, Canning, Castlereagh, and the great Earl of Chatham; soldiers like Aymer de Valence, Prince Rupert, Monk the restorer of Charles II, the duke of Cumberland who won Flodden Field; antiquarians like Camden, Spelman, and Usher; musicians like Purcell, Blow, and Handel; divines like Barrow and South; actors like Betterton and Garrick, Mrs. Oldfield and the beautiful Mrs. Bracegirdle; philanthropists like Fowell Buxton,—ennoble and enrich the place. All are not worthy of admiration. There are bloody dukes and profligate nobles and dissolute women. Chiffinch is there, who pandered to the pleasures of Charles II, and the shameful duke of Buckingham. If there is a monument to Sir Isaac Newton and Dr. Johnson, there are monuments also to Richard Congreve and St. Evremont, the loose-tongued wit. All were not ornaments of character, but all were characters. They represented valor, experience, skill, learning, grace, genius. If their monuments are not tasteful, they are costly; if not elegant, they are large. England has done what she thought her finest to celebrate the greatness she admired.

For these were her prophets and seers, her evangelists and apostles, her confessors and martyrs, her sages and saints. No others appear. She had no others. The niches contain no churchly statues; the walls exhibit no scenes in the Savior's life, no manger birth, transformation, crucifixion, ascension, or glory; the side-chapels contain no picture of Madonna, human or spiritual; the stranger sees no altar and no crucifix; no candles burn, no incense rises. The qualities celebrated in this temple are not humility, meekness, aspiration, submission, patience, gentleness, charity, abnegation of self; they are the rugged English qualities of daring ambition, resolution, perseverance, fearlessness, self-assertion, confidence in the strong intellect and the stout heart—qualities thoroughly unchristian, but thoroughly British. The chapel of Henry VII, or of the "Virgin Mary," as it was originally called, looks more like a chamber in an armory than like a chapel in a church. The banners of the Knights of Bath are its most conspicuous decoration, as they hang out above the shields and swords that take the place of saintly pictures. It is a house of kings, not of the King of kings. The ruling genius there is the lion of England, not the Lamb of God.

More characteristic still of English piety is the great Cathedral Church of St. Paul's, an immense structure five hundred feet long. The figure in the front courtyard that seems to be its tutelary saint is queen Anne. The emblem over the south door is the phoenix; not the dove of Jesus, or even the eagle of St. John, but a nondescript bird of purely legendary qualities. There is an entablature supposed to represent the conversion of St. Paul; and there are eight paintings designed to convey an idea of certain passages in the life of the great apostle. But decay has been allowed to destroy what little merit they had, and now they only serve to show how indifferent English Christianity is to Christian art. The temple is simply a Valhalla, or hall of heroes. The Christ is in it nowhere, and of Jesus of Nazareth no trace exists. One cannot imagine him among these trophies and banners. There is indeed a statue of Dr. Johnson, and one of Sir Joshua Reynolds, and one of Bishop Heber on his knees, like Daniel in the den of lions. The cellar is paved with gravestones of artists and engineers, Reynolds, and Lawrence, and West, and Fuseli, and Turner; Mylne and Rennie, who built Waterloo Bridge, are down there in the dark. Sir Christopher Wren, the architect of the building, has a place of honor up-stairs, but the other places are occupied by soldiers and sailors, with battle ships and cannon, horses, and flags, buckles and boots done in the most literal style with all the accessories of gloves and helmets and plumes—sailors and saints, gunners and guardian angels being mixed in conical confusion. A general, falling mortally wounded from his horse and caught in the arms of his friends, is gravely watched by two sphinxes from Egypt. The visitor is not permitted to forget where and when they fought, or what titles of rank they wore, how their trousers were cut or how they carried their swords. There is no attempt at idealization or disguise; nothing is left to fancy; the deification of pluck is complete. It may be truly said that the bully-boys have the floor.

I forgot to mention that a solitary statue is erected to a philanthropist, John Howard. But, as if to leave no doubt whatever that he was a monster quite out of place in a Christian church, the artist has given him a Roman toga and put sandals on his feet, so that with his wild countenance and his hammer in his hand he looks like a classical blacksmith, or an escaped convict.

The English Trinity is composed of Marlboro, Nelson, and Wellington. Nelson being the first Person. At Windsor Castle, in a room literally furnished with warlike implements and wainscoted with naked arms, they stand together like Brahma, Vishnu and Siva,—Nelson on a pedestal of wood, a piece of the mast of his ship Victory, the other two on brackets, each with a little flag over his head, which is renewed on every anniversary of Blenheim and Waterloo. The "angel" of St. Paul's is Nelson. By one of the massive pillars his statue is conspicuous, a huge group of which he is the centre. Adoring forms stand around, and something meant for an angel directing triumphantly towards him a cluster of English youth who hasten, like acolytes, to throw themselves at the feet of the British hero, model, and savior. He holds in the church the same place that St. Charles Borromeo occupies in the Cathedral of Milan. In the crypt in the centre of the edifice, in a lofty chapel, in a superb sarcophagus of porphyry which Cardinal Wolsey had made for the burial of Henry VIII, the idolized sailor is buried; his coffin made of wood from the mainmast of his ship L'Orient. England had no more sumptuous shrine for the saint of her adoration. Behind him is the funeral car made of captured cannon in which the great Duke of Wellington was borne midst an empire's lamentations to his honored resting-place. There he lies in state with his insignia about him, his titles and dignities bearing witness to heaven that he who lies there casketed in bronze and covered with gold-embroidered velvet, was no ordinary mortal, but demi god, the ideal of a nation's worship, the minister of a nation's salvation. Tradition declares that a temple of Diana once stood where St. Paul's now is. The temple of Diana has been replaced by a temple of Mars.

St. George's Chapel at Windsor bears the same testimony. The stalls in the choir are surmounted by knightly crests. The shields of warriors hang below them; under the shields are the naked crossed swords, and over them the gaudy pennants, that had done duty in martial pomp.

The Book of Prayer of the Church of England spoke of Christ and his religion; but the Book of Prayer was a State institution, published by order of the Queen.

And this was the Christianity of England as published in the high places of the realm; a very new reading of the old gospel—the beatitudes left out, the parables omitted, the stories of baptism and temptation, of transfiguration and Gethsemane dropped, Calvary displaced for poop-decks and batteries, the cross supplanted by the truncheon of the commander. Emerson says that the confession of the English Church is—"Ye are saved by taste." But even the taste is questionable. Some of the best men, preachers too, admit that Christianity in England has not force to stand alone, and deprecate a separation of Church from State as threatening to fritter the religion away in sectarian disputes. Stopford Brooke says plainly that Protestant Christianity in England owes its breadth and liberality of thought to the noble indifference of the State to theological disputes. Matthew Arnold pleads for the Church on the ground that it is precisely such a church as neither Romanist, Protestant, nor Rationalist ought to object to. Its merit is that it is not in earnest, a singular merit in a church whose founder bade his disciples bear the cross. Henri Taine says that English religion subordinates all rites and dogmas to morality (which Colenso and Voysey will say is not quite true), and that it advocates self-government, liberty of conscience, and mental culture, "which are fine qualities, but not Christian." The consecration of health and wealth, of valor and pride of place and strength of brain, is good, but Jesus of Nazareth never encouraged it.

THE THIRD STUDY.

But this, you will say, is a description of Protestantism in high places, the religion of the wealthy, the aristocratic and the powerful. In the middle classes it is different. Would you know the religion of Protestantism in its strong-hold, you must go to the dissenting chapel. Let us go there. My third short study of Christianity was made in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle. The immense building, oblong in shape, with three deep galleries rising above the floor, and running completely round the interior, leaving no room for choir or organ, is computed to hold between five and six thousand people. They were all there. They poured in at the door-ways; they came up from below; they dropped from above; they crowded into the narrow pews till every seat was occupied; they sat on the steps, on the floor of the passage-ways. They filled a little sub-gallery under the pulpit. Every foot of space behind the preacher was taken. These were the "bone and sinew" of the English people, the stout middle class, representing the independent intelligence, the honest moral conviction, the sturdy will of the leading Protestant community in the world. They worshipped no symbol. They practised no rite; they bent before no crucifix; no Christian emblem of dove or cup was anywhere visible; no sign of the Redeemer appeared. The great book on the table within the preacher's enclosure alone hinted at the uses of the place. The preacher appeared, a thick-set man in ordinary street dress. Seizing the railing before him with both hands, he addressed familiarly an invisible person with whom he seemed to be on intimate terms. Then, opening the great Bible, he read passages of very different tenor with the same voice, as if they were of the same authority, and with oft-repeated assurances that what he read was God's own express words.

The power of the service was in the sermon. This the people gathered themselves up to hear. To cultivated ears it was not attractive, being neither rich in knowledge, nor fresh in thought, nor bright with fancy, nor tender with feeling, nor sparkling with gems of literature, nor kindling with spiritual aspiration. It contained, it is true, the unadulterated gospel of Calvin; but to the rational mind that was hardly a recommendation.

What attracted this multitude twice every Sunday? No wit, no humor, no passion, no glow of imagination, no graces of rhetoric, no charm of manner. The dulness of other preachers enhanced the power and beauty of Spurgeon's. That was something. The direct business way in which he conducted the services had a fascination. There was a spell in the audacity of the man who did not flinch from the most naked orthodoxy, but flourished his irrational and horrid beliefs in the face of science and common sense with an impudence that was imperial. But this will not explain the evident earnestness of the hearing or the solemnity of it as an act of religion. What was the spiritual meaning of this phenomenon? What did it stand for? To what key-note did this multitude of hearts respond? I listened for that. I am not sure that I heard it, but I fancied that I caught, though on another key and set to another pitch, the same strain that rung through Westminster Abbey and filled St. Paul's Cathedral with notes of pride.

These people were self-worshippers too, made to feel that they were the spiritual strength of the nation. They were the poor, and therefore the pious; the humble, and therefore the elect; the toiling and afflicted, and therefore the "called;" the true believers in the gospel, and therefore the salt of the earth. The great despised them, the rich ridiculed them; but the great lay under a doom which they escaped, and the rich had temptations and would have torments which they were saved from. In the high places of England, among the priests and nobles, the capitalists and great merchants, there was corruption, but they were clean and fountains of cleansing; and it was through them, if through anybody, that social salvation was to come. What was this but the same spirit of personal pride and self-assertion and self-reliance that are so conspicuous an element in the English character? It is not Christian in the New Testament sense. The presence of the meek and lowly Jesus is not prominent. The faith is in personal piety; the worship is the self-worship that the Master would rebuke. For the calm of culture which characterized the Establishment, there was the jungle of disputation, the bustle and clatter of partisanship, the slogan of dogma. The worship was paid to a deity who reflected back on the worshippers their sectarian animosity. The services were crude. The creed voiced a harsh personal opinion. The organization aimed at making operative the passionate prejudice and will of uncultivated people, who decried intellect, denounced science, distrusted elegance and art, and shut all the gates to heaven but the one that opened out of their back-yard.

The preacher said strong things about Providence and prayer and special help from above, the intercession of Jesus Christ, the promise and the supply of immediate aid; and he spoke apparently to willing ears. But these people expected to answer their own prayers, and be providences to themselves. Numerous contribution boxes, conspicuously placed with large labels over them, and pungent appeals for shillings appended, hinted that God helped people who helped themselves; and the clink of the shillings as they dropped in told how the people took the hint. The prayers for money to sustain the orphanages and mission schools were addressed to Heaven, but the wise precaution was taken to address them even more audibly to men; and the response of the latter was accepted as a response from the former. The money was found in the boxes; and if God did not put it there, he put it into the people's hearts to put it there, and the belief in a special prayer-hearing and prayer-answering Providence was justified. Thus by a pleasant delusion faith and good sense were reconciled. The people go on doing strong work in a strong fashion, maintaining orphanages, mission schools, reform operations among the vicious, intemperate and degraded,—do it by sheer force of fellow-feeling and at great cost of their hard cash and scant leisure,—do it as the poor do for the poor, the humble for the humble, the struggling for the struggling,—do it with forecast and consideration and close fitting of means to ends,—do it as they do their business; and then please their Protestantism by ascribing it all to the special operation of God. Their idea seems to be that everything is by special Providence that is not by institution and endowment. The stated, successive, permanent, organized supplies are from human sources; the spontaneous, impulsive, voluntary, fitful supplies are from heaven. A child-like and touching reversal of the usual rule, which imputes the fitful agencies to men and the permanent ones to God. Their whole attitude and bearing shows an utter disbelief in miracle; yet their Protestantism will not let the belief go, but clings to the fiction long after the fact has disappeared. They are earnest modern men with the piety of children of the forest. They do their own work, are proud every day of the week that they do it well, and on Sunday go through the form of disavowing their deeds. As living men, they are, as Matthew Arnold calls them, "agents of Hebraism." Hebraism indeed! They are agents of something more antique than Hebraism. I take up Tylor's "Primitive Culture," and I find their progenitors too far back among the pagans. Their religious festivals, prayer-meetings, "revivals," vividly recall the strange pantomime enacted by the Corybantes who danced and shouted in honor of Cybele. The same shuffle, the same contortions, the same excited gestures, the same shouts to the idol, the same lashing into spiritual rage; the same intoxication produced by the same means, and hailed as the sign of the descending and inspiring God. I hear the ancient ejaculations: "To triumph! To Bacchus! Evos! Evos! Goddess, we cry to thee! Hear us, and see our tears!" The very tones have come to us with unblunted edge.

It seems plain that the religion of Jesus, if we know what that was, does not make itself operative through either of these forms. An eminent authority, at present delivering oracles in New York, assures us that Christianity has "saved the world." The evidence of this is plain to him from "an utter change in the fashion of the world's politics" (he alludes probably to the Tammany rule in New York, which was in the hands of Romanists)—from "an utter change in its science" (this must mean the adoption by Christianity of the Mosaic cosmogony)—and from "an utter change in its philosophy" (which refers, I presume, to the Rev. Granville Moody's declaration that Chicago was destroyed on account of its devotion to the Golden Calf). In our judgment, the world is not yet saved, and it is likely to owe its salvation to other agencies. Civilization is advanced by other forces; society is held together by other attractions. The deepest faiths of modern men are rooted in the experiences of their life. Science is the great teacher of omnipresent and eternal law, the prophet of duty, the mediator between knowledge and faith. Our schemes of social reform, our plans of co-operative labor, our efforts to prevent or remove pauperism, to dry up the sources of crime, to hedge vice about with non-conductors, to open natural vents for industry, to educate children, to secure for women a chance at life's great opportunity, to remove barriers between classes, and lessen the disabilities that make futile so much effort; our attempts at rational self-government and an orderly society, are due far less to the stimulating power of Christianity than to the intermingling of men and interests and the moral energies stimulated thereby. Forced into communication, pressed into contact, compelled to suffer and enjoy together, some rational arrangement of society becomes imperative. We cannot live as people lived in the ages of Faith. Though no apostle had ever said it, we must bear one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of society. Though no Jesus had ever bidden it, we must be helpful and pitiful. It is a matter of life or death for us. The republic demands fellowship. Were there no such thing as Christianity in America, out of the urgent necessity of the case leagues would be formed, and organizations effected, and institutions set up for substituting the reign of law and peace for the reign of anarchy and war. The cry of the earth is not for such institutions as Christendom has planted—institutions that at best patch up society and at worst dry it up; the cry is for institutions that develop society and enrich it. Do we forget that Christianity was born of human nature, one of a very large family, some of whom have come of age within a few hundred years, some of whom are but newly born, all of whom share the kingly and queenly attributes of their royal parentage? It will be long before human nature becomes so decrepit that it must totter along supported on either side by two of her children. When she does, she will lean her weight upon her latest, not upon her earliest born.

A LIBERAL SENTIMENT.—There is a class of men in the community, a comparatively small class, many of them highly cultured and accomplished, who profess to have risen above the necessity of an infallible guide, as the Bible is held to be by Christian people, and who, rejecting the high claims of this remarkable book as mere pretension, go searching through all religions, through all Nature, and through their own soul, for the articles of their religious faith or belief. These persons are called rationalists, radicals, free religionists. The popular and somewhat opprobrious term applied to them is "infidel." The dictionary gives this definition of "infidel"—a "free-thinker, one who disbelieves in Christ or the divine origin of Christianity." I believe this is precisely the ground or attitude occupied by the "radicals" of the present day. Personally I prefer to apply the term "infidel" to one who professes no religious aspirations whatever, who hates God, and acknowledges no personal obligation or allegiance to him. Meantime I would scrupulously avoid even seeming to cast odium upon a man because of his opinions—opinions which, for anything I know, he may hold just as sincerely and conscientiously as I do my own.—Rev. R. H. Howard, in the Christian Advocate.

LOCAL NOTICES.

UNITED INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the Opera, in the new Express Building on St. Clair Street, opposite the WHEELER OFFICE, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash receipts for the week ending Jan. 10th.—J. H. Crabtree, $2; Ezra Hamill, $2; P. H. Clemens, $2; H. L. Green, $15; G. W. Reynolds, 30 cts.; Asa K. Bette, $5; Hildard Hall, 60 cts.; Mrs. M. L. Green, $30.00; E. C. Miles, 50 cts.; E. T. Wood, $2; J. T. Brady, $4; A. N. Latty, $2; Joseph Fraser, $2.25; N. G. Kimball, $2; Boul. Green, $9; S. B. Borer, $4; Thos. Mansford, $2; Rev. Zerah Masters, $2; A. Van Der Nallier, $1; F. W. Christian, $2.20; J. J. Brackett, $2; Julius Churchill, $2; Wm. Berrian, $5.50; Levi Dickson, $2; L. W. Lipton, $10; R. G. Hogue, 30 cts.; G. M. Wood, 50 cts.; Chas. Nash, $50; G. A. Alwood, $1; H. Sleeper, $2; Miss M. L. Whitwell, $1; L. T. Lee, $6; E. R. Rogers, $2; Hugo Anderson, $2; J. McMillan, $5.00; Spencer, $2; J. H. Hunt, $2; Mary Dwyer, $1; A. M. Howard, $6; J. Scott, $2.50; Hon. Alfred Conkling, $2.10; R. J. Rogers, $2.10; A. P. Lohr, $2; D. F. Bremer, 50 cts.; R. A. Skues, $2; Wm. Hillen, $2.10; Geo. W. Jones, 50 cts.; Fred. Kiefer, 50 cts.; J. H. Allen, $2; J. T. Binkins, $2.45; H. W. Brown, $2; Jno. Hanchings, $2.10; G. A. Dillon, 50 cts.; Chas. Ziegler, $2; A. Kimball, $2.25; G. Gernow, 15 cts.; Oliver Johnson, $2.60; Dr. Mergler, 60 cts.; C. Cadie, 75 cts.; J. G. Dodge, $1; Prof. Peter H. Clark, $2.60; N. M. Mann, 60 cts.; Mrs. S. A. Woods, $2; P. Roswell Johnson, $2.10; John Alberger, $2.35; Harry Gendy, $1; Louise M. Thurston, $2; Beth Hunt, 10 cts.; Norman Johnson, $2; Melissa C. Palmer, $2; A. Polson, $2; F. W. Gage, 50 cts.; Godfrey Gendrum, $2; M. G. Halling, $2; A. C. Govey, $4.50; W. W. Grant, $2; S. N. Townsend, 30 cts.; J. C. Leonard, $2; A. J. Warner, $2; E. S. Hinchey, $2.70; H. S. Brown, 50 cts.; H. S. Wilson, $2; Samuel N. Green, $2; Sarah T. Sault, 60 cts.; A. S. Brown, $2; Edwin Brown, $2; Joseph S. Perry, $2; A. B. Tuttle, $2; Sylvania Rose, $2; P. H. Oullette, $2.50; Wm. W. Carson, $2; B. F. Stamm, $2; Walter F. Austin, $2; J. H. Dillion, $2; Joseph T. White, $2.50; S. M. Mangrove, $1; C. Townsend, $2; Geo. Bachman, $2; Miss A. M. Walsh, $2; C. A. Gentry, $2; Chas. H. Shepard, $2; Maggie Deane, 10 cts.; L. W. Allen, $2.50; A. W. Hawley, $2; Joseph Marsh, $1; D. G. Francis, $2; Phoebe H. Dean, $10; Orlando Davis, 30 cts.; A. A. Bell, $2; Joseph Smith, $2.50; Knapp Bros., $2; Chas. Collins, $2.15; Hugo Anderson, 25 cts.; Mrs. M. J. Perry, $2; C. M. Nye, 20 cts.; Parker Pillsbury, $2.50; Warren Chase, $2.15; J. R. Hawley, $3.50; Parker Pillsbury, $1; Toledo Printing Co., $10; Mrs. C. D. Coffey, $2; Dr. C. H. Hays, $2; B. F. Smith, $2; Mrs. Jno. W. Hedges, $2; G. N. Jennings, $2; Jno. August Vincenti, 50 cts.; E. L. Roy, 10 cts.; G. P. Hard, $1.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt will be given unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittance acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

Poetry,

A BAD "ISM."

BY HELEN R. CUTLER.

"What keeps our friend from church?" the pastor said.
 "I have not seen him there for many weeks.
 I hope he's not got Deism in his head,
 That he comes not!"—"Tis to his clerk he speaks."
 "Oh no, your reverence," he answers flat,
 "It is not Deism, it is worse than that."
 "Than Deism worse?" exclaims in sad surprise
 The minister. "'Tis Atheism, I fear."
 "No, worse than that, much worse," the clerk replies.
 But still he does not make his meaning clear.
 The pastor said, "This cannot be denied—
 Than Atheism nothing can be worse."
 "Oh yes, your reverence," the clerk replied,
 "'Tis RHEUMATISM—a far greater curse."

Seaside Oracle.

The Index.

JANUARY 20, 1872.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 20, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED on last page, Five Hundred Shares, $50,000
THOMAS MUMFORD, New Harmony, Ind.,	One	100
D. AYMER, JR., Brooklyn, N. Y.,	"	100
Mrs. L. B. BLOUNT, Evansville, Ind.,	"	100
—, Delancey, O.,	"	100
—, Bryan, O.,	"	100
J. T. BRADY, Sabatha, Kan.,	"	100
—, Northampton, Mass.,	"	100
MAX PRACUT, Cincinnati, O.,	"	100
O., Boston, Mass.,	"	100
H. HETTMANN, Toledo, O.,	"	100
C. FOLSON, Zanesfield, O.,	"	100
S. C. EASTMAN, Palmyra, Mo.,	"	100
J. O. MARTIN, Indianapolis, Ind.,	"	100
L. T. IVES, Detroit, Mich.,	"	100
R. W. MEDDAUGH, —, Two		200
A. FOLSON, Boston, Mass.,	"	300
W. F. HIKES, Dayton, O.,	"	300
HIRSH COLT, Susp'n Bridge, N. Y., One		100
SAMUEL COLT, —, 100		100
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass., Two		200

$52,400

The great and unprecedented demand for the first issue of THE INDEX for 1872, No. 106, shows that we made no mistake in printing an edition of more than twice the usual size. Orders for it can thus be filled for some time to come; and we shall be glad to receive them.

The labor of editing THE INDEX is so great, and increases so rapidly, that we find it absolutely impossible to attend properly to our correspondence, even concerning matters of real importance. The piles of unanswered letters grow greater rather than less, and there is no remedy for the evil. Our correspondents must be indulgent. It is always a pleasure to receive letters; but if we undertook to answer a twentieth of them, we could do nothing else. Even leaving correspondence out of the account altogether, we have neither time nor strength to do all the work that ought to be done; and we trust our friends will generously forgive our involuntary neglect.

This week we publish Mr. Frothingham's opening lecture in the course of "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," delivered in Horticultural Hall, Boston; also the first of the six sermons promised by the Rev. Charles Voysey, on the question—"What think ye of Christ?" Mr. Voysey awaited the receipt of another letter before forwarding his manuscript; and, the Boston lectures having now commenced, we are obliged by this delay to encroach upon the space usually devoted to other uses, instead of printing his sermon on our first page. The second sermon of the series has also been received; and we shall expect the remaining four within a few weeks. We think our readers will not be dissatisfied with us for giving them two such able discourses in a single number of THE INDEX, though our occasional contributors may feel that scant justice is meted out to themselves. Many excellent communications from the latter are on hand, all of which we should be glad to print; but the demands upon our space increase so rapidly that it is impossible to insert all that are sent for publication.

SIGN THE PETITION!

As the best response we can devise to the suggestion of numerous friends, we send to each one of our subscribers this week an INDEX EXTRA, that every liberal who is willing to work for his principles may procure signatures to the petition against the adoption of the Christian Amendment of the U. S. Constitution, and forward them to Toledo. Copies will be sent to any who may desire to use them. Names of signers are rapidly coming in, accompanied with rousing words and promises of vigorous work. Be prompt. Make it a point of honor to have your name on this first petition against the audacious attempt to crush out religious liberty in America. Let treason to humanity fall dead at its birth, riddled through and through with the bullets of indignant freemen!

PROF. JOHN TYNDALL.

The following letter has been sent to us by Prof. Tyndall for publication:—

[LONDON], 21st December, 1871.

DEAR SIR,—I have been away from London, laid up with a hurt, and also excessively occupied under these unfavorable conditions. My reply to your friendly letter has been thus retarded.

It would give me sincere pleasure to lend you the aid you require, if it were in my power to do so. But unhappily it is not.

To do any work of permanent value in this modern Babylon, I find it absolutely necessary to shut up my eyes against the numberless temptations that offer themselves to cause me to swerve from my proper work.

I suppose I have already had this year fifty such requests as yours. And they come to me backed by inducements which are usually found available; but I do not undertake any work of the kind.

I hope these considerations will acquit me in your eyes of all unkindness, or want of sympathy with the earnest work which you have taken in hand.

I am, dear sir, faithfully yours,

JOHN TYNDALL.

It would have been especially gratifying, if the brilliant author of "Fragments of Science for the Unscientific People" could have accepted our invitation to express in THE INDEX his independent views on the relations of science and religion. But it is also gratifying to be assured that his courteous declination of it is not prompted by any "want of sympathy" with the work to which THE INDEX is devoted. The time has hardly come yet when men of science will consider it to be strictly in the line of their "proper work" to give attention to such topics as we suggested. It is said that English scientific men generally look with jealousy, and even ill-will, on those of their number who, like Prof. Tyndall and Prof. Huxley, endeavor to popularize science by imparting its results to the unscientific world in a graceful, attractive, and untechnical manner,—on the ground that it is unworthy of the high dignity of science to coin its truths into money and reputation. Some of this displeasure is doubtless to be credited to the envy felt by those who are conscious of being deficient in literary ability and skill, and of thus being debarred from such dazzling rewards. But some of it is also to be attributed to the wide-spread notion that science and literature, much more science and religion, have nothing whatever in common. It will be a long time, perhaps, before this absurd Chinese wall is thoroughly broken down. The day is approaching, however, when it will be seen how intimately related are the fundamental ideas of religion and science, and how profoundly they are coming to anastomose and blend. The remarkable declaration of Sir William Thompson, which we quoted a few weeks ago in these pages, that "science is bound by the everlasting law of honor to face every problem which can be fairly presented to it," though doubtless not intended to bear the widest interpretation that might be put upon the words, nevertheless stands as one of those prophetic utterances which the future will fill with the deepest significance. The day will come when scientific men will confess that science is indeed "bound by the everlasting law of honor" to take up and solve, so far as solution is possible, the great problems of religion. It will then appear to be a part of the "special work" of every such mind as that of Prof. Tyndall, which is peculiarly fitted in some respects to deal fairly with these problems, to give them the grave consideration they are at present denied. But we acquiesce cheerfully, though with a degree of disappointment, in the decision which he has made for the present concerning his own special task; and our readers must content themselves with such glimpses of his deeper thought as he permits in his fascinating books. It does not require a specially practised eye to read there some of the ground-principles of free religious thought.

THE CHRISTIAN CONSPIRACY.

The Cincinnati Israelite, edited by Rabbi Isaac M. Wise, has the following sharp paragraph:—

We can not tell why Justice Strong should not be impeached and removed from his office. He has perjured himself. Entering upon his office, he took a solemn oath to support the Constitution of the United States, but has never ceased to conspire with a band called the National Association to abolish the Constitution and replace it by another without civil and religious liberty.

Judge Strong has undoubtedly a right to advocate an amendment of the United States Constitution, to be made in accordance with the legal provisions of the Constitution itself. He has not sworn to seek no improvement of it, and could not be technically convicted of perjury. But Dr. Wise is substantially correct notwithstanding. The proposed change, as we said recently, contemplates more than an ordinary amendment, and, if consummated, would amount to a total revolution of the government. Whoever advocates the change proposes, not an amendment looking to the more perfect carrying-out of existing constitutional principles, but to a reversal of these principles themselves. No man can favor the Christian Amendment without declaring at the same time his hostility to religious liberty; for the first effect of such an amendment would be to disqualify for office all but Christian believers, and thus to introduce a religious test of office which would practically make Christianity the established religion of the land by throwing all political power into the hands of "Christians."

Such a step would be in direct violation of the Constitution as it is. Judge Strong and his fellow-conspirators (no other word will accurately describe them) are seeking constitutionally to destroy the Constitution. More shrewd than the fire-eating slaveholders of a dozen years ago, they do not secede from the Union to found a new slave-empire; but they seek to overthrow our free government, and to build up a religious slave-empire in its stead, by means of a pacific revolution rather than by means of force. If not technically traitors to the republic, they are nevertheless practically traitors to republican principles. In saying this, we mean to cast no reflection upon the honesty or uprightness of their intentions. Like multitudes of the Confederate soldiers, they believe themselves to be in the right. But their belief, which is the constant application of Christian ideas to civil government, shows that Christianity is itself unconstitutional, and can never be adapted to democratic institutions. The irreconcilable antagonism between the Christian religion and republican principles will be forced on public attention as never before by this fanatical movement; and thus the day of universal liberty, spiritual as well as political, will be proportionately hastened. When the agitation comes to a fair issue between Christianity and the United States Constitution, we have no fears of the result. The only danger is in premature action on the proposed amendment. To avert this, let there be the fullest discussion and the promptest protest. Every man who believes in free popular government should send his name at once for enrolment on the list of signatures to the counter-petition published in our INDEX EXTRA.

THE INDEX is not the "official organ" of the Free Religious Association, which has no such organ at all. Neither does it publish the Horticultural Hall lectures "officially"—the conditions of publication having been privately arranged by Mr. Halliwell, as a representative of the Index Association, with the individual lecturers. The F. R. A. has no more control over these lectures than it has over THE INDEX itself. The fact that individual members of the F. R. A. write for THE INDEX does not establish any relation whatever between the paper and the F. R. A. as an Association. The New York Independent will oblige all concerned by representing facts as they are.

The Pittsburgh (Pa.) Commercial asserts that Prof. Huxley has renounced rationalism—probably on no better evidence than supports the story of Thomas Paine's conversion on his death-bed. The tide of conversion sets the other way.

ATTENTION, FRIENDS!

The members of the Free Religious Association are reminded that the Constitution asks for an annual payment of one dollar as a fee for retaining active membership. From many persons whose names stand on the record as members this payment is now due. All who make the payment before (or at) the next Annual Meeting, will receive the annual Report of the Association for 1872 free, as soon as it is printed. To all new members who will pay their dollar before the next Annual Meeting (May 30), we will send also the Report for 1871 without additional cost. And to all new members who in addition to the membership fee of one dollar will send us Fifty Cents, we will return post-paid the four back Reports. Let all who believe in the Association put themselves on its roll of members. And let not our friends forget that the Association has a Treasurer. It does not ask for much money, but the little it does ask for it wants, and it could use to advantage much more than it gets. For what objects it wants money, its annual Reports bear witness. Address the undersigned, New Bedford, Mass., or Richard P. Hallowell, the Treasurer, 98 Federal St., Boston.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary F. R. Association.

A PUZZLE.

Religious people, or rather sectarian people, of all descriptions, have, from time immemorial, taken on themselves the task of shouldering some intellectual or moral burden,—carrying, as it were, some old man of the sea that they could gently lay down, if they chose, and would certainly lay down, if they consulted not their personal ease only, but their spiritual health, their reputation among reasonable men, or even their success as an organization framed for the purpose of converting the many to their opinions. It was an early church teacher who laid down the doctrine that belief was meritorious in proportion to its difficulty, and was truly saving only when it defied reason, scouted evidence, and clung to what was to the simply human intelligence flatly incredible. The assertion, "credo quia impossibile est,"—I believe, not in spite of its being impossible, but because it is impossible,—has become a maxim with "Christians" of every denominational school. The Romanists will let all the philosophers go rather than relax the terms of the dogma of transubstantiation. The Orthodox Protestants will drive the metaphysicians wild and exasperate all people of common understanding rather than loosen their definition of the Trinity. What makes the doctrine a stumbling-block to the outside world is its recommendation to the believer. It is as if one were to regard a lump of lead as a life-preserver, or the tons of overweight in ballast in the light of a needed sail. The mystery is sacred, though it kill the religion. We have read of a preacher who made it a rule to have in every sermon at least one passage that none of his hearers could understand. He thought the practice calculated to give them an exalted opinion of his wisdom and a humble one of their own.

Is this the reason why the dogmatists will persist in keeping on hand some tough, indigestible morsel which they require their adherents to swallow before they can enjoy the repast of wholesome truth? They would give the neophyte a solid stone to try his teeth on, as a preparation for the meaty nuts they have in store.

Our curiosity on this subject has been piqued afresh by our friends the Unitarians, who feel moved to adopt the old practice, and who, as is natural, seem to be overdoing it. The proposition they throw down is that the New Testament has not been seriously affected by the criticism of the last half century, French, German and English; that its genuineness and authenticity are unimpaired; that its miraculous stories are still to be believed in spite of historians and men of science, and are not to be separated from the moral and spiritual parts of the book. This means, if we understand the Liberal Christian, that the Golden Rule rests on the same evidence with the resurrection; that one must not accept the beatitudes unless he is prepared to accept the story of Christ's walking on the sea.

This is bold, and, on the old rule—"credo quia impossibile est"—is admirable. No better stumbling-block could be invented. But the ancient riddle remains—why invent a stumbling-block at all? What is the rationale of the stumbling-block? Where is the wisdom of the stumbling-block? After all the trouble good men have been at to remove such from the inquirer's path, to relieve the gospels of their inconsistencies by a more intelligent theory of their origin, to account for the marvels in them on rational grounds, to detach the moral truths from their mythical integument, to clear the young religion from all responsibility for scientific, historical and philosophical blunders, and to show it in its spiritual beauty,—what can be the design of men who pile the stones up again, and, as if not content with that, affirm that they have never been disturbed and never will be; that, in fact, they are no difficulties, but helps, props, facilities, and attractions? Certainly it was easier to understand, appreciate and admire the religion after the critics had recovered it from the rubbish-heap that had gathered about it; men of learning, culture, and intelligence were becoming attracted to it; the heart got at it without trouble; and it was finding its way to hearts that were entrenched behind picket fences of intellectual scepticism. The emancipated and rescued faith was doing its proper work on the affections and dispositions of men. Why check this apparently desirable career? Why warn off the thinkers and men of knowledge a second time? The question is easy to ask, but hard to answer. To us it is impossible to answer. The course to us looks suicidal. But so did the course of the Protestants respecting the Trinity. So did the course of the Romanists respecting transubstantiation. These matters, however, could not be tested by scientific and historical demonstration, as everything pertaining to the New Testament can be. It is hard to rout an error out of the region of metaphysics. But the Unitarians cling to their mystery in the very face of knowledge. What does it mean? The riddle is too deep for us. We give it up.

O. B. F.

FOR WHAT END?

Some lukewarm friends of the free religious movement sometimes ask—"Of what use are your Conventions and lectures? You only get together a company of people who are already in sympathy with you and who are entertained for a little while with a presentment of their own beliefs; or if any others are drawn to your meetings, they are so fixed in their own beliefs that you make no impression upon them, unless it be to force them into stiffer antagonism. Why not leave things to be gradually and quietly improved by the steady and sure advance of knowledge and a higher culture?"

Two little incidents connected with the recent Conventions of the Free Religious Association in Detroit and Syracuse will, perhaps, help to answer this question. In one of these cities, at the table of my hospitable host, I was introduced to a gentleman who was evidently a man of fine intelligence and generous culture, as well as a very genial talker. From his conversation in the dining-room and parlor I judged that he was a scientific man,—perhaps a state geologist or a professor in some college. (His name and title had slipped my ear in the ceremony of introduction). He seemed to have travelled much in the far West and to understand the country scientifically. He showed an interesting knowledge of the Indian tribes; and in various ways manifested that he was acquainted with the affairs of the world and was also a reader of books.

Our host made some inquiries of me with regard to the session of the Convention from which I had just come, but the remarks did not seem to attract this other gentleman's attention at all, and the conversation took a more general turn. An hour or two later, as we were riding down town together and the Convention chanced to be mentioned again, the gentleman turned to me and asked, "What is this convention you are attending? Of what denomination is it?" The reply was, "It is a meeting of the Free Religious Association, and has no sectarian connections." His former question was one of courtesy, but evidently his interest was now awakened, as he quickly asked, "What, is it a new religious movement? I don't happen to have heard of it. What are its principles, its tenets?" I answered, "It is rather difficult to explain its position in a few words. But it is a society that opposes sectarianism and all authority of creeds as bonds of fellowship, and believes in the fullest freedom of thought and inquiry on all religious matters. It represents the progressive tendencies that are developing in all the sects, and not only in all the sects of Christendom but in the different religions of the world; and seeks to bring about a fellowship on the basis of free thought and humane work." "Ah! I am interested in that," said he; "I believe in that idea, and I wish I had time to talk with you more about it and to go into your meeting." We soon reached his destination, and he alighted from the carriage. Inquiring of my host about him, I then learned that he belonged to the legal profession,—that he had a high and wide reputation for legal ability, and now occupied an important judicial position. "And what is his religious position?" I asked. "Pretty much the same as yours and mine, I guess," was the reply; "he doesn't make occasion to say much about his religious opinions, but he evidently has no great faith in what the churches teach, and in substance, if he were called to define himself, I think he wouldn't be far from us."

Now this gentleman represents a large class of people of intelligence, of culture, of influence, of high position, who are connected nominally, perhaps, with some one of the popular sects, who may own a pew in some church which some members of the family may occupy on Sunday, but who have really no belief left in the doctrines and institutions of the church.

And the conventions, publications, lectures, incident to the free religious movement, are bringing to the attention of this class of people another aspect of religion,—another kind of faith and fellowship,—which commends itself to their reason and to their hearts. Let them hear of a rational and liberal effort at solving the problems of religion, something that is in harmony with the scientific and humane spirit of the age, and, like this gentleman to whom I have referred, they will welcome it; and many of them will take hold with it and help it forward, as containing a promise of vital good for mankind. And it is not true that the free religious meetings only bring together those that already understand the movement and are in sympathy with it—these and a few avowed antagonists. There are always likely to be present some of this class just mentioned; or, if not present, they learn through the newspapers and in other ways something of what the meetings are for. And this class can readily answer the question—"For what end are the Conventions?"

The other incident is this. At one of the Conventions I noticed, session after session, in a front seat, an elderly gentleman, who from the beginning to the close sat with his eyes fixed on the speakers and drinking in as with all his mind and soul their utterances. He was one who in certain wealthy and fashionable circles would probably not be called "gentleman," but simply man,—which, as things go, is, however, quite as honorable a title. He was, it is probable, a farmer, or shoemaker, or blacksmith. His hands bore marks of toil. His clothes were neat, but not of the latest style; were made for warmth and comfort, very likely by his own wife, and not for fashion. But he had an honest, thoughtful, and kind face. He was clearly one of the substantial voters of the country who in close political emergencies are relied upon to vote down the rascality of cities.

At the end of the afternoon session of the second day, this gentleman came to me to put down his name as a member of the Free Religious Association and to purchase such of its publications as were on the platform. Having a little talk with him, I learned, as I had surmised, that he had come from the country several miles to attend the Convention. Said he, "I don't get a chance to hear such views as these very often. I never had a chance to attend just such a meeting before. But I have been thinking these things by myself a good many years." Supposing from his making his purchases then that he was about to leave for home, I said, "You will not be at the meeting this evening?" "O yes, I shall," he replied; "I wouldn't miss any of it for nothing; I shall have to live on this for a long time; I don't go to any of the meetings of the sects, though there are enough of them all about me; I can't get anything there that is food."

This man, too, represents a large class of people in America,—people who have not had much opportunity for culture, but have a keen logical faculty and large common sense, and who have reasoned themselves all away from the popular notions of theology and religion. They read, perhaps, years ago Paine's "Age of Reason" and Volney's "Ruins." Later some of the discourses of Theodore Parker came in their way. And they have a little choice corner for their two or three books of this kind in their houses to-day. They believe in liberty, in reason, in the freest investigation. They have read the Bible, but not so much for devotion as for criticism. Yet they are better versed in it than many clergymen. They are doubters, they are deniers, perhaps,—they may be called infidels and atheists; but they are honest seekers after truth. And this class, many of them, are welcoming what the free religious conventions and publications are bringing to them, as the bread of life. They hear an idea of Supreme Power expressed which they can accept. They do not object to the religious spirit when it appears in a rational and humane form. They long for fellowship, and they find it.

Again the question, "What for?" is answered, by the honest country mechanic or farmer on the front seat.

W. J. P.

We are requested to announce that there will be Paine Celebrations in Salem, O., and in St. Joseph, Mo. Mr. B. F. Underwood gives the oration at Salem. Probably there will be similar celebrations all over the country on January 20, the anniversary of Mr. Paine's birthday. There will certainly be one in Toledo. We cordially sympathize with such celebrations, provided the respect paid to the great principles for which Mr. Paine so bravely labored does not degenerate into man-worship; in which case it would take a microscope to distinguish between Christianity and free religion. Thomas Paine was a moral hero, and will be long remembered as one of the representative men of his age; and though we should certainly decline to echo all his opinions, it would not be because they are unpopular, but because they are crude, when tested by the better scholarship of the present day. Modern thought occupies in many respects a more advanced and radical position than his; but mankind will never cease to honor his memory while ability, courage, self-sacrifice, and moral worth command their reverence. So far as he is hoisted and vilified for his staunch protest against the Christian religion as a great dominant system, we would take our stand by his side, and accept our share of his unpopularity; but we mortgage ourselves to no master, exercise the right of thinking independently, and assume responsibility for no man's opinions but our own.

The Radical for January has the following table of contents:—A. D. 11,001, $30, by J. Vila Blake; Jewels, by D. A. Wasson; Home and Social Life, by Arethusa Hall; My Cheer; Suggestions Concerning Marriage, by C. K. Whipple; Those we Honor, by William Branton; British and American Associations of Science, by J. S. Patterson; Teaching for Doctrines the Commandments of Men, by A. Y. W.; The Sufficient Authority, by Paul Wald; Timothy Tot, by F. G. Fairfield; Notes; 1872.

A Radical Extra states that about $5,000 have been subscribed towards the new Radical Association, and expresses a hope, with which we heartily sympathize, that the required $25,000 will be all subscribed within a month. There can be no doubt that religious radicalism in this country requires a monthly magazine as well as a weekly paper, and it is certainly wealthy enough to support both. Send your subscription to Hon. Isaac Ames, Boston, Mass., or to the office of The Radical, 25 Bromfield St., Boston. Each share is $100, payable ten per cent. a year.

According to the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, Prof. William N. Rice, of Middletown University, gave a lecture recently in a Baptist Church on "Natural Law and Special Providence." Special providences, so-called, were in his view manifestations of natural law. Such a position is that of a man with one foot on the old and the other foot on the new. There is nothing special in the working of universal or natural law. The Professor cannot have his cake, and eat it, too. If he believes in natural law, he surrenders all "speciality" in his "special providences." If he believes in special providences, his fancied belief in natural law only shows that he does not yet comprehend what natural law means.

We are continually embarrassed by the receipt of long articles from occasional correspondents. They would not only show a reasonable appreciation of the narrowness of our limits, but also save themselves the annoyance of having their articles declined, by remembering that brevity is a great virtue. We have not discovered the art of pouring the Atlantic Ocean into a tea-cup.

He who, worsted in argument, revenges his defeat by resorting to slander, shows that his heart is as bad as his head is weak.

[For THE INDEX.]

"WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST?"

SERMON BY THE REV. C. VOYSEY, AT ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LONDON, OCT. 29, 1871.

"What think ye of Christ?" MATTHEW xxii: 42.

I have been specially requested to make this question the subject of one or more discourses; and although it interferes somewhat with a plan which I had laid down, there are many reasons for considering this very important matter at once.

It is my desire to deal with the question with due solemnity—not to allow myself to forget that to the large majority of my countrymen the name of Christ is as the name of God, and that many who call themselves Christians and who at the same time deny the Godhead of Jesus, regard him as occupying a very lofty place of super-human dignity. But while, on every ground, some regard is due to the religious feelings of others, a far higher regard is due to truth. While we would not willingly shock tender sensibilities nor outrage pious sentiment, we must not shrink from the infliction of temporary pain which we firmly believe will conduce to higher and lasting happiness. The world, and especially that part of it which is called the Church, has suffered long, but never more than at this moment, from unworthy equivocations and from studied silences. Hundreds of excellent people, clergyman and ministers of all denominations, continue to use phrases which already possess a definite popular value in a private sense of their own; and the result is that they contrive to leave their congregations under the false impression that they and the preacher think exactly alike. If the preacher honestly believes that this kind of teaching can advance his hearers one step, he is utterly mistaken. If he thinks he is preserving the worn-out coin in putting a new stamp of his own upon it, he will be doing his best to encourage false weights and measures, and unconsciously to deprave the intellectual vigor of those who listen to him.

Not in this way must we deal with the greatest theological question of the day. We must have no mental reservations—no pious frauds—not the very shadow of equivocation. If we are wrong, and Christendom is right, our great plainness of speech will enable the Orthodox the more easily to refute our errors; while those who listen to us will never be able to reproach us with the concealment or the disguise of our real opinions.

The question, "What think ye of Christ?" must be prefaced by another, namely: "What do we know about him?" And this again leads to the inquiry, "What are the sources of our knowledge of Christ?" This last inquiry I will endeavor to answer first.

The sole sources of our knowledge of Christ are the New Testament, and tradition. The former is a collection of writings purporting to give us the history of Jesus and some of the sayings and doings of himself and of his early followers. The latter, i. e., tradition, is embodied in the creeds and practices of the organized society called the Church, which professes to have been established by Jesus himself, to have gathered all its doctrines, its rites and ceremonies from the same authority, and to be, at this day and hour, under the supernatural guidance and teaching of the glorified and deified Jesus himself. These two authorities, namely, the Bible and the Church, are, as every one knows, held in different estimation as authorities by different sections of Christendom.

Some put the Bible before the Church, others put the Church before the Bible; but both are agreed in admitting that, without either the one or the other, we should have known nothing whatever of Jesus Christ.

We must remember this. It is an important fact. No claim is ever set up that we know of Jesus, as we know of God, by intuition. No one has ever been so bold as to say that a belief in Jesus as God is part of natural religion. On the contrary, this entire absence of Christ from the conclusions of natural theology, and the utter incongruity of the idea of God becoming incarnate with the natural religious sentiments, have been dwelt upon by the advocates of revealed religion as one of its greatest recommendations. Believers in revelation point with pride to the fact that, on this great central belief in the God-man, Nature and the human heart are absolutely silent. "How would you have ever known," they ask triumphantly, "how would you have ever known that God came down from heaven to save a ruined world, without the agency of the New Testament or the Church to reveal the tidings?" Nothing can be more satisfactory than the admission which is thus made. It saves endless controversy about adaptation to man's needs, and so forth, and brings us close to the point at issue. "Is the Bible, or is the Church, or is neither of them, to be depended upon for strict accuracy in their respective accounts of what Jesus was, of what he did, and of what he said?"

To answer (1) as regards the Church. Which of all the churches do you mean, from the primitive church downwards to the Swedenborgian church of the New Jerusalem? Is it Eastern or Western—Episcopal or Presbyterian? So on we might ask, through the three hundred sects of Christendom. Suppose that we have at last found the true church established by Jesus, and that her credentials are beyond suspicion. How much can this church tell us about Jesus Christ that we are bound to believe without question? They will begin by saying that he was God; that he was born without a human father; that he wrought miracles, rose again from the dead, and with his human body, with flesh, bones, and all things appertaining to the completeness of man's nature, ascended into heaven, and is now sitting on a throne at the right hand of God. Well, all this, we say, may be true, though it appears very unlikely; but how do you guarantee the truth of any one of your statements? I am quite willing to believe anything on sufficient evidence. I only want to be furnished with the proofs of all these wonderful things. The Church answers, "All these things were believed and duly attested by the earliest followers and most intimate companions of Jesus, who handed them down through their early converts, through their bishops and elders, generation after generation, unchanged, till they have reached us."

But supposing, I say, that you have received in this manner exactly what the companions of Jesus believed and no more, how do you know that they were not mistaken? "Oh," says the Church, "they could not have been mistaken, they led such holy lives and died as witnesses for the truth of what they affirmed." But, if my memory does not fail me, many men who have led holy lives have been miserably deluded in some of their opinions. Martyrs by the hundred can be brought forward who died in defence of exactly opposite and contradictory beliefs. Opposite churches took it in turns to kill and be killed. So that holiness of life goes for very little, and the proof of infallibility from martyrdom goes for nothing at all. Your assertion, then, of the absolute credibility of the earliest followers of Jesus is of no more weight as evidence than your assertion that Jesus went up bodily into the sky. If you go on to affirm that the case was exceptional, and that Jesus, being God, infallibly inspired his apostles to say that he was God, you are only arguing in a circle, and we end where we began, without reasonable proof of one of your assertions.

The argument drawn from the honesty of the apostles is, I believe, exploded, as only the most ill-informed and foolish of dogmatists will venture to say that, if Jesus and the apostles were not all that they are represented to be, therefore they were rogues and impostors. The disrespect of this assumption, unwarrantable as it is, is only surpassed by its ignorance.

But the Church will say, "Look at my wonderful and rapid growth and my conquest of paganism; my triumphs over barbarism, my fruits of civilization!" To this one can only reply that, were the triumphs of Christendom a hundred-fold more than they have been; were there no dark corners in the Church's fold, no blood-stains on her once cruel hands, no dying yells of outraged Jew and murdered Indian mingling with her jubilee, no stone of stumbling nor rock of offence in her feeble obstructions to the progress of science, nor breath of hatred, malice and all uncharitableness in her toothless maledictions, still all her finest achievements and purest virtues could never bear witness as to a matter of fact—could never supply even presumptive evidence for that which can alone be attested independently of herself. The painter might as well try to prove that one of his remote ancestry excelled in the art of music by the mere exhibition of his own latest masterpiece. There is no logical connection whatever between the claims made by or for Jesus and the very highest achievements of the Church.

Moreover (though it is a branch of our inquiry which we cannot now follow) the pretensions of the Church can be matched over and over again in the histories of the rise and progress of other great religions in the world besides Christianity. If the argument from success be admitted at all, it only proves too much.

So far, then, as the Church or churches of Christendom are to be trusted, we can get no evidence from them worthy of the name sufficiently trustworthy to be depended upon for an accurate account of the nature and history of Jesus Christ. For evidence, we get only assumptions.

A great deal of this that I have said respecting the church applies equally to those who present the New Testament to us on false pretences—i. e., as a Divine and infallible record of actual facts. But the New Testament itself must be considered on its own grounds. With the sole exception of the book of Revelation, which condemns itself by its own temper and anathemas, not one of the New Testament writings makes any claim of Divine origin. The author of the third gospel and of the Acts of the Apostles expressly sets forth the human sources from which he obtained his information; while the fourth gospel is supplemented by a verse (John xxi: 24) from a hand not that of the disciple John himself. "This is the disciple which testifieth of these things; and we (i. e., the writer and others) know that his testimony is true." This is the most decided expression which I can remember to occur in all the gospels and Acts of the Apostles, approaching to a claim even for accuracy. There is not the shadow of a shade of a claim that the writings are infallibly true, nor that they were written under Divine inspiration. I think this fact in itself furnishes an additional reason why we should give to the historical parts of the New Testament due consideration. They do not insult our understandings by any preposterous claim. When or by whom they were written, no one can say with certainty. All that is certainly known is that the oldest copies of them which are now in existence were written three hundred years after the events which they profess to record. These copies may or may not be faithful, may or may not have tallied with the originals which are now lost. At all events, we cannot go further back for evidence than that late date; for although some early writers may contain quotations of the words of our oldest manuscripts, this fact could not guarantee that the whole of the rest of the books from which they quoted stands correctly copied in our manuscripts. It would go to give weight to a probability, and that is all. The external evidence, then, for the literal accuracy of the New Testament histories is next to nothing, and we are therefore driven to weigh the historical claims of the books from a consideration of their contents. What internal evidence, then, do we find that the writers of the first five books of the New Testament are giving us authentic and trustworthy history?

To answer this important question, several essays have been already written, and the subject is not even yet exhausted. The "English Life of Jesus," published by Mr. Scott, of Ransgate, is perhaps the best of all. It would carry us too far away from our main line to examine minutely the books of the New Testament referred to. Suffice it to say, as a summing-up of the careful analysis and criticism of learned men, that these New Testament narratives have some basis of fact; that there really was such a person as Jesus of Nazareth; that his life was, according to the standard of those times, extremely pure and beneficent; that he made himself obnoxious to the Jewish authorities of the age, who secured his condemnation by the Roman Governor on the accusation that he was dangerous to the Empire.

These bald outlines are common to all the books, and may fairly be trusted as historical. But, beyond that, a careful reader will observe endless contradictions and discrepancies, of such a nature as to exclude the idea that the writers were sufficiently acquainted with the ordinary facts of the life of Jesus to justify the use of the term historical in speaking of their conflicting accounts. In other words, they cannot all be true at the same time; and we have no certain way of discovering which writer speaks the truth, when two or more of them give contradictory accounts of the same event. Now if their writings only set forth events such as are commonly or even rarely occurring amongst ourselves, but at all events actually occurring, we should even then be compelled to distrust their accuracy; but when, in addition to such ordinary matters as whether Jesus was crucified on a Friday or on a Thursday, whether the genealogies of Christ's lineage from David in Matthew and Luke can be reconciled with each other, or either of them with Old Testament records, we have to accept tales of magic and miracle utterly foreign to general human experience and in some cases purposely puerile, we are impelled by the very constitution of our own minds to distrust the books a hundred times more than ever, and to doubt almost whether there be a grain of fact at the bottom of so much palpable fiction.

But I use the word "fiction" not in a sense derogatory of the honor of the writers. That these books were not written by men who knew Jesus personally, cannot be doubted; and therefore they wrote from second-hand—aye, third and fourth-hand, if you like—no one knows how long after Jesus and his followers had been dead and buried. But whoever wrote them may have written honestly what had been told them, what had become the floating and perpetually growing legendary traditions about a very remarkable and remarkably kind and good man.

What would not one give for a Peter, a James, or a John to come forward and tell us the simple life of Christ as he saw it and understood it?

But we possess not one single fragment of writing upon which we can lay our hands, and say with absolute confidence—this at least is a perfectly true, uncorrupted statement of some part of the history or sayings of Jesus, written by one who knew and saw and heard him, who was not under any delusion at the time, and who wrote in perfect good faith. You will perceive, then, that the only sources of our knowledge of Christ are untrustworthy, deeply, hopelessly untrustworthy, and that we are driven to almost mere guessing to form any conception of him at all.

Our time is now all but exhausted—our work this morning as unwelcome as any work could be; but it is necessary, in attempting to answer the question, "What think ye of Christ?" to show first of all that almost whatever we think of Christ is equally without historical foundation, that we have no evidence worthy of the name to suggest the Church's claim as to his nature, his character, his deeds, and his sayings. Probability more or less strong is all we can attain unto on this point. Nor will it avail anything to appeal to the endurance of Christianity in proof of the truth of the gospels. Brahminism was almost driven out of India by Buddhism one thousand years or so before Christ; but Brahminism recovered from the shock, drove Buddha beyond her walls, and resumed her primeval sway, and has a history at least three thousand years old. Buddhism in turn has conquered eastern Asia, and with 400,000,000 of believers bids defiance to the waves of Christianity, which break in ripples on her wide-spread shore. Mahometanism, too, beaten back from Western Europe by the monogamy of Northern races, has won vast populations in India before whom Christianity kneels in vain.

It only remains for me to say this morning that it was absolutely necessary to clear the ground for the proper consideration of our thoughts about Christ. It is true beyond question that no absolute reliance can be placed either on the teachings of the Church or on the New Testament narratives; but it is equally true that a man of surpassing goodness, and possessing the very genius of true religion, lived and died in Judea about eighteen centuries ago; that his life and death exercised, and still exercise, a vast power over millions of men and women; that in spite of the exaggeration of an almost pardonable idolatry, in spite also of the clouds of incredible myth in which his biography has been shrouded, there still remains a residuum of substantial fact, and a valuable contribution to the religious and moral principles of mankind, which only a bigoted scepticism would ignore, and which, as devout Theists, we are as much bound to recognize and to use as we are bound to reject and denounce the falsehood and superstition which have been mixed up with the sober truth.

Next Sunday I shall hope to bring before you certain principles which should guide us in forming an opinion as to the nature and character of Jesus Christ. This will give us an opportunity of explaining the grounds on which we reject, not only the orthodox belief that he was equal with God, but also the Arian belief that he was more than man. A discourse like this is in my opinion like offering a stone to one who wants bread; but now and then such discourses are absolutely necessary, and I trust it will not have been altogether without spiritual nourishment, if it should lead a single doubting or inquiring heart to the Father's foot-stool with this petition—"Lead me in Thy truth, and teach me; be Thou also my guide, and lead me for Thy Name's sake."

[FOR THE INDEX.]

LONGFELLOW'S CHRIST.

BY REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE.

We have read the little volume of 150 pages which Mr. Longfellow calls "The Divine Tragedy," with sincere sympathy for that Jesusism which has come at last to this! Only the shrunken letter of the old story, decently and tenderly laid out, a beautiful corpse, with a few fresh, sweet flowers cast about the forever still and lifeless form. The brief introductory sketch of THE PROPHECY, which ascribes to him no sort of Jesusism, but rather humane sentiment, lonely antagonism to the world of creed and church, and undaunted passion for the truth, is redolent of the freshest radicalism of to-day, the bravest sweetness that blossoms in the newest gardens of human faith and life. Mr. Longfellow's angel at first assigns only this reason to the prophet for God's choice of him to bear his divine word to man:

"Lo! as I passed on my way
In the harvest field, I beheld thee,
When no man compelled thee,
Bearing with blue own hands
This food to the famishing reapers."

Beautiful was it in the Lord's sight,
To behold his Prophet
Feeding those that toil,
The tillers of the soil."

Is not this a sufficiently simple recognition of the radical principle that to walk in love is to be a true man of God? And do not the following lines apply quite as well to Theodore Parker as to Habakkuk?

"Alas! how full of fear
Is the fate of Prophet and Seer!
Forevermore, forevermore,
It shall be as it hath been heretofore:
The age in which they live
Will not forgive
The splendor of the everlasting light,
That makes their foreheads bright,
Nor the sublime
Fore-running of their time."

The more particular answer of the angel to the prophet's question why he has "Chosen to this place,

To this exalted part," admirably states just the ground on which we should to-day announce the seeker for truth as heir of all the inspiration of the world:

"Because thou art
The Struggler; and from thy youth
Thy humble and patient life
Hath been a strife
And battle for the Truth;
Nor hast thou passed nor halted,
Nor over in thy pride
Turned from the poor souls,
But with deed and word and pen,
Hast served thy fellow-men;
Therefore art thou exalted."

This is a garland which anybody is welcome to lay on the head of a dead superstition; only let us understand that between the life of the one and the death of the other there is absolute contrast. So of several parts of the funeral decency devised by Mr. Longfellow, such as the striking figure of Menahem the Essene, and the beautiful pathos of the Magdalen's account of herself, and numbers of slighter touches throughout the volume, they all stand in contrast to the actual recital, which merely lays out the lifeless text, as living flowers in a coffin to the beautiful countenance of death.

Death is nearly always touching with a beauty of its own. Dead Jesusism, washed and dressed and decked by the tender hands of Mr. Longfellow, has a charm, albeit it lies so still, so pale, so dead. The grime of Galilee is clean washed away. Not only are large parts of what has been called the sacred story removed here, but Mr. Longfellow judiciously cleans some of the more earthy words of Jesus. Thus at p. 85 the answer of his CERNUS to Peter's question, what they are to have for following him, is given by Mr. Longfellow in two words—"Eternal life." The actual answer of Jesus was, "a hundred fold more in the time which now is" of "houses, or brothers, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands," and afterwards to "inherit eternal life." Considering Mr. Longfellow's rule of exact literalism, we might be amazed at such an omission as this, but then we remember that everything must be forgiven to natural desire to make the dead decent. The wan figure of the spiritual worker of marvels, so slight, so frail, so miserably abunken, is carried gently to his burial in Mr. Longfellow's pages, with no more perhaps of decent fiction than befits such obsequies.

The lines of harsh intensity which are not smoothed out of the face, alone remain to tell how rude a fanatic the would-be Messiah was. The dark shadow of a peasant's passion, the deep hue of hot blood, are quite gone. Not a miracle swirls, not a nerve astir, in this pale figure of Christus, enshrouded without spices, a mere chilled corpse laid in the cold air of a poet's decent respect. What, for example, could be more suggestive of a dead Christ than the one not related as following the resurrection, the magic used to secure the disciples a great haul of fish! And from end to end of the volume, through all its scanty scenes, a colorless materialism prevails, acts of mere magic, vulgar dealing with spirits, as if this had been a necromancer in a small way, a boy-midion getting well enough grown to feel a vulgar ambition, and to faintly undertake a weak imitation of Judas of Galilee and John the Baptist, dauntless leaders of the populace.

For Jesusism it was just fate, but for Mr. Longfellow it was a pity thus to treat the story of Jesus. A poet should at least have made the lines of the familiar narrative swell with fresh inspiration, at least endeavoring to show that the story was one as near to the life of America as to that of ancient Judea. Giving rein to his imagination, not wildly but judiciously, he should have recast antique incident, not to set aside what those ancient eyes noted, but to add what a modern eye, anticipating the centuries, would have noted. Thus he might have told the marvellous tale as one now would tell it, if divine vision should give him to choose from a picture of every moment of that long past life. Not only that, but he might have viewed these facts in relation to their finer fruits in Christian history, sketching the result in the cause, and in the narrow mirror of a drop of the past viewing the imperial scene of militant Christendom dominating the career of mankind. A great poet would thus have effected something like a grand restoration of the faded and forlorn Christ of every day tradition, especially if he could have truly commanded a lofty inspiration, as well as a fine invention, and made his incidents invariably reflect the noblest intuitions of instructed and disciplined humanity, the grand daring of science, the profound passion of faith, the heroic pureness of charity.

That it did not occur to Mr. Longfellow to attempt this, shows how completely dead the tradition of Christ is in his hands. He reminds us of an incident of a visit we once made to that part of Southern Illinois which used to be called Egypt. We had been invited to take tea with a local patriarch, the eldest son of whom bore the distinguished name Christopher Columbus. After supper of fried pork and boiled potatoes, Christopher Columbus, a stout youth of twenty-one or two, did the honors of his father's mansion. In the best room hung the cheapest of lithographic presentations of the lackadaisical Christ of popular art. Stopping before this with a grand air, as of a discoverer lifting a veil from a mystery, Christopher Columbus said to us, "That is Jesus Christ; I've never seen him, but I've heard tell that he's a likely man." Mr. Longfellow has never seen the Lord Christ, nor had apparently the slightest personal interest in any of his supposed object; but echoes of common tradition have come to him, and a faint transcript of so-called sacred text seems likely to serve a purpose of verseness; so we have this little book. Mr. Bayard Taylor has gone into the newspapers with an account of Mr. Longfellow's plan for patching up a great work, with the title CERNUS, out of this and some former slight performances. We sincerely hope nothing of the kind will be attempted, in a way so utterly destructive of the dignity of the orthodox theme. Neither Mr. Longfellow nor anybody else can make a great work by patching together a few bits out of a scrap-book. This imperfection has had a grand history, and merits from poetry a nobler celebration than a gentle Unitarian sentimentalism is likely to give it in the old hours of his old age. We suppose, however, the melancholy gaieties of this funeral celebration must proceed. And doubtless "Christus" will appear as a picture book, to give it a little freshness of interest; and what between the pictures and the decent laying out of the literal Christ, a great many pious people will pay their money, and help to make the occasion highly satisfactory, at least to the poet and his publishers. Jesus is very cheap indeed now. Only a short time since, in a French of promise trial in an Illinois court, a lecherous ignoramus appeared in the character of a pious sinner, protesting in a love-letter his "love for the Lord seasons," and on all hands it passed as the joke of the season. Everybody is ready to trade on the popularity of the tradition of Jesus. Mr. Beecher is doing it, precisely as he wrote "Norwood" for Robert Bonner, turning an incompetent and mercenary hand to a "Life of Christ" as he turned it to a Ledger novel. Mr. Longfellow is a fine gentleman and a rare poet, and uses the story of Christ as reverently as any one could; but he merely uses it; he has no real business with it, no living and loving interest in it.

If there ever comes a great poet to freshen in new verse the antique story, he will come out of radical orthodoxy, with a greatness of theistic conception, and a boldness of humanitarian invention, quite impossible to the meek decency of a creed whose Lord Christ is neither man nor God. And such a poet will take up the old story not by its old incidents alone, but by the incidents of some new life which may be thought to have repeated closely the great Christ-example. If in "the least of these" on earth the Lord Christ walks among us, how much more in the greatest of those who have borne high the cross of labor and suffering!

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

THE INDEX.

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLDO OFFICE . . . NO. 90, ST. CLAIR ST
NEW YORK OFFICE . . . NO. 22, VESSEY ST

THE INDEX was established in November, 1899. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1870, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $3.50 and 72 cents postage. Only a limited number can be furnished.

LOCAL AGENTS

HENRY H. RICHARDSON & Co., 22 Vesey St., New York.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, 98 Federal St., Boston.
PARKER PILLSBURY, Salem, Ohio.

GENERAL AGENTS

A. E. BUTTS	New York City.
H. L. GREEN	Syracuse, N. Y.

Any person, acting as an agent for THE INDEX, may forward the names of NEW SUBSCRIBERS and retain Twenty per cent. of their SUBSCRIPTIONS.

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, O.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number.

PUBLICATIONS
OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucetta Mott, Prof. Dutton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 35 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 95 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (90 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's Essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (30 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. POTTER (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER,
Secretary

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. PROTHINGHAM, of New York City.

THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.

RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.

WILLIAM B. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.

Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.

Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
 Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the

Every Christian minister and every thinking church member

every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly exposition of the Bible.

Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which claims to weigh the issues.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,

Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

RIFLES, SHOT-GUNS, REVOLVERS, GUNS
Material. Write for Price List, to GREAT WEST
FIREARM WORKS, 100 N. 3rd St., St. Paul, Minn.

ARMY GUN WORKS, Pittsburgh, Pa. Army Guns, Revolvers
&c., bought or traded for. Agents Wanted. [88-108.]

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, JANUARY 27, 1872.

WHOLE No. 109.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARNOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS PROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VERA BEAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOYSEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MORCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio."

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1872.

RELIGION AS A SENTIMENT.

BY JOHN WEISS.

[Second Lecture in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, January 14, 1872.]

On some late occasions I have undertaken to point out what seems to me to be the essential element of Religion, by making the statement that it is a recognition of all the facts in the Universe, and a recurrence to them. But the word fact lays open the person who uses it to the charge of materialism, however spiritual the treatment may be of any subject which he has in hand. For the general mind adopts that word to denote things, quantities, occurrences, and objects of the world. A matter-of-fact man is one whose mental instinct appropriates the nearest things, however hard and juiceless. He has the stomach of those large wingless birds of Australia which swallow pebbles with a flavorous air that belongs to more exacting beaks. He adds figures correctly, and spends no money on fancy goods or causes. He walks all round a pump to find its handle, and does not pretend to get at water by plunging into the depths of his consciousness. Whatever tool offers itself conveniently to the hand is a fact; his palm is capacious and his fingers prehensile, but they are tethered to a shoulder. If anything spurs him the chagrin of confessing that he does not see it, he hails it for a reality. Whatever serves convenience and utility in mind or Nature is preferred by him to all the subtle thoughts and arts. If he meets anybody whose eye is in a fine frenzy rolling, he suggests an asylum to the relatives, and promptly offers his coupé for the journey back to common-sense. He has already clapped Deity itself into the strait-waistcoat of an actual concern. To him the infinite and the invisible are jugglers who make your money disappear, fill your hat with greens, and pretend to have endless coils of ribbon in their interior.

When, therefore, any one claims that facts are the substantial elements of Religion, he may be misunderstood to favor a priesthood of the counting-room, lyceum and philosophic chair, which might inculcate exactness in every science of living, and hold up for guidance, on either side of the Ten Commandments, catalogues of the objects and elements in the universe. Yet nothing is more sacred than a fact, as soon as its relation to divine intelligence is discovered. And religionists who think they observe materialism in every attempt to put all thinking and feeling upon the basis of Nature, ought to reflect that the greatest of all materialists is God himself, whose universe is a confession that pure spirit could not get along without an extension and an externality as large as itself is. So we do not discover spirit until we are brought up roundly by matter, which hits us a blow and sets our wits in motion. We grapple with this assailant which is constantly piquing us to tear off its mask, to see what this rough coquetting means.

All these brains by which we understand or misunderstand each other are collections of atoms in various stages of organization, and therefore related to natural forces in various and unequal degrees. Atoms whose structure is identical will coalesce and come to a mutual understanding. They repel and misinterpret other atoms whose structure offers an imperfect affinity, or exercises absolute repulsion. It is indisputable that our brains share this characteristic of matter, and trump up charges against each other, go into violent flirtations, or subside into steady organic attachments. We can neither love nor hate unless the gray cells furnish feeling with the material gesture of welcome or repulsion; and this necessity was predestined in the earliest fact of which the mind can take cognizance. At least, we have to assume that, when God chose to originate a universe, a first motion had to be made, a proceeding forth of all the contents of his being. This force which fled forth out of himself, still being essentially a part of himself, must depend upon him, and recur; so that it has also the quality of being a force that seeks him. All the possible things that lay unrealized in the divine unity are thus at the same moment expelled into a creation and recalled to a creator. And what we call matter, with all its properties, curves and movements, is the compromise of this going out and this returning. That decisive moment anticipated all our mental systems, and decided that the spiritualist must fly out to be arrested in all the facts, and to revolve with them; while the materialist must tend back in them, and recur towards ideal centres.

Religion would fain prolong that first creative ecstasy, by passing to and fro with Deity, outward into all the facts, back with all the facts to him.

Then the first question to be asked by Religion is, what are the facts? Mankind wishes to have a behavior such as the universe displays; not an artificial manner that is a mere whim of half-developed human brains, but a style so real that we may praise it, and say it is in shape a crystal, in hardness and color a diamond, and water in limpidness. Such behavior would be a fruitful event; not slag and clinkers, fused by passionate Etnas, and belched out as if the hot bluntness could excuse such ashes and refuse, such laying waste of arable districts, such intrusion of the hysteric vein into the mind's crystalline rock. The world itself is man's instructor in moral and spiritual demeanor, for it discriminates between its growths and its excesses, and lets the lava run through a vineyard as if on purpose to set off in relief the clear, warm drop that hangs in every grape, ripening to our taste, while that trail of sterile fury dangles hardening at the volcano's lip. Religion perceives at a glance the analogies that reach from the world to the human constitution; she clings for life to the elements which develop and repair, throws off the faces of the passions in order to assimilate their nutriment, and is content to let sudden spasms of feeling, caprices of temper, exhale, like the measles of infancy, by insensible perspiration.

Religion recognizes all the facts of human nature, but then proceeds to its work of selection among these, to enhance some and discourage others, and helps itself in this work by taking mental and physical culture into its service, to secure the most favorable conditions for the development of a symmetrical and healthy man. This task of religion began as soon as man grew competent to be curious about all the things in the world. That was the earliest solicitation which the great First Cause made through man, to overcome matter's centrifugal motion, and reclaim himself. But the human curiosity which arose thus was infested for a long time with all the wild pranks of the animals; their cowering dread, their rages, their ungovernable periods, their suspicions, the inarticulate cries of their groping instincts. So man feared and angered while he questioned; he fell into violences of temper, abused himself, cut his face, whipped his body, went into convulsions, to extort some answers; he ran through the whole scale of undisciplined emotions, expecting that their heat would make a weld between the creature and some creator; he blamed himself for every untoward event, and sacrificed the dearest things he possessed, fancying that it was a solution of the problem which oppressed him; in short, he elaborated a scheme of atonement out of the savage's habit of making a trade or propitiating with a present, he reduced febrile restlessness and wandering to a system of revivals, fastened the huge wen of cretinistic piety to imperfectly nourished beings, depleted people into saints or inflamed them into fanatics, and set up Mood to be a test of the spiritual life. The old barbarian has invented broadcloth, and now looks quite respectably in churches; but underneath his linen he hides traces of the various tattooings of the primitive tribes who dreaded and coated what they could not understand. In a clear evening you may still hear the cries of miserable sinners at their orgies of self-depreciation; women may be seen in vestries at their hysterics, and in cathedrals waiting to eat the God which a priest makes out of a wafer. Our sentimental worshipers are the scrofulous descendants of forest howls and dances.

When Religion proceeds to examine the stock of facts which Nature keeps on hand, it finds many things which only deserve the name of occurrences, and contribute no permanent material towards the spiritual life. The evaporation of ocean-water by the sun's agency, the rising of the vapor into the winds that carry it to be condensed against mountain ranges, around whose sides it scurries in mists or lies piled in clouds,—this whole process we call a fact. So is the rising of the sun in the morning. But when a belated traveller among the Hartz mountains sees the spectre of the Brocken appear to him in the dawning light, he sees only the projection of an enormous shadow of himself upon the cloud-screen. It is not a fact, but an illusion. The spectator is a fact, but the real stature of it is exaggerated, and becomes a frame to hang legends and baseless feelings upon. The little man becomes the creator of his own unbounded awe and terror. So it is with the exaggerations of such indisputable facts of human nature as Love, Pity, Remorse, Fear and Dependence. From distant times and spaces the fog-billows of obscure feeling drift to lodge against the sierras of doctrine that frown above the place where we dwell. The ragged screen of stone keeps the ragged mist-rack clinging. How many human tears, shed long ago, have been volatilized to make a sheet on which the phantasmagoria of ourself may be projected! We see our best emotions swollen into gigantic forms; and we are hunted down by our own shadow—we the Wild Huntman—with the heart's clamors magnified into the monstrous bay and hallo of a supernatural pack. It is the business of Religion to dissipate this fog of the mind, that day may stand in every man "focund on the misty mountain tops," to welcome its own serene sufficiency.

But illustration is handiest to draw our subject forth and show its point. Then let us take the sense of justice and the emotion of pity; these are two facts of human nature. But justice sometimes seems to have been looking at a Medusa, and to have hardened into the bars of a prison for the present and of a hell for the future. And pity appears sometimes to be vaporized by the flames of hell into a watery, sentimental ghost, which dreads the thrust of pain and retribution. The process of tuning a piano is an adjustment between interests of rigorously abstract accuracy and the intervals which the fallible material of the instrument exacts. This is called its temperament. The beatitude of mercy is a temperament which religion creates by bringing justice and mercy to cooperate. As yet the statute-book refuses to incorporate this instinct of private religion, this deference for constitutional traits and fatalities of inheritance; for these facts are imperfectly understood. As soon as they can be referred to their inevitable law, penalty and pity will flow into a temper competent to sweep every point of the scale, from the lowest to the highest, with constructive harmony. Society will protect itself from criminals by releasing one class of them from themselves, from the goal of their bad birth and breeding into the house of fair domestic service; and another class from the righteous pains and penalties of their vices into the asylum of repentance and a reconstructed will. For this is the divine beatitude of our own human structure, pronounced as it is qualified by all the moral conditions of mankind. Pains are the sentinels who warn us off as we approach the vestibule of justice; if we disregard them, and, striking up their weapons, hurry in, we find a court sitting that knows all the previous facts, and has the genealogical tree hanging on the walls, and who so has been previously doomed will bear no doom; whose has clearly doomed himself will receive his own sentence, but it will contain a hope, for at the worst he always had it, and there is no flame that can scutelize that trace of God out of his heart.

The instinct of Reverence is another fact which Religion accepts, and is very jealous to supply with appropriate objects. For a man, with all his readiness to pay homage to superiorities, can only reverence what is true and actual; his ideal tendency was not inspired to flatter with, but to appreciate. He must be protected from wasting his noble modesty upon conventional ideas and in artificial methods.

The practice of worship is always warmed into life by this instinct, and then often stings the hand of its benefactor. For mankind has fallen a prey to rites and observances which take advantage of our natural enthusiasm for greatness, and of our awe before invisible Deity. These native feelings are seized by the press gang of the church militant, injected just underneath the skin with music, flowers, wax candles and liturgies, and then held in a sectarian drill. Compared with a perception of all facts and their uses, a form of worship lacks virility. The mind submits to be stroked by fawning language into a mood known to all practitioners in ancient and modern times, and used by them to consolidate creeds and denominations. When thought constructs truth, and art embodies beauty, and science discovers use, the soul's instinct to worship is addressed by the universe itself, and the knees drop before the nearness of the infinite; there is not the thickness of an Amen between.

All the divine men are portions of the solid coast seen clearly from the offing where we toss and long for port; they are not lifted by our quivering rhetoric or by the vapors that are exhaled from distances. Their land-locked comfort invites us from a horizon that is none the less admired because it is accessible.

St. Francis Xavier was one day observing the gestures of the leaf-cutting bee, under the impression that it prayed, and he mistook its hum for a canticle; thus imputing the least valuable of his own moods to this insect's real service and relation to the creator's thought. The actual miracle was in the bee's ability to sit upon the outer rim of a leaf, cut it into the perfect ovals and circles which it wanted, and calculate exactly when the parting piece would let it down if it made another cut. Whoever is religious enough to appreciate that fact performs divine service; he and the insect are an ordained priesthood; the delight of the one and the use in the other are the canticle they sing.

No matter what the fact may be, it becomes religious as soon as the mind perceives the whole scope and intention of it, that is to say, the divine idea that it encloses, the creative purpose in using it, and the creator's objection to having it abused. Can we press nearer to the mind of Deity than this? There is nothing more awfully penetrating and subduing than a clear perception of some use in human nature which started in the first moments of creation, and reframes and reorganizes mankind to day, and pleads with hints of terrible significance to release God from the hell of its abuse. What form of verbal and æsthetic worship has an arm so sinewy to lift man off his feet into a mingled shudder of assent, reverence and dread, as some plain fact of this kind?

Here, for instance, is the instinct of Reproduction, the everlasting generation of Life through successive forms and epochs, prompting the society that simmers on the wing in swarms of insects, that sings in the mating of meadow partners, and smiles or weeps in the chambers of men and women. It prolongs the lives of planets and colonizes them with graces and affections; it maintains God's rapture in the birth of every child that grows to be capable of sacrifices, enterprise, mirth and transport, such gifts that pre-empt permanence. What does God intend by an impulse that is on every side so domineering and palpable, and how does he prefer that it shall be exercised? It is fit that Religion only should ask that question, for the sweetness and sanity of her own nature are involved in the answer, and it is matter of life and death with her to keep on hand a stock of normal souls in normal bodies. They only can maintain a love of truth for its own sake, of beauty for its surmises of an ideal not yet reached, of use for its relation to the divine economy. Nothing tainted, abnormal, poisoned in the birth, ruined before being born, ruined several times beforeward; nothing puny, semi-idiotic, bred of gluttony and drink, or of mismatching, or in moments of aversion; no contempt for seasons, nor ignorance concerning excess or deficiency, can bring lovers of God and adorners of divine things into the world. So Religion sets every sanitary tendency at work to find and emphasize the laws which are to keep her still possible among men. Heritable tendencies are hunted through their covert in families and races, temper and constitution are consulted, plain talk unmasks and rebukes base or careless practices. Marriage will cease to be the pell-mell accident of two people who happen to live in the same street, or pant together at the same Germans. Dread of propagating scrofulas, nonentities and infidelities will provide some check to this mildewed romance of getting mismatched. We now see but the beginning of this revolt of the spiritual sense against a social system that is spawned by chance, or is squeamishly unconscious of the Promethean art of fashioning sweet men and women and kindling with such sparks a blazing society of heaven's lovers.

The seasonable artlessness of Nature is a hint to man of the damage he is doing to God's intention by his unseasonable artifices. Religion hopes to recur to the real fact as it represents the mind of God.

In all the old systems of theology the dominant key is invalidism. Who is sick, the creator or the creature? Theology makes a reply, and says that, there being sickness, sin and death, somebody must be responsible for that. Is it man? If it is, we retort that somebody must be responsible for that. And no scheme has yet been devised to eradicate the seeds of human errors from the original soil of creation. There they were; no retroactive fancy can cajole them into non-existence. The fact which you try to drown keeps haunting the surface of the ocean; you cannot weight or bribe it to stay down. It stares into your face and clambers over the side of your boat, takes the tiller, and makes you row it home. Religion accepts that fact, the most impressive and pregnant of all, and undertakes to make out of it the best world possible.

Love to God survives in the old systems only as an artificial result of one of two suppositions; either that all evil was originated by a satanic element, or that it came into the world by an abuse of human freedom. God is therefore supposed to be lovable on account of his magnanimous expedients for meeting these emergencies. But neither of these theories of evil succeeds in clearing Deity, to leave it spotless and lovable. Even if he comes down to earth to be crucified, it is not a confession that he has been wrong, but an accusation that man has been, who is expected to adore this subterfuge. Can a being truly be loved, who permitted either a Devil to spoil man or man to play the devil? These suppositions leave his creation at the mercy of agencies which he was too weak, or too crude in naive conception, to anticipate. Religion sees that the fact cannot have contained after-thoughts or have been subject to antagonistic facts. She therefore accepts the situation, does not impute nor apologize, levies no atoning tax on man for consequences not of his own devising; but does the best with them and arrives at a love for God that is strictly equal to the facts. It is not a sardonic ferment of the saint's defective intelligence, but a sentiment which the universe itself can honestly acknowledge.

For God cannot be like any saint who ever lived, not so bloodless and clammy, not so attenuated by vain contests with sincere and useful passions, not so filled with abhorrence at the work of his own hands; no monk nor celibate, no skeleton rattling its dire refrain of a lost world, no unexceptionable person with a halo. By no means. The reptile, the poisons artfully put up to pass for simples, the sour grapes fed to the innocent lips of children for several generations, the congenital rages and insanities, seem to be rough repudiations of any pretension to saintship, and a fine irony upon the human kind. Religion loves God precisely as well as all the facts describe him, and loves her neighbor better than the saint who hates the facts and is too lean to handle them. He is the phantom of half-waking dreams, and the morning brushes them aside to let in the brawn of daylight—that pioneer which makes a clearing where Nature can settle and breed itself into family.

All men will agree that a character becomes more perfect according as it incorporates modesty, mildness, tenderness, and all forbearing scruples, with its veracity and courage. But the religious sentiment is not the attitude which such traits hold towards an invisible Deity. They are amiable moods which run in the blood of some households. Sometimes they appear in company with that more profound and complete relation of the soul to Deity, which alone deserves the title of the religious sentiment. Sometimes they exist without this intelligent acceptance of the world as being, just as it is, the immediate purport of God. There is a kind of internal mental action, fostered by the preacher and revivalist, that encourages affectional moods to assume that they establish the most essential tie between the creature and the creator. God then appears to this subjective fancy to be only coextensive with these excellences of the private man, whose worship then degenerates into a nursing of emotions, and an incessant rumination of them in the cuds of hymns and pious services. The mind sprinkles into this seething cauldron of moods its thin ideas concerning Deity, and the mixture is pronounced to be the spiritual life.

Let us take, for instance, the fact that human nature likes to refer to some great protection, in emergencies to stretch out a hand in hope to lean upon some stay, to shift upon an infinite person the responsibility that is too deep for thought and too heavy for the much-tried heart. Many a system of theology owes its life to the idea that religion is simply the sense of human dependence. This is supposed to be a primitive sense that is latent in all people, and has originated human confidence in a supreme beneficence. Men confide in it out of sheer passivity of feeling; they crave no intelligent knowledge of the world or deliberative process of the mind; whatever happens is of no consequence—the soul surrenders. The more ignorant the person is, the more thoroughly does this feeling absorb him, and anticipate all the doubts which are started by the mind's shrewd questions. So that Newton has no spiritual advantage over the stupidest clown in the village, who belongs to the aborigines of feeling; he can make a dumping of the universe to swallow, and recommend it for agreeing with digestion. Nothing needs explaining; events justify themselves by taking advantage of this abject confidence. The hunted soul runs its head into this cranny, and insists that it is all safe, though every pin-feather be plucked from back to plume.

To Religion this seems to be a condition of chatteldom. Slave masters drive a brisk trade in this suspicious temper, and raise their crops in the sweat of this aboriginal abjectness. Trust in a divine plan is a genuine attitude of a free man toward a free creator; but there is nothing in it of the temper of underwritten submissiveness. It is a very complicated sentiment which has escaped from primitive conditions of human dependence by allying itself with intelligence.

When the first navigators strayed into Southern seas, the gannet and the pelican indicated their "Welcome, Englishman!" by gathering upon rocks convenient of access, and persisting in being clubbed successively; there was no deprecation as they stood amid their prostrate comrades, and they despised the hint. The turtle seemed to have been waiting for ages till these superior beings came to turn him over on his back. A whole generation paddled out of the water to lay eggs and to be turned. But now, though the stomachs of all the aldermen grow mutinous, the sailor has a stiff rice for the modern turtle, who inherits enlightened objections to having his eggs poached and his callipash and callipe exported. There was no trust in the primitive condition of these creatures; nothing that could be called fearlessness or confidence. It was the submissiveness of stupidity. As soon as vigorous clubbings had beaten into the birds' heads a novel sense of calamity, a legacy of distrust was bequeathed to their descendants, and noisy parliaments assembled on remoter reefs to advocate the policy of shyness.

So does experience bring distrust to man. The earthquake jostles down his card-house of conjectures about an amiable providence. The planet is a trap. Seeing no sign-board of "Dangerous!" above a foul meadow, he hears a home close to it; yet a hint would make him move. The hint is furnished, and he moves, but the household does not go with him. After the electric fluid has slid down your bell-wire, the thunder bustles in with a tardy alarm. It has voice enough to cry, "Take Care!" but all the mind in the universe could not teach it the phrase. Your children go violet-gathering in the woods, but the dog-wood and the reptile are not discreetly labelled; the same providence that entices them to the emblem of innocence infests the path by which they reach it. If an apothecary by mistake puts up for you a dose of corrosive sublimate instead of glycerine, you hope to live to have him indicted. But supreme intelligence scatters chances for mistakes far and wide, in the air, the soil, the fauna and flora of every clime. Distrust is the first indictment which human nature serves upon the world, in which it lives by no choice of its own and poorly equipped for its emergencies.

Now there are certain traits of temper, such as patience and resignation, which religionists value because they seem to flow from a sense of dependence, and these are recommended to be the soul's alternative when it dreads the elements and distrusts the divine plan. Pastors come to the side of pain and disease, and with that well known deliquescent squeeze of the hand exhort the sufferer to see the finger of God in his case, to accept it as a providence with a special intention to influence and reform. Calamities are God's dealings with sinners and his trials of the saints; he takes advantage of physical contingencies to get more regard for himself and to enforce a better disposition in the household. And this is thought to be religious sentiment.

I find that submissiveness is lauded as a result of Christianity, although the same non-complaining spirit of reference to higher powers, to say nothing of a finer style of composure, existed wherever Greeks and Romans suffered from the ills of mortality. If there be any value in this unreasonable acquiescence in the supposed dealings of some Deity with the soul, let all the sufferers have the credit of it.

But are we reduced to this, to pretend that God details a hip-disease in order to extort and enjoy a mood of resignation, to appreciate the cheerfulness that battles with racking pains, to accept the pious references of all this suffering to his special will? Does he select this man's leg for shrinkage because he detects some superfluity of temper, and means to have the man limp out of it? But here is another man who comes of such a healthy race, that he can afford to set up a stud of vices, and distance all the puny jockies in the race of sensuality. He comes out at death's goal, not a hair turned, not a fleck of exhaustion on his well-worn flanks. Why not arrest this man with a touch of dis-ster and reformation? Oh no, he is saved up to be tormented in the hereafter; but the poor scrofulous fellow gets his torment here. Why? Which is his crime, scrofula or temper? Perhaps the former is the parent of the latter. Or shall we believe that all constitutional taints are pitifully prepared long ago, so that man, stumbling into them, may find himself retired for spiritual exercise and a growth in grace?

In all such facts there is no will of God to designate this man. The will is in all facts; it designated all men before their birth. It is in the world's routine, and it lies anticipated in all embryos. Yet theology has brought up men to the conceit that diseases are the pets of God, who sends them to be fondled in sick chambers for his sake. Love me, love my dog, or there's an end of friendship. The fine lady who harasses you with her poodle hopes to increase her claim upon your battery with this woolly nuisance. You cannot extenuate it, and may be pardoned if you set it down in malice.

Trials have many times refined an arrogant and unprincipled temper. Dieting, seclusion and blood-letting may share the merit. But they have been as often indicted upon a sweetness which heaven itself could not enhance with all its arts. Which of the two cases shows that providence, like a bungling ar-list, bristles with its moral? Neither of these; for the universe is not a bad religious moral. It is the primal significance that teaches without didactic phrases, and guides you, not by lying in ambush in your path, and then exhorting you to have your scalp stripped with serenity, but by well-lettered mile-stones of facts set up across the waste by the dispassionate engineering of eternity.

"Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." Because the slaying is not an impromptu act, but a strict and long-breathed syllogism, which, if no dear neighborhood of men and women, no resources of science nor of love can refute, God himself will not. The slaying becomes, then, the least evil or the best good possible.

Our dread of the natural combinations which seem to be influenced by want of respect for human love is converted into religious trust when the mind, instead of falling back into sheer submissiveness, begins learning how to make an intelligent estimate of all occurrences. Experience leads the blindfolded feeling through the crowd of phenomena, emerges with it into the presence of their laws, and removes the bandage. Sick moods are dissipated when an honest conviction of a divine plan opens the window and ventilates the room, throws out the person's drinks and poultices, and prescribes a tonic of Causality. If we ever suffer without knowing the reason for it, we remember how often we have suffered clearly from a rational cause that neither consulted us nor understood our conversion; and we extend the benefit of this interpretation to the obscurest incidents in our experience. More laws prepare our meat and serve at our table than we can either pay or discharge. Before the meal is over, we easily surmise that currents of forces flavor every sauce, and constellations change our plate.

This Religion lays claim to every object and movement of creation; they hurry to reinforce it with their report that no fracture or dislocation of plan ever balked them, that they never yet lighted upon a place that did not relate to every other place. Prick the skin that is nearest, or the nebula that is remotest, and you draw the life-blood of Law.

When I perceive how far my sorrow has travelled to reach me, connecting by the way no afterthoughts about my good or ill, it ceases to be a moral imperitance, and I meet it simply in its character as fact. I might say, "I have waited for you," because the inevitable is to be expected. I cannot bid it welcome, as I do the sea side, the starlight, the lover's bosom; that pious hypocrisy was never exacted by one bitter hour. But as soon as it reveals its rational connection with all the rest of the universe, it has gained my confidence. Science and Art bring their reassurance also. It is a wonderful world for taking the conceit out of despair and grief.

I cannot see the line of sodium in the atmosphere of suns and planets without knowing that the elements of my own petty fortunes, though at so vast a distance, share the universal identity.

Does the microscope show me in some speck of life a fluid creeping towards a nerve-lump? But is a rough draught of my own red organ which dilates with pleasure and contracts with pain. Hail, comrade! For I too am an atom scarce discovered in the dust of souls and stars. We are so little that the vastness is impartial, and neither sets us up nor puts us down.

As I cling gasping to this spar of an earth and toss up and down on the edge of the galaxy, which stretches lengthwise from me, so that the sky is all furnished with its ranks and depths of golden helmets, each one protects my head, for it is crested with Space and bears the device of Thought. The whole distance is a phalanx, and my griefs die upon its spears.

When the instruments return from their excursions, and finally muster towards the theme, till the slenderest pipe, the thinnest string, and the most emphatic metal run together nor jostle, each with its scaling-ladder to assault my chagrins, and swarm thicker and more companionable, and climb more fiercely glad with every step, and break at length through the height of my mood, tearing all my clouds to shreds of gold and purple, and, storming into the area of my soul, haul down its flag, not into menace but caress and magnificent disdain of all my whining,—then I ground my piping weapons, help to shatter them with the trample of harmony, fling both arms around and fraternize with these assailants, and come to terms with all my life.

And when my friend, seeing that heaven does not humor me, nor even countenance some noble wish, extemporizes a better heaven for me out of his indomitable faith in myself, and invites me in to the compensation of his courage, then I hear God say, "My facts are churlish, but you can rely upon your friend's."

So the world's realities blossom into a sentiment of Religion, which is not the posturing of any isolated mood before a Deity, but the entire health of all the human gifts; not a feeling of dependence, but to a great extent a sense of independence, since Trust is based upon the intelligence that discovers the divine intentions, and makes a man superior to the laws which operate through him. He can use them in company with Deity; he makes them subserve him by putting his structure into wise relations with them.

The whole soul trusts; for the wind recognizes facts, the conscience recurs to them, the individual talent reaches freedom in subservience to them, love bids love arise and lead forth fidelity, a conviction of a general beneficence and order goes into every process of the brain. These qualities construct a human personality, which culminates with them in moments of adhesiveness towards their invisible Source; then a condition of religiousness becomes self-conscious. If it grows impassioned and emotional, it is an affair of temperament. But it need not walk into a meeting-house to have its separate organs biologized by the adroit manipulators who play on pity, fear, hope, grief, longing, resignation, to create the artificial moods which pass for worship. For the sentiment of Religion is the totality of a soul, and no sect has a door wide enough to let it in. When a personality, with the world in its company, appears, the abashed sexton shoots the bolt, retreats to select a hymn, and pacifies his nerves with the organ and its respondent.

If a man has a share in the world's religiousness, he need not run to a dispensary. There is no tonic that can be given out equal to the healthy direction of his mind. He can lift no prayer so buoyant as he is when the exuberant spirits of his gifts fit wings to him and float him into the raptures of his personality. He attains a sense of organic unity; all the mystics, tugging to get their moods aloft, would envy a gladness they are incapable of comprehending. For there is a gathering of the whole consciousness into the direction of its origin, as the instruments combine for the symphony's one moment of triumph and emotion. It is not a state or mood of feeling, any more than a tide is a wave. The ocean is getting up its countless crests and moving inward, one solid dunce, by the accumulating lift of some wind's palm. It is not the tepid plash of shallow Sundays, but the emotion that the movement of our gifts is liberating to roll landward, and pass along the coast into pulses of a response too vague, too manifold, too tender to be bound by the human tongue.

I claim for the service of Religion that much abused word, Emotion, the favorite vein to counterfeit by all the quacks. I claim that it is the clearing up of a soul that has grown big to drenching, with no room for one drop more in its brain, so swollen with tribute from all its zones! Hear the low thunder that releases the tumultuous moment, and mark, after it has passed over, how sweetly scented is the field!

When a soul is taken by its own religion and summed up in these hours of deliverance, an instinct of personal continuance is evolved, which is the only excuse we have for surmising immortality. It is useless to say that the idea is developed from a universal instinct. Whole tribes of men are destitute of it; so are multitudes of intelligent people in every country, while others treat it with suspicion, and others keep themselves in abeyance on the point. But mankind has caught infection from the strong sense of private vitality which great and healthy souls have shared; and every person who is not held together by the raveling of artifice but is strung upon organic laws, and whose temper resents the suggestion that the exaltations of his nature are to be smothered finally in his brain-dust, is a guarantee to his neighbor that their excellence is permanent. But when Fisk and Tweed strip off their shoddy overcoats, the country shivers to see no man inside, and hurries to put on the reconciling humor of Shakespeare, the moral scorn of Parker, and the incorruptibility of Sumner.

A person so modest that he blanches at the arrogance of setting up the gladness into which his lowly services of the street or household blossom, as proof that he is permanent, keeps his neighborhood tiptoe with the gladness; standing upon him, they discover the earth's flatness a deception, as it rolls close to the heels of a Beyond.

Have you never flushed into hours when the soul seemed an antiseptic able to keep the body itself from putrescence, and embalm it for a thousand years with the delight of living, so that heaven seemed no boon, and death a doubtful experiment,—yes, when to travel on these two feet for centuries through all weathers picking up these chrysolites of feeling might cheapen the pavement of a New Jerusalem; and defied being summoned to depart, conscious that this youth of yours could never pall so long as every taste on the tongue was immortal, and every morning a surprise?

What is this but the future detaining your present for security?

So Religion puts on file these reports of our perfected moments. They are preserved by passing into our substantial identity. They are times agreed on by conspirators, who silently assemble from all quarters of the soul, to revolt against the encroaching body, and extort the charter of rights which it cannot in the hour of death revoke.

I have been very much struck with the prevalence of the deliberate predatory wickedness of men in Chicago. I have been surprised at the utter insensibility of some men to the vast and terrific suffering which existed there. There are a great many persons who say that there cannot be a devil; that God is too good to have such a monster in the universe. I have only this to say: that if there is not a devil, there are some very good materials among men to make one out of; and that if God is too good to have a devil-in-chief, he is not so good but that he allows devils in detail. All the imaginations and fables of the monks put together do not equal or parallel the heinousness and deliberateness of the cruelty of the men who prey on their fellow-men under such circumstances as those creatures who follow the line of battle and stab the wounded soldiers that they may rob them of their money. You never see a great catastrophe that you do not see these fiends in human form creeping out of their lurking-places to evince how wicked wickedness can be, and how inhuman inhumanity can be.—Henry Ward Beecher.

Does the consecration of Sunday confess the desecration of the entire week? Does the consecration of the church confess the profanation of the house? Let us read the incantation backward. Let the man stand on his feet. Let religion cease to be occasional. And the pulses of thought that go to the borders of the universe, let them proceed from the bosom of the Household.—Emerson.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the ODEON, in the new EXPRESS BUILDING on St. Clair Street, opposite the WHEELER OPERA HOUSE, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

SOCIAL RE-UNION.—Members and friends of the First Independent Society are invited to meet at the residence of Mrs. Edward Russell, on Summit street, Wednesday Evening, January 31.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash receipts for the week ending Jan. 30th.—Benj. Halliwell, 50 cts.; M. M. Gardner, 50 cts.; L. L. Spooner, 50 cts.; W. L. Rabe, 50 cts.; W. H. Downer, 50 cts.; H. W. Condon, 50 cts.; J. E. Hitchcock, 50 cts.; Jacob Sprinkel, 50 cts.; Louis Bristol, 50 cts.; Geo. M. Crabb, 50 cts.; G. Crabb, 50 cts.; Miles I. Smith, 50 cts.; A. B. Bradford, 50 cts.; Miss C. G. Tallman, 50 cts.; Frank and, 50 cts.; G. H. Goodrich, 50 cts.; H. M. Rodding, 50 cts.; E. R. Burnham, 50 cts.; Wm. Barnes, 50 cts.; Sarah F. White, 50 cts.; C. W. Wilcox, 50 cts.; Bond and, 50 cts.; Amos Eldridge, 50 cts.; D. B. Sudman, 50 cts.; M. L. Holbrook, 50 cts.; D. Giddings, 50 cts.; Rev. James Mudge, 50 cts.; Geo. Allen, 50 cts.; Joseph P. Smith, 50 cts.; L. L. Wright, 50 cts.; C. G. Crocker, 50 cts.; A. Osgood, 50 cts.; Mrs. M. B. Ambler, 50 cts.; Miss Kate Napier, 50 cts.; Milo A. Townsend, 50 cts.; Geo. E. Lorenz, 50 cts.; Jno. Carow, 50 cts.; H. J. Green, 50 cts.; O. B. Frothingham, 50 cts.; Mrs. Laura Barnaby, 50 cts.; B. A. Stron, 50 cts.; G. F. Van Vechten, 50 cts.; Miss M. E. Rice, 50 cts.; Chas. Bonvall, 50 cts.; E. W. Meacham, 50 cts.; P. M. Holland, 50 cts.; Jno. Hendrie, 50 cts.; J. L. Woods, 50 cts.; Claribel Gerrish, 50 cts.; Jno. L. Frazer, 50 cts.; Mrs. J. W. Knagge, 50 cts.; Geo. Nichols, 50 cts.; James English, 50 cts.; E. W. Ginn, 50 cts.; Joel S. Richards, 50 cts.; H. H. Hildred, 50 cts.; Wm. M. Kapher, 50 cts.; Capt. J. D. Myrick, 50 cts.; D. C. Glover, 50 cts.; Theodore F. Willard, 50 cts.; John K. Willard, 50 cts.; J. H. Jackson, 50 cts.; N. P. Stockbridge, 50 cts.; Josephine S. Tilton, 50 cts.; G. W. Develle, 50 cts.; R. P. Hanowell, 50 cts.; Alfred C. Nickerson, 50 cts.; Gerrit Smith, 50 cts.; A. W. Russell, 50 cts.; Eugene Hutchinson, 50 cts.; Annie L. Nay, 50 cts.; Edward Winderger, 50 cts.; Thos. McClintock, 50 cts.; J. G. Putnam, 50 cts.; D. C. Marlin, 50 cts.; D. W. McLane, 50 cts.; Edson Hannum, 50 cts.; G. Harvey, 50 cts.; David F. Meador, 50 cts.; A. W. Pike, 50 cts.; Jno. H. Mossey, 50 cts.; Henry Savage, 50 cts.; H. Miller, 50 cts.; Lewis Porter, 50 cts.; M. J. Miller, 50 cts.; Edward Schroeter, 50 cts.; C. O. Hayes, 50 cts.; Nancy A. Hayward, 50 cts.; M. H. Whitwell, 50 cts.; J. Church, 50 cts.; F. E. Baker, 50 cts.; Wm. Wright, 50 cts.; A. M. Clark, 50 cts.; T. R. Davis, 50 cts.; W. H. Olvington, 50 cts.; J. W. Will-sack, 50 cts.; Geo. E. Alton, 50 cts.; Louie Bristol, 50 cts.; S. S. Staley, 50 cts.; H. H. Hildred, 50 cts.; A. D. Mead, 50 cts.; J. H. Jackson, 50 cts.; Chas. Almy, 50 cts.; Chas. H. Wheeler, 50 cts.; Geo. W. Cutler, 50 cts.; S. H. Stewart, 50 cts.; C. F. Fowler, 50 cts.; J. S. Nichols, 50 cts.; E. Walker, 50 cts.; Orrin Gillett, 50 cts.; L. T. Womack, 50 cts.; Wm. K. Cunningham, 50 cts.; L. H. Hill, 50 cts.; W. E. Harriman, 50 cts.; B. Nickerson, 50 cts.; D. G. Dibble, 50 cts.; W. H. Jones, 50 cts.; W. D. Billings, 50 cts.; A. J. Battie, 50 cts.; C. D. Miller, 50 cts.; L. G. Poich, 50 cts.; Dr. Wilson, 50 cts.; W. Freeman, 50 cts.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

RECEIVED.

- THE REVISED PRAYER-BOOK. For the Use of the Congregation assembled at St. George's Hall, Langham Place, Compiled by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, B. A., St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, and late Vicar of Headingh. London. 1871. pp. 80.
- A CRITICAL CATECHISM. BY THOMAS LUMSDEN STRANGE, late a Judge of the High Court of Madras. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate.
- A CHALLENGE TO THE MEMBERS OF THE CHRISTIAN EVIDENCE SOCIETY. BY THOMAS SCOTT. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. 1871.
- PLEAS FOR FREE INQUIRY: From the Point of View, (1) of Duty, (2) of Inclination. By "M. A.," Trinity College, Cambridge. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate.
- THE TACTICS AND DEFEAT OF THE CHRISTIAN EVIDENCE SOCIETY. BY THOMAS SCOTT. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. 1871.
- THE TRUE TEMPTATION OF JESUS. BY PROFESSOR F. W. NEWMAN. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate.
- ON THE CAUSES OF ATHEISM. A Lecture delivered at Bristol, on February 7, 1871. By Professor F. W. NEWMAN. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate.
- DIVERGENCE OF CALVINISM FROM PAULINE DOCTRINE. BY PROFESSOR F. W. NEWMAN. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. 1871.
- A REPLY TO THE QUESTION, "What have we got to rely on, if we cannot rely on the Bible?" By Professor F. W. NEWMAN. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. 1869.
- JAMES AND PAUL. A TRAIL. By Professor F. W. NEWMAN. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. 1869.
- THE BROT AND THE SCEPTIC: What is their Ethnology? By Emer. Prof. F. W. NEWMAN. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate.
- THE RELIGIOUS WEAKNESS OF PROTESTANTISM. BY FRANCIS W. NEWMAN. Emeritus Professor of University College, London; and formerly Fellow of Balliol College, Oxford. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. 1866.
- FIFTH ANNUAL REPORT OF THE BOARD OF STATE CHARITIES, to the Governor of the State of Ohio, for the year 1871. COLUMBUS: NEVINS & MYERS, State Printers. 1872.
- THE RADICAL. Published Monthly. Boston: Office of Publication 25 Brimfield St. January, 1872. $3.00 a Year.
- OLD AND NEW. January, 1872. Published Monthly. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 143 Washington St. $4.00 a Year.
- THE LITTLE CORONAL. January, 1872. JOHN E. MILLER, Publisher, 84 West Randolph St., Chicago, Ill. $1.50 a Year.
- THE NATIONAL SCHOOL FESTIVAL. Conducted by ALFRED L. SEWELL, and Mrs. M. B. C. SEADE. Published by ALFRED L. SEWELL & Co., Chicago. 50 Cents a Year. Issued Quarterly.
- CHURCH'S MUSICAL VISITOR. Cincinnati, O. Published by JOHN CHURCH & Co., 60 West Fourth St. $1.00 a Year.

THE INNER MUSIC.

KENLE

JANUARY 27, 1872.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

SHARED EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THIS INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending 31st December 1900, the future subscription for the year 1901 being assessed at the same rate. Not more than one share can be held by any one person, and the assessment on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this limit will be strictly adhered to, with the result that it is very desirable that the entire amount of the assessment should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

[illegible]

NO DESECRATION!

The United States Constitution is SACRED to the Rights of Man. Let it never be DESECRATED by bigotry or intolerance!

This is the sentiment of every wise and true American citizen. It is the sentiment of the letters that now come pouring in, uttered with most unmistakable emphasis. If there were space in THE INDEX, we would publish every name sent to us in response to our appeal for signatures to the counter-petition; but this is impossible. Already we have received good lists, and much longer ones are promised. Dr. Carl H. Horsch, of Dover, N. H., sends a list of seventy-two names; Mr. Jesse B. Barry, from the National Military Asylum at Hampton, Va., sends a list of forty-five; Mr. Elum C. Miles, of Springvale, Iowa, sends a list of forty-four; Dr. A. M. Spaulding, of Brushy Prairie, Ind., sends a list of one hundred and fourteen; Mrs. Mary E. Chase, of Providence, R. I., sends a list of thirty-one; Mr. L. O. Bass, of Colbrook, Conn., sends a list of eight; Mr. E. W. Meacham, of Fredonia, N. Y., sends a list of twenty-six; Mr. J. Y. Bergen, of Yellow Springs, O., sends a list of fifteen; Dr. Lafayette Chesley, of Nottingham, N. H., sends a list of twelve; Miss Mary R. Whittlesey, of Hyde Park, Mass., sends a list of ten; Mr. Max Pracht, of Cincinnati, O., sends a list of five; Mr. E. Bryant, of Florence, Mass., sends a list of one hundred and sixty-eight; Mr. Frank Eno, of Pine Plains, N. Y., sends a list of six,—not to mention the numerous single names.

Mr. Morris Einstein, of Titusville, Pa., promises "for certain several hundred, perhaps a thousand, names." Col. J. O. Martin, of Indianapolis, Ind., promises a "lot of petitions," and announces a Mass Meeting in that city on Jan. 31, for the special purpose of protesting against the Christian Amendment. Mr. D. K. Boutelle, whose letter will be found among our "Communications," speaks for himself far more effectively than we can speak for him. And so on. These are but samples of the work that is doing. A few extracts from letters sent by men whose names are widely known are here appended. We feel sure they will pardon the liberty we take for the sake of the cause.

Elizur Wright, Boston:—"Please add my name to your petition against converting the United States into a National Church."

Gerrit Smith, Peterboro, N. Y.:—"This Call for a Convention at Cincinnati, 31st Instant Surely the good men who have signed it have not duly considered how wide and fearful may be the consequences of the step they have taken. I like the form of your remonstrance or counter-petition. Please put my name to it; and use the enclosed $10 in the work of getting other names to it."

Alfred Conkling, Geneseo, N. Y.:—"You will please append my name to your proposed counter-petition to Congress."

Seth Hunt, Northampton, Mass. :—"I hasten to authorize you to append my name to the petition which you have drawn up, asking for the preservation of the precious guarantees of religious freedom in the Constitution of the United States. My wife gives her name also."

Abraham Folsom, Boston :—"I for one am decidedly opposed to such an amendment, and will authorize you to append my name to a remonstrance against the same."

William J. Potter, New Bedford:—"Put my name at once on your petition against the Christian Amendment. My wife says, hers too. . . . I had not before seen the Call for the Cincinnati Convention. I am glad they put it so strong, that they mean so unmistakably a Christian Amendment. This will open people's eyes I should think. If they would content themselves with the simple recognition of God in the Constitution, though the principle would be just as bad, it would not be so apparent to people as a palpable violation of liberty of conscience. I am not sure that such an amendment, if proposed, would not be adopted. People who had no great interest in the matter would yet hesitate to 'vote against God,' and so the affirmative would carry it by the fact that they would be mainly the voters. The others wouldn't express themselves at all,—or only a few would. But this Christian Amendment will unite, if pressed, a very formidable opposition, I should say."

Peter H. Clark, Cincinnati:—"I think that movement full of danger to the civil and religious liberty of the country, and in my opinion the cloud is already bigger than a man's hand. If we consider the thoroughness of organization which the Evangelicals possess, the subserviency of the mass of the people to them, the indifference of the liberal people of the country, there need be no wonder at the audacity of the demand which the Convention makes. Apathetic liberals will wake up some morning and find their liberties gone, and no way out of the difficulty except through a bloody war. I like your indictment of Christianity. I have no patience with those liberals who spend so much time proving that they do not differ from Christians except in name. Christianity has played its part in the drama of the world, and henceforth is of no more use than a tallow-dip at noon day."

These must suffice for the present. If these ringing words help to show to the purblind the reality of the crisis, and nerve them to the performance of instant duty, the writers will pardon us for giving them to the world. For the sake of sweet and beautiful Peace, we urge upon every liberal in the land the necessity for action. No more indifference—no more selfish diletantiam! If you have one spark of love for liberty in your heart, let it kindle into a blaze. Put your name to that petition!

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

MENTAL DISORDERS; OR DISEASES OF THE BRAIN AND NERVES (William White & Co., Boston), gives the ideas of Andrew Jackson Davis on mania, insanity and crime, and on their treatment and cure. It is not written from a point of view attainable by ordinary science, as is Dr. Maudsley's "Physiology and Pathology of the Mind," a critical notice of which we once published in the North American Review (January, 1868); but rather from the serene elevation of a seer to whom is granted the privilege of an insight denied to common flesh and blood. Such a work we confess we know not how to deal with; and we therefore refer the curious reader to its pages for information.

DIALOGUES FROM DICKENS (Second Series—Lee and Shepard, Boston) will be an invaluable aid to Dickens Clubs in the preparation of scenes for parlor theatricals. No amusement is more delightful than the presentation of such scenes by amateur actors that have caught the genuine spirit of Dickens, whose novels are only dramas disguised; and it is surprising how much histrionic talent will develop itself, when an ordinary group of young people have once undertaken to act out these scenes before their friends. Mr. W. Eliot Fette, by whom these "Dialogues" are arranged, has thrown the language of Dickens into dramatic form without addition or alteration; and he gives all the directions needed for bringing the scenes upon the stage with full effect. The book, moreover, is as interesting to read as useful for its special purpose; though most people will prefer to take the original text of Dickens for private perusal.—Price $1.50; for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

THE CHEMICAL HISTORY OF THE SIX DAYS OF CREATION (American News Company, New York) is the latest attempt to reconcile Genesis and Geology. The author is John Phin, C. E., editor of the New York Technologist,—a man of real scientific attainments, which have not saved him from planning his faith to the letter of the Bible. He is shrewd enough to admit that the six "days" were natural days, each commencing with a real morning and closing with a real evening; and he thus steers clear of the pretence that the writer in Genesis meant geological epochs of which he knew nothing. But Mr. Phin twists the simple meaning of the text, nevertheless; for he teaches that these natural days were not of twenty-four hours' duration, but of enormous length, and his little book is a defence of this theory. We sincerely hope that his rash charge upon the windmills will not bring him into the plight of Don Quixote—still more that his zeal for the Biblical cosmogony will not drive him, as it drove poor Hugh Miller, to insanity and suicide. But it is a pitiable sight to see fine ability thus pour itself into the sand, and leave no traces behind.

TEXT-BOOK OF GEOLOGY FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES (D. Appleton & Co., New York), by H. Alleyne Nicholson, M. D., Professor of Natural History and Botany in University College, Toronto, is an excellent manual on the science of which it treats. Prof. Nicholson belongs to the progressive school of geologists. He accepts that view of the past history of the globe which is in harmony with the Nebular Hypothesis:—"All known facts support the theory that the earth has been, and is still, a gradually cooling body. Upon this theory, the materials composing the earth were at one time in a state of vapor or gas, in which condition, of course, they would occupy enormously more space than they do at present." [p. 3.] He also adopts the uniformitarian, as opposed to the catastrophist, theory of geological changes, and believes in the "adequacy of existing causes" to explain them all:—"Uniformitarianism is the basis of modern geology." [p. 46.] The volume is embellished with numerous illustrations, partly original, and partly borrowed from Sir Charles Lyell's "Elements of Geology." An introductory treatise on Physical Geography, twelve pages of questions on the subject matter of the book, and a good index, render the work very useful, not only to the young student, but also to those of maturer years who wish to acquire a general knowledge of geology.—Price $1.50: for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

TEXT-BOOK OF ZOOLOGY FOR SCHOOLS AND COLLEGES (D. Appleton & Co.), by the same author, is equally valuable. It recognizes the impossibility of drawing any "hard-and-fast line" between the animal and vegetable kingdoms, and apparently favors the proposition of Prof. Haeckel to form an intermediate kingdom with the title Regnum Protiticum. While admiring the clear and terse manner in which Prof. Nicholson sketches the outlines of zoology, we are somewhat surprised that he still adheres [p. 319] to the old distinction between the bimna and quadrumana, which Prof. Huxley has conclusively shown to be fallacious [Man's Place in Nature, pp. 108-109]. "The resemblance of the so-called 'hind-hand' to a true hand," says Huxley, "is only akin-deep, and in 'all essential respects the hind-limb of the gorilla is as truly terminated by a foot as that of man.'" Moreover, even admitting this more than dubious distinction, Prof. Nicholson is zoologically conservative in classifying the bimna and quadrumana as separate orders. Even Linnaeus included them under the same order of primates; and Mr. Darwin would assign to the bimana (i. e. Man) no higher rank, genealogically considered, than that of a family or even a sub-family [Descent of Man, vol. 1, p. 187]. But Prof. Nicholson is inclined to give to Man the rank of a class, or even of a subkingdom. It would be impossible to justify this classification on purely anatomical grounds; and he can urge no better reason-for it than the plea that the great and admitted mental difference between Man and the anthropoid apes "must have some physical correspondence," even though this assumed correspondence remains invisible to the eyes of science.—Price $1.50; for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

"SPIRITUALISM AND REASON."

Under this head Mr. J. O. Barrett, in THE INDEX of Jan. 13, takes exception to a statement made by me in a previous article, when, speaking incidentally of Spiritualism, I said it "traces its origin not to reason, but to certain marvellous occurrences transcending reason." He thinks that in this sentence I have done a great injustice to Spiritualism, because, though there may be "a few isolated exceptions," Spiritualists generally do not "abjure" but "appeal to" reason. "They analyze," he says, "all communications, subject them to criticism, measure them by known laws, rejecting every thing contrary to reason and common sense."

It is plain that my words were not sufficiently guarded, since my critic so entirely misunderstands the spirit in which I wrote them; yet I can but think that the connection in which the statement was made—it was made merely incidentally in an article on another subject—should have saved it from the imputation of having been made without actual examination of the views of Spiritualists and from the standpoint of popular prejudice. But the critic evidently thinks that I am not one of those who "come to the Spiritualist oracles with unprejudiced will," but that I push aside their claims without investigation, do not understand their belief, and so am led to "belittle a religion which the world cannot afford to lose."

I hasten therefore to say that nothing was farther from my intention than to say anything in the above-quoted statement which Spiritualists generally would not accept. All that I meant by it was that Spiritualism, as a specific religious movement, began in certain phenomena which were not included under any laws of Nature known at the time and which the common human understanding did not comprehend—which, indeed, the average human reason does not now accept. I was perfectly aware that Spiritualists, generally, claim that these phenomena all take place according to "law,"—that they believe the phenomena are the manifestation of some subtle laws connecting the universe of spirit with the universe of matter, which are perfectly harmonious with the known laws of Nature, which, though transcending reason at the time of their first manifestation, will after careful observation and study be entirely understood by reason.

And this is what most modern theological writers who believe in the miracles of the New Testament are now accustomed to say of those wonderful phenomena that are alleged to have attended the origin of Christianity,—that they were not an actual violation and disruption of the laws of Nature, but the coming in of some higher law, not understood by human reason at the time, yet perfectly consistent with absolute reason, and at some time to be understood by finite reason. And it was in view of this fact that I compared the origin of Spiritualism with the origin of Christianity,—not dreaming that I was saying anything that a Spiritualist would object to. The Spiritualists believe that they now understand how the New Testament "miracles"—using the word in the popular sense—were performed. They say they were phenomena of the same kind with modern Spiritualistic manifestations. If any of the New Testament miracles could now be authenticated as actual facts, I should accept this statement,—that they were phenomena of the same kind with whatever is authenticated to be fact in the Spiritualistic phenomena.

But whether the Spiritualistic interpretation of the phenomena—the ancient or the modern—is true or not, is another question; and a question which, though I have read the Spiritualistic books, and know something of the manifestations, and am not conscious of any prejudice against the theory, I have not yet been able to decide in the affirmative. I keep my mind open for further investigation. If there is any new light which reason or study or experiment can throw upon the facts, I am ready to examine them anew. They are facts which science especially should investigate. They come particularly within her domain. And science—science in its large sense, covering all biological and psychological phenomena—na—must give the ultimate decision. I welcome all scientific attempts that are made in this direction.

I have sometimes thought that Spiritualists are not always scientific in their methods,—that they are a little too quick to say "we have discovered the law," "we now understand it all," when they have only perhaps got hold of a hint, grasped a thread, leading into the great mystery of "the unknown" which reason and science are yet to explore. But they mean, I believe, to be scientific, and they are progressing towards this good; and no one could be readier than I to recognize the fact that they claim the merit of making the most important religious beliefs acceptable to "reason and common sense." The reason and common sense of multitudes of people, even of "unprejudiced" people, may still be unconvinced; but, so long as the appeal is there from both sides and we do not dogmatize, we are on the way to the truth of the matter, on whichever side it may be.

W. J. P.

DRIFTING.

Our Eastern readers will remember North Adams, Mass., as the place where a company of the "Heathen Chinese" were lately introduced to learn the art of Christian shoe-making; and some of our Western readers, no doubt, will earnestly pray that these benighted heathen may not learn and practise some of the tricks of Yankee shoe makers in Haverhill and Lynn, who know so well how to use split-leather and paper-board to their customers' sorrow. We hear that these Celestials are making good shoes. If it be a heathen delusion that there is a relation between a shoddy religion and shoddy shoes, sound faith and sound leather, then may they forever live and labor under that happy delusion! The shoddy is in the man. We shall have bad inner soles in shoes as long as we have bad inner souls in shoe-men. May John Chinaman set Jonathan a lasting example in the leather business! Whether he is really doing this or not, we cannot say; but surely he seems to be paganizing the orthodox theology of the town. Our evidence is this.

About a month or six weeks ago an Ecclesiastical Council was called in the aforesaid place to install a Rev. Mr. Pratt, which ceremony they performed after examination had proved him sound in the faith. At the same time and place, a young man by the name of Jackson, well known there and much respected for his scholarship and moral character, presented himself for ordination. In the course of his examination it was discovered that he did not believe in the endless punishment of the wicked, but in the final salvation of all men. On all other dogmas of the church he was pronounced sound. While it is true that a majority were opposed to his ordination, yet what we wish to notice is that three Orthodox preachers and one College professor and preacher were in favor of ordaining the man despite his Universalist heresy.

Is not such a fact as this very significant? Does it not show that the Orthodox Church is in danger of drifting into Universalism? These three Orthodox preachers called this old pivotal doctrine a non-essential doctrine. If so, pray what is essential? A belief in the supernatural divinity and sacrifice of Jesus? Essential for what? Not for salvation, for they admit they do not believe in damnation. Or do they mean salvation, not from the consequences of sin but from sin itself? In that sense every good man is the "savior" of men, and the world is full of little saviors and redeemers. If that is the savior they make Jesus, that and nothing more, then they strip him of all his supernatural character, and level his mission and work to that of a "mere man," and come squarely on to the rationalistic ground of Radicalism; or, as they say of Radicals, they are "drifting,"—drifting out into the trackless and rayless sea of Free Religion.

Now we respectfully warn our Orthodox brothers of their danger. They do not see, perhaps, that they are "drifting;" nor does the man in a balloon above the clouds, who floats with the current so easily that a spider's web on the flag-staff will not be ruffled; but he is drifting, and so are they. If they so carelessly drift away from one doctrine that has been floating like a buoy on the ocean of thought to guide them for eighteen centuries, who can tell when they may float away from the others? See how far they have drifted in three centuries. Calvin says,—"Beyond the bosom of the church no remission of sins is to be hoped for, nor any salvation." The Saxon confession, presented to the Synod of Trent in 1551, the Helvetic confession, the Belgic, the Scottish, all avow that salvation is only to be had in the Church. The Presbyterian divines assembled at Westminster in 1647 declared that "the visible Church . . . consists of all those throughout the world that profess the true religion, out of which there was no possibility of salvation from hell;" and their bell was not the modern Orthodox one, where "the last faint spark is expiring," nor was it the place which Dr. Farr said he thought Unitarians would go to,—a place where they could get "scorched,"—but a red-hot place where sinners would roast and fry, but never "try out," enduring agonizing torments through the endless future.

But to-day the brimstone is exhausted and the fires are extinguished, except on revival occasions when an Elder Knapp or Earle or Durant kindles them up for scenic effect, to terrify the young and timid into the refuge of the Church. Instead of meaning rescue from eternal punishment, salvation now generally means little more than the Chicago clergyman meant by it, when he warned his unregenerate hearers of their danger of going to a place of eternal—"uneasiness." Salvation from uneasiness—think of it! Jesus is our savior from "uneasiness." He shed his blood that we might be comfortable in the next world. So Jimi Flak was the savior of the travelling public over Erie,—their savior from discomfort and uneasiness. In the same sense he lived and died for our "salvation."

This change in the interpretation of Scriptural and ecclesiastical language is only one illustration of the drifting tendency of the whole religious world. The Church is drifting from old senses to new senses of creeds,—keeping the old word, but putting it into a new meaning. This evidence of the drifting tendency of Orthodoxy we have all seen, of course; but not often do we see Orthodox clergymen willing to throw away the old word altogether, and ordain a man who believes in eternal damnation in no sense. It is but another sign of the times that even churches that think themselves solidly moored, are "drifting,"—yes, drifting—from darkness into light, from ignorance into knowledge, from mental slavery into mental freedom, from superstition into reason. We are all drifting; and everything in Nature is drifting as much as we are. The moon drifts round the earth, the earth drifts round the sun, the sun itself with the whole planetary system is "drifting" on toward the constellation Hercules. Dare we trust God with the universe? Then may we trust him with ourselves. Do we not see that what we call "drifting" is but the steady march of mind according to an impelling law of mental progress? The same law that binds the universe binds us, and will as surely keep us in the true orbit of our development. Trust to the "drifting," co-operate with it, for thereby the Power above us and within us is leading humanity into a religion by which creeds shall be reckoned as "filthy rags," and a moral life shall be counted above all beliefs, and knowledge shall banish fear, and love and reason shall unite to redeem and bless mankind.

W. H. S.

ATTENTION, FRIENDS!

The members of the Free Religious Association are reminded that the Constitution asks for an annual payment of one dollar as a fee for retaining active membership. From many persons whose names stand on the record as members this payment is now due. All who make the payment before (or at) the next Annual Meeting, will receive the annual Report of the Association for 1872 free, as soon as it is printed. To all new members who will pay their dollar before the next Annual Meeting (May 30), we will send also the Report for 1871 without additional cost. And to all new members who in addition to the membership fee of one dollar will send us Fifty Cents, we will return post-paid the four back Reports. Let all who believe in the Association put themselves on its roll of members. And let not our friends forget that the Association has a Treasurer. It does not ask for much money, but the little it does ask for it wants, and it could use to advantage much more than it gets. For what objects it wants money, its annual Reports bear witness. Address the undersigned, New Bedford, Mass., or Richard P. Halliwell, the Treasurer, 98 Federal St., Boston.

WM. J. POTTER,
Secretary F. R. Association.

LONDON TOPICS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I am not brave enough, I suppose, to set fashion at defiance, and so I must begin my letter to you with a little chat about the Prince of Wales, whose continued improvement and now pretty certain recovery will enable me to say what otherwise I could not have said.

There can be no question that, underneath all the talk, there has been a very substantial and widely spread foundation of genuine feeling. Human feeling, sympathy for the wife and mother and little children, and not a little sincere loyalty to the throne, which has been rewarded by a charming letter from the dear queen to her subjects published in the Times of to-day, have been prevailing sentiments. Moreover, politicians viewed the possibility of the Prince's death as a fresh complication in national affairs deeply to be deplored. So far, so good. But over and above all this we have had such a torrent of false sentiment, buckets-full of crocodile-tears, and undertaker's grief in over-dose, that those whose proper and natural feelings of sympathy had been quickened began to feel an uncomfortable nausea, and, if not a reaction, at least a considerable cooling-down of their emotion. The question arises,—is this the fault of the press or of the people? If of the people, it shows the total absence of moral courage in the press; and if of the press, it shows what a low estimate it must take of the taste of the people. We shall have to face the problem some day as to the relation of the press to the people, whether it is to be the leader or the mere echo of public opinion.

But to get back to the Prince. The authorized prayers were not lower than the general average. Of course the doctrine of atonement had to be introduced, in case the Prince should die; but no prayer issued by the Bishops that I saw was framed on the hypothesis that God's will would be a blessing whichever way the issue turned. A week passes, the Prince is out of danger, and clerical "gush" takes a new channel. Among other notable follies, one especially must be recorded for the benefit rather than for the amusement of your readers. The Archbishop of York (as reported in the Morning Post of the 19th of Dec.), used the prayers for the Prince as a fulcrum, and H. R. H.'s recovery as a lever, to upset the incredulity of the age as regards miracles. He repeated over again all the heathenish notions about prayer with which the New Testament abounds, quoting such passages as—"Ask and ye shall receive," "Whosoever ye shall ask the Father in my name, he will give it you," &c., entirely oblivious of the fact that, if those texts were true and any one acted upon them, it would be in that man's power to overthrow not merely the order of Nature, but the moral order of Divine Government.

All this is so inexpressibly silly that one can only account for a clear and thoughtful man like Archbishop Thomson talking this rubbish by the fact that, as a Bible-worshipper, he surrendered his reason to adopt and repeat old-wives' tales.

The whole question of prayer we know to be a very difficult one; but its difficulties are frightfully aggravated by such texts as I have quoted, and such applications of them as were made by the Archbishop. You know I believe in the duty and privilege of praying to God, quite apart from any theories as to its effects; and if I were in such trouble as to be unable to trust God's providence to do what he pleased, I should certainly pray for deliverance, as I would ask my nearest friend to help me in a difficulty. But my general state of mind is such that I should no more dream of praying for any temporal good than for the sun to rise on the morrow, or for the wind to shift round from the east.

I am sending you by this mail No. 1 of a new journal called the Manchester Friend, which bids fair to earn a less local name. You must understand that it is in the hands of the ejected or resigned members of the Society of Friends, who very properly insist on retaining the name, as they retain the form of divine worship of the old Society. Moreover, it seems to an outsider that these heretical Quakers are far nearer in their principles to Barclay and Fox than are the "Orthodox" Quakers, who have for some time past been settling down in the mire of Evangelicalism.

You will find in the Manchester Friend a most interesting account of the late David Duncan, a dear and much lamented friend of mine, whom the Quakers "disowned" in consequence of his taking the chair when I first delivered my lecture on the Bible, and who died very shortly after, nominally from small-pox,—really from the depression of his system in consequence of his unjust treatment. The old Quakers, however, have not learned either wisdom or humanity yet; for they are persecuting another prominent member of their body for seconding a vote of thanks to me for my lecture on Rationalism. It is, of course, unspeakably painful to be the unwilling agent of so much strife, division, and cruelty; but I am nevertheless thankful to find that wherever the views I advocate get a hearing, the heaven works rapidly and effectually, bringing men to take a positive side one way or the other.

In my next letter I will tell you something about our progress at St. George's Hall; and will conclude this one with a few words of Professor F. W. Newman in reference to my openly dispensing with the authority and with the name of "Christ."—"It is an enormous stride," he writes, "which you have taken in the right direction. . . . No secession of Unitarians compares to it, and if you can earn the confidence of a congregation, it greatly spares you the danger of after-schisms, which are almost certain for those who try to move by gradual steps, instead of leaping at once into the only Human, Universal Religion, a Theism which refuses to stamp any prophet's name on its banner. 'God bless your enterprise,' is my heart's aspiration."

With the new year close upon us, let me repeat Mr. Newman's good wishes for my work to you and yours—"God bless your enterprise."

Very truly your friend,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E.,
December 30, 1871.

AN HOUR WITH JAMES MARTINEAU.

[LONDON], Christmas Day, 1871.

The return of this day brings many varieties of banquets and joys; to me it brings the feast and delight of hearing James Martineau. Since I have been in England, I have never lost an opportunity of hearing that great preacher, though, alas! owing to my own duties, Christmas morning is the only one afforded me. Passing down the small, and I am compelled to say filthy, street called Little Portland, I take my seat in the gloomy little chapel, and shadows fall upon me. One by one the people come in; there is no difficulty in counting them; until at last perhaps a hundred and fifty or two hundred are present. Good heads and physiognomies; but so few! Well, the Marthas preponderate in English society, and they have never been convinced that but one dish is needful on Christmas day, at least; and I am told that the congregation is larger on Sundays. No doubt; but the Little Portland Chapel will hardly seat over five hundred, and I am told it is rarely full. And while we sit here, what throngs are pouring into the thousand Gothic churches, with superb windows, and wonderful chants and anthems, where the everlasting Gospel of Nonsense is preached! The dismal thought is somewhat relieved when the fine head of Sir Charles Lyell is seen moving up the aisle; or when the beaming face of Anna Swanwick is observed, or the clear, pure eye of intelligence which, in the noble brow of Frances Power Cobbe, serves as a divining gift that can detect the true living water, though hid in the unsunned alleys of Portland district. But, after all, though it be admitted that each head that goes to hear James Martineau ought to count for twenty that go elsewhere, there is sadness even in this reflection. It is not the taught already that most need this teaching. Here is poured forth a perpetual strain of the Divine Love and Wisdom which might win the hearts of millions, could they hear it,—win them away from their bondage to base fears and phantasms. But the heedless crowd passes by. I remember an anecdote of Saadi when he was travelling with the Sheikh. An Arab boy came from the wood to the wayside, and sang a beautiful song. Saadi stopped to listen, but the Sheikh did not stop his camel. When Saadi had overtaken the high priest, he said—"O Sheikh, the strain of that boy arrested the birds in their flight through the air, but it made no impression on you. Knowest thou what the strain said to me? The zephyr bends the slender bough of the ban-tree, but it makes no impression on a stone." For Sheikh substitute a priesthood, for stone a priest-ridden people, and for the strain of music the Christmas discourse of James Martineau.

But even while I am meditating thus, there rises in the pulpit a face which rebukes me. It is the visible expression of a life which has got every poor ambition underfoot. If a pure thought floating through the air gained an incarnation, it would be in this head and front. All the more do I see this from year to year, as the lines become somewhat deeper, the mouth more delicate, the brow more strong as the seat of what grows clearer and firmer with age. This is a man of convictions! Perhaps the serenity and cheerfulness of his face and voice have, after all, their fit environment in this small audience of thoughtful people; for it attests that at least no trick of sensationalism, no joining in with the current of humbug, has ever been employed to transform this little chapel into a magnificent and popular temple.

Yes; his face rebukes my contemptuous reflection concerning the foolish multitudes I have just seen swarming along the streets to their several entertainments of piously sounding brass and tinkling cymbals. And if his face does so, even more does the discourse. For it begins by reminding us of the lowliness of that peasant life in which the Christian religion began. A few touches—touches such as only the master artist can give—and our eyes are turned to a poor little Jewish village where the boy returns with his mother. His first dream of God and the future may be as with her he looks up to the stars at eventide; his first thought on human life may be as he looks on the grief of some lowly neighbor's home. This religion born of home will forever reach the home; it will find its triumphs in the building-up of domestic virtue, and of pure characters. Then the preacher speaks of the terrible wars, the passionate clashings of nations, the rising and falling of empires. The harvest and the forest obliterate the scenes of carnage. Political changes may have obliterated even the nationalities whose passions were concentrated upon those fields. But the simple story of this peasant child lives on through all, and still holds its power to touch and charm. And why? Simply because of the humanity in it. Had Christianity addressed mankind only as the series of marvels which impress some, or of abstract dogmas which appear to sum it up for others, it could not have survived. Humanity preserves and cherishes what was born out of its heart, and steadily holds its mission to be the welfare of man. Such was the simple theme of the discourse; my pen refuses any attempt to convey the passages of poetic depth, the sentences of profound wisdom, the exquisite felicities of verbal expression, which make these discourses of James Martineau, in the highest sense, works of Art.

Yet going home—some miles on foot through Hyde Park and Kensington Gardens—I reflected on what I heard, and bethought me of what might have been. Some historians have thought that, if the Moors of Spain, instead of retiring quietly before their persecutors, had raised the cry of Jehad,—the sacred war against what they deemed false religion,—the balances might have been turned; Mahometanism might have become ruler of Europe, and the Koran be this day the sacred book in every pulpit in England. Suppose that had been so, what could James Martineau have portrayed for us this morning? Might he not have overlooked Mahomet's wars with as much facility as Christ's talk of hells and devils, or his exhortation that his friends should sell their garments to buy swords, or his declaration that he came to bring a sword? Could not as tender an oriental picture be drawn of Mahomet kneeling beside his wife before his tent in the desert, "looking up to the stars at eventide" and imploring guidance? Might not his simplicity be as sweetly extolled when, as he sped like an arrow of God, piercing every oppressive rule, and smiting every idol to the dust, he wrote on palm-leaves and on the bleached bones of sheep those exalted chapters on virtue, justice, charity, which break out at last to hymns of joy and praise?

There is but one religion, as there is but one animal form. In the Koran God says:—"Surely we have sent prophets to every nation." There is no reason why the various races of men shall not value most the doorway that destiny has opened to them. The historical religion for this people is Christianity, and one can only be glad that there are some who can filter the stream from the impurities which it has brought down from barbarous ages. But the religion of a tribe cannot in the end do for the human race, which sums in itself all tribes. No art or eloquence of even the most emancipated Christians can, after beguiling the hour with celebration of the good elements contained in one ethical sect, fail to leave us the after-thought of how much greater our treasures would be, if the leaders of religious thought welcomed the argosies freighted with truth from every age and clime as cordially as our civilization welcomes those laden with fruits and gems which cannot be found on the soil of our birth.

So I conclude from the strain of peace and goodwill to men which I heard this day, that the wise men cannot be far off who will see the ancient heaven of Christian faith gathered to one star,—who, ready to turn their backs on all the planet-gods of the past, will follow the essence of their light, as, in the newly kindled star, they point to the infant religion of Humanity born beneath it.

M. D. CONWAY.

STAUNCH ALLIES.

We heartily thank the Boston Investigator of Jan. 17, for reprinting our counter-petition, and making a strong appeal for signatures to it. Mr. Seaver also stated that a printed copy of it will be sent out with every copy of this week's edition of his paper, probably similar to our INDEX EXTRA of last week. This shows the right spirit. No matter who gets the names—let every liberal get as many as he can. The INDEX means "Universal Mental Liberty" just as unqualifiedly as the Investigator, as every one of our readers knows; and we are very glad to see that Mr. Seaver is getting rid of his former suspicion that there is some terrible cat hidden in the meal—some lurking illiberality in Free Religion. We give our hand, and our heart with it, to every man and woman who is willing to speak and act for LIBERTY, whether inside or outside of Christianity; whether materialists, spiritualists, theists, atheists, or any other set. It is time to fling overboard all minor differences, and rally to the support of the Rights of Man. To the rear all petty jealousies—to the front all earnestness, all courage, all intelligence, all love of human freedom! Push the counter-petition, till the name of every liberal in the land stands recorded there as a living protest against the reign of ecclesiastical tyranny!

We also thank the Chicago Present Age and the Baltimore Crucible, both leading Spiritual papers, for publishing the counter-petition with words of generous sympathy and co-operation. Who shall say that there is nothing in common between materialists and spiritualists, though they hold views on immortality wide as the poles apart, when they thus equally respond to the summons of present duty? Honor to both alike!

We are under obligation to Mr. W. B. Robinson of Boston, for calling our attention to the following paragraph in the Hartford (Conn.) Courant:

Tax Theological Association.—Knowing Governor Jewell's opinion of the movement to amend the Constitution of the United States, we were surprised recently to see his name among the list of Vice Presidents of the National Association, and supposed that it was used without authority. This proves to be the case, as the following note explains:

HARTFORD, January 6, 1872.

Rev. D. McAllister, General Secretary of National Association for Securing a Religious Amendment to the Constitution of the United States.

My DEAR SIR,—My attention has just been called, for the first time, to the action of the National Association, in placing my name on the list of Vice Presidents.

Such action on the part of the Association was entirely unwarranted, and so far from consenting to it, I desire that my name be stricken from the list. I should have refused my name, had I received notice of it.

After giving the matter considerable thought, I am entirely opposed to the movement, and the object sought to be accomplished by it, believing that it is impracticable and uncalculated for.

If the people at large do not acknowledge in their actions the Divine authority, it is worse than useless to attempt a national acknowledgment.

I have the honor to be

Your obedient servant,

MARSHALL JEWELL.

This is exceedingly satisfactory. It will be wise for all the other published officers of the "National Association" to withdraw their names. The movement is a far less honest one than we thought, if it deliberately uses "pious frauds" to accomplish its ends; and yet it would but follow in this respect the precedents long established by the Church.

PAINE CELEBRATION.—The 135th anniversary of the birth day of Thomas Paine will be observed in Fairbury, Ill., on Monday evening, 29th inst. Address by Parker Pillsbury.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

AN APPEAL TO THE EARNEST.

MR. ABBOT:—For the last two months I have been travelling from one town to another soliciting subscribers for THE INDEX. This experience has convinced me that there are thousands who do not yet know of the existence of the paper, who would readily subscribe for it, if it was brought to their notice. Everywhere I find that those who take it and have read it for any length of time prize it highly, and affirm that for no consideration would they be deprived of its weekly visits. I think hundreds of its subscribers have said to me:—"Never before have I taken a paper that I have read as I read THE INDEX. I read every article from beginning to end." Said a leading professor of a college to me:—"Every Sunday morning my wife and I sit down and between us we read every article in THE INDEX." Said he:—"I saw by THE INDEX that Mr. Abbot contemplated enlarging it, and I immediately wrote to him not to enlarge it, as I was fearful that, if it was enlarged, he would not be able to make the whole paper so readable as at present, and we should be compelled to select from its columns." The liberals who have read the paper have said to me in every place where I have been:—"You are engaged in a good work. Nothing is more necessary at the present time than to give THE INDEX a wide circulation."

This being the state of the case, it appears to me that it is the duty of every subscriber to canvass his immediate neighborhood for the paper. If you can not devote a whole week (which I think you should afford to), devote one day to that object. Don't be too modest, but politely speak to all in relation to the matter. You will be surprised to learn that many whom you had not suspected of liberal thoughts will listen to you and subscribe for the paper, when you show them the names of the able contributors.

Then if the first or second or tenth person to whom you introduce the paper refuses to subscribe, do not be discouraged. Very likely the next one is the subscriber that you will secure.

In many and most of the places where I have been, about the first thing that has been said to me by some subscribers has been—"You can't get any one to take THE INDEX here;" and he has often been surprised at my readily obtaining his next neighbor. The only reason that he had not procured his name was that he had not asked him. I have no doubt at all that, if every subscriber to THE INDEX will spend one day in his or her vicinity soliciting subscribers, that you will be obliged the week after to send out from your office three times the number of papers sent at present; and I now desire to propose that on Saturday, the 3rd day of February, EVERY SUBSCRIBER TO THE INDEX who believes that its wide circulation would prove beneficial to humanity shall donate that day exclusively to canvassing for it, and that each shall at once send the result of the day's labor to you for publication in THE INDEX.

H. L. GREEN.

[If any or all of our subscribers should feel stirred by Mr. Green's wholly unsolicited and very friendly appeal to canvass for THE INDEX, we shall be happy to publish the name of every such volunteer canvasser with the number of new subscriptions he or she obtains, as an encouragement to others who may be less sanguine of success.—ED.]

THE FIRST RESPONSE.

192 BROADWAY, N. Y., Jan. 6, 1872.

HON. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I hope this will be the first letter you will receive, authorizing you to affix a signature to the petition protesting against the destruction of the Constitution of the United States and liberty on this continent—as I have a pride in standing just as near to the top of the column of signatures as possible.

I do not share, however, in your belief that our country has anything to fear from the Convention of allow re-actionists against whom your petition is directed. I think our people no longer feel the need of a keeper of the public or private conscience. There is one factor of the problem, which, sinking modesty, you must recognize—and that is, that the flag-staff at Toledo is so tall that the whole country can, without a spy-glass, read the inscription on the flag at its peak—"Liberty."

Yours truly,

W. H. BOUGHTON.

[We are glad to say that our friend's wish was gratified. His letter was the first we opened that authorized us to append a signature to the petition; and his name was therefore the first that was recorded after the one put there at the start.—ED.]

BIBLE AUTHORITY FOR A VERY CRUEL ACT.

Our good people are just now much exercised by the shooting of the young students in Cuba, by the atrocious volunteers. This indignation at Spanish cruelty is correct; we share it! But if they will consult II Samuel, chapter 21, they will find that the Bible sanctions a similar act in the Gibeonites through David. The uprooting of the house of Saul was indeed a more cruel deed, for the grand-children of Saul had not committed even the semblance of a crime. It was simply the bloody extermination of a family that might have created a rivalry against David, who incited the hostility of the Gibeonites against Saul, as a device of his own murderous heart.

ABOUS.

THE RIGHT RING.

LAKE CITY, Minn., Jan. 9, 1872.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Last evening I read your address in THE INDEX, relative to the Constitutional Amendment business, together with the call for the Cincinnati Convention, and your call for names to a counter-petition or remonstrance to the one they propose. Nothing has stirred my blood so since the days when the secessionists fired on Fort Sumter. I slept on it; and this morning, before I took my breakfast, I prepared a paper for signatures, determined that at least one more name should go up with yours to express our NO to any such amendment. I have been out most of the day, and now have about one hundred names of our best citizens, and think I will be able to get, at least, as many more, which I will forward to you in due time.

But I write you at present to make a suggestion. Would it not be well to have the petition, with such preamble as would be a sufficient explanation, printed in the proper form to be attached to papers for names, and sent to every city, town, village and hamlet in the country, from ocean to ocean, from the lakes to the gulf? In that way names may be obtained in thousands of places where they will not be, if you depend on somebody else to draw up in writing the required instrument. It would have the advantage of being uniform everywhere.

Many persons whose minds are right on this matter do not understand it, and do not wish to give their names till they see what they are to be placed to. I find many who at first seem indifferent, thinking it is an amendment we are wanting. But when they fully understand that the Constitution as it now is guarantees complete religious freedom, and that it is proposed to change it so that it will not be so, then they say, "We want the Constitution as it is. It is good enough." This needs to be made short, definite and clear. If printed, it can be more easily examined and understood than if written.

If I can have some such headings, I can procure a list of names from every town in our county, and some one could do the same for every county in the country. Your address of December 24th ought to be published in tract form, and scattered broadcast over the land. This matter would be all right, if most people understood it. Several Orthodox Church members have put their names to the remonstrance to-day; and more will. I have not gone to the ladies yet, but I am going. I know many will sign.

You, sir, have so many compliments for THE INDEX that it would only be common-place for me to add another. But I have never known any paper so honest and so independent since the days of the Herald of Freedom, edited by N. P. Rogers at Concord, N. H.

Yours for the truth,

D. K. BOUTELLE.

THE AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY "A COSTLY ABOMINATION."

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Your assertion that, by the expensive machinery of some of our Evangelical Missionary Societies, it "takes three dollars to send one to the heathen," meets, as might be expected, with indignant protests from the editors of Evangelical papers.

It was "an unwelcome truth," and all the more unpalatable coming from you. I wish to show by the confession of its own members that the American Tract Society is open to the same charge; and I cannot but hope that, as the indictment is made by Evangelical men and published in a paper edited by an Orthodox clergyman, it will be received at least with greater calmness.

The Boston Daily News (edited by Rev. Dr. Marvin) contains a report of a "most important business meeting" of the American Tract Society, on the occasion of its fifty-sixth anniversary, held at the Old South Chapel the day before, May 25, 1870, at which Deacon Ropes said—"The expenses of continuing the Society was ruinous. Last year it cost $40,000 to distribute $20,000 worth of publications!" Dr. Marvin offered a resolution that—"It is the judgment of this meeting that the society come to an end;" and it was carried, by a vote of 80 to 70.

The same paper of a later date states that, according to the published report, "the net assets reckoned as $160,934 in 1869, are estimated in 1870 as $20,330!" "The Society would be insolvent, if creditors pressed their claims." Dr. Marvin, after stating that by a subsequent vote "the Society is to continue," repeats his previously expressed conviction that the American Tract Society is "a costly abomination of which the management has been atrociously disgraceful," and that "the institution may have a name to live for a year or two longer, but the end cannot long be deferred,—a natural death."

"Unwept, unhonored and unsung."

There, Bro. Abbot, if you have drawn up a graver impeachment that this against any Missionary Society, or other Evangelizing agency, I have not yet seen it.

"True, 'tis a pity, and pity 'tis, 'tis true."

But the editor of the Independent, I presume, will not question your authorities, if you publish this, for the truth's sake.

At this anniversary Rev. Geo. B. Spalding declared that "the tract has come to be regarded with disfavor by some of the clergy," and that "infidels" are resorting to it, "in order to bring their delusive theories before the public."

By "infidels," of course, the speaker meant such rationalists as yourself and our friend Whipple, whose two admirable series of "New Tracts," advertised in THE INDEX, and "intended to teach religion without superstition"—some forty in all—are to my certain knowledge having a wide circulation, and I am confident are doing an immense amount of good.

Is it not one of the most hopeful signs of the times, that such "a costly abomination" as the American Tract Society is dying "a natural death—unwept, unhonored and unsung," while at Toledo, Syracuse, Boston and other places, thoroughly Liberal Tracts are being put in circulation in the most economical and efficient manner, and in great numbers, to take the place of the discarded tracts?

J. L. HATCH.

WESTBORO, (Mass.), Jan. 6.

NAMES WANTED.

The following counter-petition is now open for signature at THE INDEX Office in Toledo. It will be forwarded to Congress as soon as the proper time shall arrive:—

COUNTER-PETITION.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully and earnestly ask your honorable bodies to preserve inviolate the great guarantees of religious liberty now contained in the Constitution of the United States, and to dismise all petitions asking you to adopt measures for amending said Constitution by incorporating in it a recognition of "God as the source of all authority and power in civil government," and of "the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the Nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority." We protest against such proposed amendments as an attempt to revolutionize the government of the United States, and to overthrow the great principles of complete religious liberty and the complete separation of Church and State on which it was established by its original founders.

Send your own name, and as many other names as possible, authorizing me to append them to the above counter-petition. Roll up the list to thousands and tens of thousands of names. Let such a protest be heard as shall put a speedy end to this fanatical attempt to subvert the fundamental principles of this free republic. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,

Editor of THE INDEX,

Toledo, O.

"Johnny" said one of the boys to a bereaved friend who had just lost his father, "yer behaved well at the funeral."

"Oh pahaw!" replied Johnny with the air of one whose merits are only half recognized; "you should have seen me at the grave."

A Weekly Paper Devoted to
FREE RELIGION.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 3, 1872.

WHOLE NO. 110.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARBET, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WERTWORTH HUGHESON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAISE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.
Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio."]

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1872.

THE TRANSFORMATION OF PIETY.

BY SAMUEL LONGFELLOW.

[Third Lecture in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, January 21, 1872.]

I have named my lecture "The Transformation of Piety." I hope that, before I get through, this will prove a more fitting name than "The Decay of Piety," which at first might seem the true expression. I might have called it "Rational Piety."

But whatever the phrase, there can be little doubt, I think, of the fact that the frame of feeling which is called Piety has been much more prominent in some former periods than now; and that at the present time it is more characteristic of other forms of religious organization and belief than of our own. This cannot be called a devout age, by eminence; nor are radical believers marked as prominently as others by piety and a love for the expressions and exercises of devotional feeling. We may rejoice at this, or we may lament it; but I think no one will deny the fact. We disuse and dislike the peculiar phraseology of piety. We suspect the man upon whose lips it is frequent. We cannot sympathize with its utterance in books. We do not care to have schools, public meetings, governmental papers, opened with prayer. It would not come naturally to us to do it. In our congregations the three prayers are reduced to one. The so-called sacraments are silently dropped into disuse. Prayer meetings are utterly unknown among us, nor do we find ourselves much edified if we stray into other people's. Family prayers are not the custom of our households. We do not habitually "ask a blessing" at table. Even if one of our ministers visits at your house, you do not feel called upon to change your ordinary ways in this particular, nor does he desire or expect that you should ask him to do what you are not in the habit of doing yourself.

Now we may, I say, rejoice in this, as Paul rejoiced to be delivered from the burden of Jewish ritual against whose prescribed and imposed pieties his free nature rebelled,—as Luther breathed a freer and happier breath, when the load of Roman Catholic ceremonial was lifted off his shoulders. And so far as the change has freed us into sincerity and naturalness from any morbid moods, superstitious observances, or artificial routines, we have great reason to rejoice, glad to do nothing which is not healthy and genuine for us. At other times, and in other aspects of the matter, we may lament, and not without some reason, too, on that side,—may lament as for the loss of something that was sweet and dear and real, too; even as we mourn when the loveliness of summer days fades away into the winter's drear cold. We would fain cling to those delicious hours which bathed us in a genial atmosphere in whose tempered glow our life-current flowed freely and softly and restfully. But we cannot help ourselves. Perhaps we shall find, if we bravely face the winter, that its cold is healthful, bracing, exhilarating, and has a vital glow and warmth of its own, as well as a beauty of its own.

It is idle and unwise to regret that which comes about naturally. There are incidental losses and griefs connected with all change. But movement is the condition of life, and only some moral or spiritual unfaithfulness can take from us the essential things. In losing the form, it often seems to us as if we had lost the reality, and it may be so for the moment. But if we are true, it will have its resurrection, no longer in an earthly but in a heavenly body; as when we bury the seed that leaf and flower may spring up,—as when we lay away in the earth the earthly body so dear, and put it out of our reach and sight, that the spiritual presence may be felt in our hearts which can never be taken away. Our beliefs which are the outward forms of our faith are idols or images of God and divine things. And when at Truth's command we break our idols, for a time it may seem as if angels had vanished, and worship were no more, and heaven itself were void of God. But if we press forward instead of looking back,—if we look inward instead of out,—we shall find the God who was over our heads now at our side, nay, within our souls. For he is the permanent sanctity that to the reverent spirit invests the familiar. When no longer sought outside of his universe, he is found within it. Our beliefs are temporary forms of the understanding, but our faith is a spiritual affection; and however the old pieties may perish, the central, ineradicable instincts of the spirit cannot fail to put forth in a new piety, which, if not so ardent, will be as real, and more tranquil and sweet. These spiritual instincts are of the soul's substance, and cannot perish while it continues to live.

But it is not among ourselves alone that this decay of the old pieties exists. Even among the stricter and pietistic sects, though many of the old forms remain unbroken, the intensity of the old spirit is greatly abated before the spirit of the age. I will not ask in what Roman Catholic community of this day are to be found the ecstasies of a St. Theresa or the fiery asceticisms of a Loyola or St. Dominic. In our own Orthodox community of New England, how lukewarm are the practices of devotion in comparison with those of our forefathers, whether in respect of ardor or frequency? What Orthodox clergyman now sets apart a day in every week to be devoted to fasting and abasement before God, as did our Puritan progenitors when they wrestled with the Almighty to turn away his wrath or to wring from him a blessing? What Orthodox congregation would now bear a prayer of an hour's length, such as the ministers of old poured out when they had great assistance of the spirit? The causes of this modification of piety are not far to seek. It has come about gradually, and in a great part healthfully. It is partly a reaction or swing of the pendulum from one extreme to another; a rehabilitation of the world and the flesh from the anathemas or the slights of a pietism which classed those with the devil, placed religion mainly in emotion, and drew a sharp line between things natural and things holy. Partly it is an orderly growth in the development of different elements of human nature and life, bringing up in their turn the pursuits of the understanding, the activities of the will, and the humane instincts, into co-ordination with the devout sentiments, and so taking from these last something of their prominence. Partly it is a change of form and phraseology—an old friend in a new guise, and therefore not immediately recognized, so much are men governed by words and names. A man may speak of Nature or the Universe as reverently as another of God; he may trust himself as confidently and as credibly to the Eternal, Beneficent Laws as another to the will of God or the Divine Providence. They speak of the same thing under a different name. Then the piety is as real in one case as in the other; for the Piety is in the Reverence and Trust in something beyond man, not in the name given to its object.

One cause of the change of which I have been speaking is to be found, I think, in the enlarged and multiplied activities of our age; the development of resources of industry, of business, of art; the increase of travel, the creation of new occupations and professions, the springing-up of new movements of charity and reform and new questions of discussion,—all this creates a multiplicity of interests and excitement, which take largely from the time which in simpler periods could be given to purely religious pursuits, and from the interest which could be felt in them when they were a chief excitement. A man who attends many meetings, and hears many lectures and concerts, and reads many books, will not want to hear so many sermons and prayers, though he may want to hear better ones. His devotional feeling will be but one among many demanding expression and affording delight. Then all these multiplied activities relate largely to man's external life and use the external faculties of his mind; so they draw men away from the interior regions of the spirit where dwell the devout emotions. Their noise deadens the ear to the still small voice. Their intrusive bustle leaves little space for that quiet which nourishes the sense of sanctity, of reverence, of trust. The publicity of this modern life leaves little room for the visits of the Spirit who seeth in secret. Even in matters connected with religion, externals largely carry the day—outward standards of success—money values—what will show. And in the stir of reform movements and the activities of benevolence, something of the same thing is true. They relate largely and justly to the improving the outward condition of men.

Then in the increased pursuit of physical science, and the growing prevalence of a philosophy founded upon it, we have another cause of the abatement and modification of piety. Physical science, in whose growth, results, victories, we all, I hope, delight, uses for its instruments the senses and the understanding—the most external faculties of the mind. It is distrustful of imagination. With feeling, of course, it has nothing to do. With its appropriate instruments and in its own sphere, it has done great things and will do greater. It is no disparagement to it that it knows nothing out of its sphere, that it knows nothing of aspiration, humility, awe, righteousness, holiness, religion, God. It has to do with the finite, the visible and the tangible. Its triumph is observation. Do not ask it for that which cometh not with observation—the unseen, the spiritual, the infinite.

I have less praise for the philosophy founded on this science, because, professing to cover and explain all the facts of Nature, it ignores a large part of the facts of human nature, denying the validity of those inward perceptions, intuitions of the spirit, which seem to me as real as any outward facts. Accepting nothing which the senses cannot verify, it of course tends to materialism (I do not use the word as a term of reproach). Doubtful of the existence of spirit, or making it but a product of matter; denying any God superior to humanity, or declaring that we can have no knowledge of him save that he is the unknowable cause of what is, its influence, of course, is to discourage, if not destroy, those devout affections which lay hold upon God in the joy and peace of conscious communion.

Finally, our modifications of theological belief tend away from the intensities and fervors of piety and from the frequency of its special exercises, and the use of its special phraseology. When a man really believed that there was a daily fight between two beings, God and Satan, for the possession of his soul, with a literal hell and literal heaven depending on the conflict, which might close at any moment, and whose result was every moment doubtful, with what intensity of struggling would he cling to the throne of grace, praying to be saved! When a man believed that every sin was an infinite evil, as an insult to God whose almighty and wrathful justice was pledged to punish it with eternal torments, if unrepented of before death, with what abasement of remorse and fear would he humble himself in the entreaty to be forgiven! When he believed that only by the merits of a bleeding Savior his soul could be saved in eternity, how passionate might well be his appeal that those merits might be applied to him! How could he cease to importune day and night for himself and for those dear to him, if at last his prayer might be effectual to save the brand from the burning? When he believed that God was a jealous Sovereign visiting the land with terrible judgments for its forgetfulness of his name, how natural for him to court the divine good will, or seek to avert his wrath by the introduction of his name into every formal instrument and state paper! When he believed that verbal prayer was a command of God, and therefore an obligatory duty and an acceptable offering, how scrupulous would he be to observe the steadily recurring seasons of performance—how remorseful if one were omitted or not delighted in! When a man believed life to be an exile, the world and its work to be evil, religion something to be set apart to special days and acts, an observance of the divinely appointed times and means of grace, he might easily throw an intensity into those occasional specialties saved up, so to speak, from ordinary use, and put a peculiar stress upon them as his occasions of meeting and serving his God.

In short, in proportion as a man believes in an individual God apart from the universe, separated from human souls, who governs the world by edicts and commands, who deals with men by separate and momentary volitions, who can be influenced, and moved to change his will by importunities—just in that proportion will he seek him in places and times set apart from ordinary uses, in ways believed specially efficacious, and by special requests for the things he desires.

Above all, when he not only thus anthropomorphizes God, but specially incarnates him in the Christ of the churches—clothes him in those flowing robes—gives to him those long and parted locks, that tender, sad, pale countenance, those mournfully reproachful eyes, those lips trembling with pain and with love; when he hangs him upon the cross with the crown of thorns, the pierced side, the bleeding feet—an agonized and dying God, dying for him;—how easy in a flood of emotion to fall at those feet, to cling to that cross, in the impassioned entreaty that for him that blood be not shed in vain! Or when he places this same visible human God upon the throne of his judgment-seat, on his judgment day, pronouncing the bliss or the doom, unspeakable and irrevocable—how can he help crying out with terror and with tears that he be not a castaway?

But we have grown away from and given up all these conceptions of God. Not one of them do we any longer hold to. And the feeling that had allied itself to them must seek for itself new forms.

For the reasons which I have named, I think that there will continue for some time to be a diminished interest in the special exercises of piety and devotional feeling. The forces will pass into thought and action. The generation now coming forward will more and more find the forms of their religion in the various activities of human intelligence, effort, and good will. And this will be so in spite of the efforts which will be made to counteract this process by those who will deem it a decline of religion, while it will truly be a purification and enlargement of it. Thus will be completed the reaction against that view of religion which makes it to consist altogether or mainly in devout exercises of feeling, separate from morality and charity, in what is called "faith," apart from knowledge, character and deed. The piety of the coming time will be less intense; it will be more broad, natural, rational, cheerful.

It may happen indeed in some cases that, in being broadened, the devout spirit may be dissipated. In the transition from one belief to another, in the throwing-off of superstitions, the reverences torn away from the old ideas may not at once gather about the new. Such a transition is a period of questioning and criticism, and the critical frame of mind is hostile to the trustful and the reverential. The understanding is suspicious of sentiment and emotion. But this need be only a passing phase, if we press on to the fullness of the new truth.

It may also happen that in the growing sense of the worth and dignity of man, in the rescue of human nature from the degradation that has been cast upon it, in the recognition of human ability and the discovery that much which the religionists have been wont to relegate to the will of God is truly within human will, that man is to a large extent his own Providence, his own savior; it may easily happen, I say, that in this growing reverence for man may be absorbed the reverence that has been given to a God above man. But again the remedy is not in going back, but in pressing on and doing justice to every part of human nature in an affirmation of the truth. The remedy for disproportionate knowledge is, not less knowledge, but more feeling, and deeper and loftier feeling.

If our lives are to be kept from being sordid and mean, they must be elevated by aspiration, by ideals, by reverence for that which is above us.

Our own ideal helps us somewhat—the remembrance of our best thought, noblest feeling and highest aim; that better self which is in all men, calling them upward.

The goodness and truth of noble men and women around us whom we have known and read of, the embodied ideal of human excellence, helps and elevates us.

But these are changing and imperfect; they but point us to the perfect holiness which they represent as the abiding object of our reverence and aspiration.

If in this world of changes our hearts are to be kept from failing and our lives from wreck, we must have some unchanging Trust.

Our own will and courage are much. The reliance on human friendship and fidelity is much.

But we know that these are not sufficient for every need. There is an All-Sufficient—the Immutability—the Power whose sacred will is a sacred, universal, perfect, beneficent law, which cannot let us utterly fall—above, beneath, around us, within us; the God who besets us behind and before; the everlasting arms of strength and love.

That Trust we need, O how much! to keep us tranquil amid the anxious stir and fret and hurry of our daily work—amid the uncertainties of our mortal way.

That Trust we need, how much! in the hours of pain and loss, and disappointment and overwhelming sorrow, when the earth rocks under our feet and the storm beats on our defenceless head, and the sea roars and its waves go over us, and we feel as if we must every moment lose our hold and be borne out into the desolate and shoreless main; then we must put forth the wings of our faith, and let them lift us upward in the serenity of the steadfast, immovable, eternal, that from the height of his peace and in the light of his purposes of good we may look down on the storm of our sorrow, and see that all is well.

Believing, as most of us do, in the spiritual capacity of man, in the trustworthiness of that native instinct in him which leads him to look up to a mind beyond his own mind, to a power beyond his own will, to a justice and a love beyond the human, to a perfect and an infinite source of all that exists,—in a word, to God; how can we fail to feel for this supreme wisdom, power, beauty, goodness and justice the reverence they must naturally inspire? How can the thought of this sanctity be other than a consecration of our souls? Believing not in a God, remote from his universe, but in God, the central Spirit and indwelling Life, close to every atom and to every soul, how can this thought fail to be a spring of perpetual veneration, trust and love, filling common places and things with the sanctity of a holy presence? Believing in the immediateness of our access to him, through that spiritual nature of ours which is always mediator and revealer because it is at once human and divine, how can we fail, not through special acts and forms and times and books and places, but always and everywhere to open our hearts and minds and wills in the seeking spirit of constant humility and faith, which are the perpetual prayer—what one has called "the reciprocity through all obstructions of the act of presence." It is the reverent acceptance of all the laws of the universe.

But if, when we have put off from our conception of God all individual personality in the thought of an all-pervading personality, the spirit, or essential being, of truth, right, power, beauty, love, surely this essential Spirit is what we can most spiritually and therefore most really reverence, love, and trust.

Surely reverence for truth is higher than even reverence for a true one. And trust in the sacred, perfect laws of beneficent power is something higher than trust in an individual will. And ardent love for ideals and principles beyond persons is possible,—above all, love for Love.

To this supreme Spirit our spirits recognize their likeness and kinship, and justify our hearts in saying "Our Father." This kinship of the Ever-Near is his sympathy in all our needs.

I say this kinship with God is his sympathy with all our needs.

When we say of the universal Spirit of life Our Father, it is not merely an expression of affection. Nor do we mean by it only that God created and cares for us with protecting, patient kindness. We mean more than that he loves us and that we love him. We mean that we are born from him, that we are of his substance, of his nature. He is spirit, we are spirits, essentially. That makes him our Father, that makes us his sons, to be of the same nature. To be spirits,—that is, to be thought, love, will, in their high and ideal essence; to be in some infantile and rudimentary degree what he is in supreme fullness, thought, love, will. Feel how this identity of nature brings us into intimate communion, nay, intercommunion—we in him, he in us; the outflow of our aspiration of mind, heart and will being responded to by his inflow of tides of inspiration, flooding our mind with truth, our heart with spiritual love, our consciences with right, our wills with lofty energy of good! Is not such a sympathy and blending far more than any mere tenderness that a superior being might feel for one of altogether different order? We do not lose then the Divine sympathy in giving up the belief in him as an individual being compassionably condescending from his throne to our weakness and needs and sufferings; but we gain a far nobler and higher ideal form of sympathy,—a far more intimate form than that which regards the Almighty as looking down from a far off heaven compassionately on our griefs.

A Divine sympathy in our efforts! The thinker alone with his thought,—reverently and purely seeking the truth with all the power of his mind, putting away prejudice, and self-seeking, and fear of human opinion, because of his supreme reverence for the truth,—finds his mind illumined in a way that he can only attribute to the Infinite Source of truth. And when, in pure good-will to men and from no personal ambitions, but even at personal sacrifice, he utters this truth to the world, it is not as a mere private opinion, but as what he has received of a truth beyond himself. It is a revelation,—not in the ordinary theological or miraculous sense,—but as provided for in the original and permanent relation of the human mind to the Infinite mind. The inspiration from above is no less real that it comes by a natural law; that is, by the fulfilment of conditions. And this confidence of a sincere and faithful seeker of the truth gives him great courage and patience in the thought of the Mind beyond his mind whose thought he in part repeats. "Oh God, I think thy thoughts after thee."

And when a man loves others deeply and unselfishly, loves what is highest in them and loves them for their best good, he may truly feel that God is loving them through him and that he is loving the God in them—the spark and particle of divinity which is possible in all men. And that thought will inspire and elevate his benevolence and make it long-suffering, keep it patient and enduring, hopeful and faithful to the end.

And so a man's conscience, devoted to the defence or establishment of the right, becomes a channel of the universal justice. Therefore it speaks with command, and is kept pure and quick, and is made victorious.

And in the same way a human will, putting forth its energies in the creation of use, beauty, justice and good, becomes electric with the traversing currents of the eternal, living will, and can say, "My Father worketh and I work"—"The Father who dwelleth in me doeth the works."

In hours of weakness, of prostrated hopes, of broken ideals, the hope that still springs up within us and the courage that rouses itself to bear on and work on, are so much of the eternal purpose that secures the final result of good to all, of the Divine will that seeks to act through all to accomplish its purpose.

For this will enfold in its wide sweep every little plan of good and every private hope of good that lights up with its cheer any true heart.

I know all the deductions that must be made for human imperfection and mistake; but the principle is not shaken by them.

In closing let me say a word about the language of piety. Remember that its reverence, trust and love are ideal feelings. Now feeling and imagination have their own language and their own truth, different from that of the understanding, or matter of fact. We all know that poetry has its forms of expression, not literally true, but imaginatively true,—true to feeling, but not to fact. All figures of speech are of this sort. We should think a man dull and prosaic indeed who should object to our speaking of the smile on the face of the landscape, because the landscape has no face and cannot therefore smile.

In the same way the language of piety is not to be held to literal accuracy. In the utterance of devout feeling, we use such words as feeling prompts, we give wings to our thoughts. And to express that undefined emotion which is truly beyond speech, we use all hints and suggestions, every varied symbol of language. Provided that in our thinking we hold clearly and firmly to the truth of thought, in our devout moods we need not fear to use the familiar words of piety. In all sincerity we can repeat:—"The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want. He maketh me to lie down in green pastures, he leadeth me by the still waters. Though I walk through the valley of the shadow, I will fear no evil, for thou art with me. Thy rod and thy staff they support me. My cup runneth over,"—or whatever other sentences of piety remain perennially fresh and fragrant to the soul.

But deeper than all speech lies in the true heart the abiding spirit of reverence, trust and love. They abide, though the forms which for a time embodied them and nurtured them are one after another given up, as more and more clearly that reality is comprehended which they but represented, and nobler interpreters appear. These emotions may become almost too sacred for speaking of, except only in the most intimate confidence and the rarest moments and the fewest words. They may seldom be put into definite words, but they will send their glow through all our thoughts and silently refine and elevate our every deed.

If thus our piety cease to seek special times, forms, places, books and persons, because it has found God nearer than them all; if it disappear from the surface because it has become inward and central; if it become invisible because it has become truly spiritual, it will be in truth not the Decay but the Transformation of Piety,—nay rather its Transfiguration.

[For THE INDEX.]

PAGANISM AND INSPIRATION.

MY DEAR MR. ABBOT:

I have been greatly interested by an article from the pen of Rev. Dr. Edward Beecher on the Hymn of Cleanthes, in the Old and New for January. It touches an old favorite of mine, and is a noteworthy sample of Christian reasoning and candor.

Says the good and learned Doctor:—"The hymns and psalms and sacred songs of the Hebrew Bible are a phenomenon in the history of literature that nothing can account for but the inspiration of God." This is all very well, as far as it goes, and I for one shall not controvert it. He proceeds to speak of "sacred literature outside of the Bible," and, comparing it with that inside, becomes still more deeply impressed with "the divine fulness and glory of the psalms and hymns of the word of God;" and his conviction is reinforced "that nothing can account for them but the inspiration of God." And then, to nail this argument and clinch it forever, he proceeds to say:—"And this effort will be augmented by a careful study even of the one hymn which, rising above the marshes and mists of frozen mythology, at last comes into the sunshine of the true God." This hymn is that of Cleanthes, of which he gives a history and translation, but does not invoke inspiration to account for it.

Now in all human candor, if Dr. Beecher has given us the sense of this one hymn, he ought to admit that it cannot be accounted for but by the inspiration of God, if he asks us to believe that the psalms of David cannot be. If he does not admit any miracle in the case of the Greek poem, it must be because the poetical style and imagery of David are superior to those attained by Cleanthes, and not because the view of the Divine Being developed by the latter is less worthy. On the contrary, David in the very psalm the poetical imagery of which Bishop South so justly praises, addresses an anthropomorphic God, one who promises to be faithful to those who make and keep their vows to him, and "to tear to pieces" all who forget him. Again, in the sublime eighteenth Psalm, God is represented as a being who with the froward will show himself froward; and the way he did it is detailed in the forty-first verse. He gave David the necks of his enemies, that he might destroy them that hated him. "They cried, but there was none to save them; even unto the Lord, but he answered them not." If poor pagan Cleanthes had given such a view of God in his hymn, would any possible beauty or sublimity of diction or imagery have availed for a claim of inspiration? The conception of God as a partisan warrior, relentless and inexorably sympathizing with the ends and passions of one of the human parties, is by no means beyond the power of the unaided human mind. Nothing is left on which Dr. Beecher can claim inspiration for David and deny it to Cleanthes, except the superiority of style, or the difference of personal character or power of the two. Is David's style more miraculous, considering his advantages for producing it? We all know his biography as courtier, adventurer and king of the theocracy founded by Moses. His was a better training for a great poet than that of the poor Greek pugilist, and Stoic student, Cleanthes. Vastly better than that of the more modern poet-actor, Shakespeare, if we should take him. Dr. Beecher will remember the canon that a god should not intervene without a knot worthy of his powers. If mere literary marvels are to call for special divine interposition, where is it to end?

But if the good Doctor of Divinity reverts to the substance of the Hebrew Psalms as the proof of inspiration, then I call upon him to name to the readers of THE INDEX one single Psalm of them all which, for a reverent, ennobling, pure and soul-satisfying view of the Deity, is equal to that of Cleanthes.

Of the personal history of Cleanthes I, for one, know but little; but that little inclines me to think that God would as soon choose him, as the medium for purifying the world's theology. If he must select any special medium, as the romantic and passionate son of Jesse. A professional athlete in Asia Minor, he came to Athens to study under Zeno, so poor that he had to work to pay his board and so zealous to learn that he earned his money by drawing water for a gardener in the night. The story is that he was suspected of theft and brought before the Court of Areopagus to be disposed of as a vagabond, not having "visible means of support." The testimony of the gardener saved him, and so impressed the Court that it voted him ten minas or about $100, which he refused to accept on the ground that self-support was his duty. When reviled as an ass, "Yes," he pleasantly replied—"I am Zeno's; he has none but me able to carry his pack." Reproached for his timidity, he replied—"It is a fortunate defect, for it makes me commit fewer crimes." The peripatetics he compared to musical instruments, which make sounds which they themselves do not understand.

These little straws all indicate that he had no great reverence for popular slams. This man belonged to a school as stern as the Puritan, and for about a quarter of a century was at the head of it. The great English divine of the seventeenth century, whose church was equally proud of his learning and disgusted at his candor, Ralph Cudworth, in his great work against atheism, says:—"But because many are so extremely unwilling to believe that the Pagans ever made any religious address to the supreme God as such, we shall have to set down an excellent and devout hymn of the same Cleanthes to him; the rather because it has been but little taken notice of." The prevalence of this Christian unwillingness at the time, is perhaps one reason why so few such hymns were revived, with the revival of ancient literature.

That readers unacquainted with the original may be able to judge fairly of the theological merits of the hymn, I submit, in addition to the more ornate versions of Drs. Beecher and Clarke, in Old and New, a more literal rendering, from which I have carefully excluded every shade of thought not fairly contained in the words, admitting an additional line, for which there seems good internal, if not external, authority, and marking in parenthesis a reading which appears doubtful:

HYMN TO ZEUS.

BY CLEANTHES.

First of immortals, many-named, all powerful ever,
Zeus, Author of Nature, by law amidst all girding,
Hail! For thee it becomes all mortals to address.
For we spring from thee, with expressive voice allotted us,
Alone of all that live and move on earth.
Therefore will I hymn thee, and ever stir thy power.
Thee the host of worlds, round about the earth,
Follows, wherever thou leadest, and willingly by thee is ruled.
Such a minister hast thou in thy invincible hands,
The two-edged, fiery, ever-living lightning,
Beneath whose blow all Nature quails,
Whereby thou carriest out the one plan which all
Perseveres (extending through all lights great and small),
So much art thou the born, Supreme King through all,
Nor is any thing done on earth without thee, O God:
Nor in the divine etherial sky, nor in the sea,
Save what the God do of their own folly.
But thou knowest how to make one excellent whole:
Thou bringest order out of disorder, and to thee unlovely things are lovely.
For so dost thou harmonize into one plan all good and evil,
That there is ever one purpose of all.
Wherefrom all who depart are bad men,
Unhappy, who, ever desiring what fills to the good,
Neither see nor listen to the universal law of God,
Which obeying in wisdom they would have a good life.
But of their own will they rush, unseemly, in diverse ways,
Some striving hard for empty fame.

Some turned aside after gains inordinant,
Others to sloth, and the pleasure of sense,
Hanging upon themselves things wholly the reverse of this.

But, all-giving Zeus, Lord of clouds and lightning,
Rescue men from miserable ignorance;
Dispel it, thou Father, from the soul, and give mastery of Wisdom, wherein thyself trusting, thou guidest all things righteously.
That, being honored, we may reflect honor on thee,
Hymning thy works continually as becomes
Us, being mortals; since there is no better gift for men,
Nor for gods, than justly to praise the universal law.

All this and more too, of course, is contained in these well chosen words, the curious felicity of which no translation of mine can approach. The first word, for example, means first or most glorious, in the sense of being the conceiver or originator. Behind the omnipresence of the electric life, which ever and anon makes Nature shudder, sits this inconceivable conceiver, himself unrevealed, revealing an all-containing plan, which conscious freedom may try in vain to thwart. This illimitable God we, limited offshoots, can only know as law; though we may, if not must, worship him, according to our capacity, as a person. As to the plan itself, we can know it as far as we can see it. It being boundless, both in time and space, we can really never know it, but only of it. But this plan so repeats and multiplies itself in orderly cycles, and such is the nature of the human mind, that knowledge ever accumulates, and the more it does so the deeper the atmosphere of scientific faith that grows around it. As to the perfect wisdom of the plan, we can judge only as far as we know; we may assume it by that sort of scientific faith which grows out of the little knowledge we have, without our being able to help it. Indeed, it would so puzzle us to conceive of a plan in which there should be pleasure without pain and virtue without vice, without the entire absence of personality, that the existence of suffering and moral evil in the actual one cannot be considered a defect. Thus honoring his own personality, as worth all it costs, Cleanthes honors the universal plan, inferring, according to the nature of a healthy mind, the order, beauty and wisdom of what he does not see from that which he does, and in the fulness of his joy in a noble manhood, as part of an infinite plan, he assumes an infinite personality behind it, adequate to the infinite effect. If the mind must needs attempt any conception or description of God, here seems to be a most worthy one, and as personal as the relation of finite to infinite will admit—as much in advance of that of David, as the preaching of Jesus in regard to enemies was in advance of the practice of Joshua, in a humanitarian view. Out of this mine of pagan worship a Watts or a Longfellow could bring up gems that would enrich any church in Christendom. The temptation to try a few bits of the ore in our English common metre is almost too strong to be resisted, even by

Yours truly,

ELIZUR WRIGHT.

MEDFORD, Mass., Jan. 16, 1872.

NAMES WANTED.

The following counter-petition is now open for signature at THE INDEX Office in Toledo. It will be forwarded to Congress as soon as the proper time shall arrive:—

COUNTER-PETITION.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress Assembled:

We, the undersigned, citizens of the United States, respectfully and earnestly ask your honorable bodies to preserve inviolate the great guarantees of religious liberty now contained in the Constitution of the United States, and to dismember all petitions asking you to adopt measures for amending said Constitution by incorporating in it a recognition of "God as the source of all authority and power in civil government," and of "the Lord Jesus Christ as the Ruler among the Nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority." We protest against such proposed amendments as an attempt to revolutionize the government of the United States, and to overthrow the great principles of complete religious liberty and the complete separation of Church and State on which it was established by its original founders.

Send your own name, and as many other names as possible, authorizing me to append them to the above counter-petition. Roll up the list to thousands and tens of thousands of names. Let such a protest be heard as shall put a speedy end to this fanatical attempt to subvert the fundamental principles of this free republic. Address

FRANCIS E. ABBOT,

Editor of THE INDEX,

Toledo, O.

A lady of Cambridge, Mass., who is in the habit of visiting the prisons, received a peculiarly touching evidence of esteem from the convicts in the Massachusetts State Prison, at Charlestown, on Monday last. It appears that nearly every Monday throughout their season she has brought flowers, etc., to cheer the gloom of the prison, and last year at Christmas she gave to each prisoner a pretty little bouquet. The Warden at that time suggested that the men should save these if possible until the following Christmas-day. On Monday, during some exercise in the prison, he asked how many had preserved the little remembrance, when it was found that one hundred and over had kept the faded and dried bunch of flowers during the twelve months of confinement.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I think the Bible is the citadel to be attacked, for as long as the people believe it to be authoritative, just so long will they be under its delusion. That shot should be fired until their tricks upon words are exposed. The belief in the authority of the Bible says that Theodore Parker stands in the way of progress. I like the candor with which you conduct THE INDEX. I don't like the word 'religion'; it smells of superstition."

"You may put me down as a subscriber for life, which privilege will be inherited by my children and grand-children. Send me the volume right away, please."

"I have carefully preserved the numbers for this year with a view to have them bound. I am more than pleased with it, and heartily wish it success."

"I have been a faithful reader of THE INDEX from its commencement, and expect to be while ability is mine to enjoy the intellectual."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the OCEAN, in the new EXPRESS BUILDING on St. Clair Street, opposite the WHEELER OPERA HOUSE, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending Jan. 27th.—B. Broels, 25 cts.; V. Keen, $1.25; Toledo Printing Co., $10; W. H. Bonchton, $3.50; Dr. Mergler, 15 cts.; J. Rideout, $2—donations, $4; A. J. Grover, $3; B. F. Horton, $10; H. M. Hastings, $1; Henry M. Oros, 25 cts.; Dr. H. K. Oliver, 25 cts.; Dr. J. T. Dickins, 50 cts.; S. Corner, $2; O. W. Carpenter, 10 cts.; Irene Orington, 10 cts.; Wm. Blane, $3; R. C. Spencer, $1; Gilbert Billings, $2; Wm. F. Chase, $4; G. Briggs, $5; Jno. T. Lowe, $5.22; Wm. Wright, 25 cts.; A. H. Ambish, $1; D. F. Sweetland, $10; H. G. O. Blake, $1; Clarence Nell, 10 cts.; M. Kohler, 10 cts.; Dana H. Mathes, 50 cts.; Mrs. G. E. Merrill, $1; Anstin Kneave, 50 cts.; S. F. Woodard, $5; George Kridler, 50 cts.; P. M. Tate, $3; M. Root, $5; D. Bruner, $2.50; S. B. Wilson, 75 cts.; W. E. Lukins, $1; T. McWhorter, $2; Jno. Casson, 50 cts.; P. W. Fuller, 50 cts.; Wm. Wiley, $3; A. M. Du Bois, $2; H. Brohl, $3; Marshall Lugenre, $2; P. B. Magnus, $2; Jno. Beattie, 10 cts.; N. P. Stockbridge, 50 cts.; Andrew J. Davis, $4.50; Wm. Hanford, $2; J. L. Mansfield, 50 cts.; A. J. Lindsey, $1; Mrs. Darling, $2; R. C. Spencer, $1; J. W. Graham, $2; T. B. Horn, $2; E. S. Ross, $2; J. R. Hawley, 10 cts.; R. W. Henshaw, $2; Eugene R. Knapp, $2; C. A. Lloyd, 10 cts.; Frank B. Rays, 50 cts.; J. M. Holmes, $2; N. S. Barker, $4; P. C. Turner, 20 cts.; Wm. Richmond, $1; Rev. D. H. Montgomery, 25 cts.; James Whittier, 50 cts.; P. H. Farnham, $4.50; H. S. Kanyan, $1; Milton Smith, $2; Thos. Kanner, $2; Spencer J. Cleveland, $2; Jno. Chapin Smith, $2; G. W. Robinson, $10; Christ Schneider, $1.50; Nicholas Beaver, $2.00; A. S. Latty, $1; Warner Becklin, $2.10; F. F. Dorr, $2; Toledo Printing Co., $10; P. B. Bateson, $10; H. L. Green, $2; Parker Pillsbury, $1; J. O. Martin, $3; F. E. Abbot, $2.50; H. L. Green, $1.50; Joseph Marsh, $4.50; M. B. Linton, 71 cts.; S. Silvers, $1.25; David Brainerd, $7; Wm. R. Emmons, $2; Jno. F. Fraser, $2; T. H. Wilson, 50 cts.; Mrs. E. W. Robinson, $2; T. P. Stevenson, $1; Abel Edick, $2; James Eddy, 25 cts.; Rev. C. Wendt, $2; Eli Wilkin, 60 cts.; Wm. Chase, $2; Samuel Leonard, $1; C. C. Slocum, $4.00; A. W. Gurnley, 50 cts.; H. M. Redington, $2; Mrs. J. G. Kinley, $2; Jonas Hilton, $2.25; C. A. Lloyd, 50 cts.; J. R. Burt, 10 cts.; Aberdeen Keith 50 cts.; W. H. Shepherd, $12; Samuel Wills, $1.25; H. G. Spencer, $1; Ben. P. Moore, 50 cts.; J. A. Simon, $4.50; Max Fracht, $2; S. H. Morse, $1.50; O. Silas, $2; W. L. Bailey, $2.50; C. Bonnell, $4; M. P. Barber, $2; W. B. Sherwin, 50 cts.; Milo A. Townsend, 50 cts.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipts unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

RECEIVED.

THEOLOGY THE LOOKING-GLASS, AND WHAT ALICE SAW THERE. By LEWIS CARROLL, author of "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland." With Fifty Illustrations by JOHN TENNIEL. New York and London: MACMILLAN & CO. 1872. pp. 224.

THE ALDINE. February, 1872. JAMES BUTTON & CO., 22 Liberty St., New York. $5.00 a year.

APPLETON'S JOURNAL. Monthly Part. Weekly Numbers for January, 1872.

THE ATLANTIC MONTHLY. JANUARY and FEBRUARY, 1872. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & CO. $4.00 a Year.

THE MANCHESTER FRIEND. December, 1871. No. 1. Published on the 15th of each Month. London: F. BOWMAN KIRTO, 6, Bishopsgate Street Without. Price 8d.

THE HERALD OF HEALTH AND JOURNAL OF PHYSICAL CULTURE. February, 1872. New York: WOOD & HOLBROOK, Publishers, 13 and 15 Laight St. $3.00 a Year.

THE NEW CHURCH INDEPENDENT AND MONTHLY REVIEW. January, 1872. WALKER & METCALF, Laporte, Ind. $3.00 a Year.

MAN. A POEM IN 13 CANTOS. By FRANK S. GANTER. Author's Edition. New Orleans. 1871. pp. 176.

SERMONS by J. L. DUDLEY, Plymouth Church, Milwaukee. Milwaukee: EVENING WISCONSIN BOOK AND JOB PRINTING HOUSE. 1871.

SERMONS IN THE CHURCH AND ON THE EXCHANGE. A Sermon preached in West Church, Boston, by C. A. BARTOL. Boston: A. WILLIAMS & CO., 136 Washington St. 1872.

CHRISTIANITY: ITS SUBSTANCE AND EVIDENCES. By W. T. CLARK. Printed for the Unity Chapel Congregation at the office of The Golden Age, No. 9 Spruce St., N. Y. 1872.

TESTIMONIALS TO THE MERITS OF THOMAS PAINE. Compiled by JOSEPH N. MORRIS. Burlington, N. J.: F. L. TAYLOR. 1861.

THE TRIBUNE ALMANAC AND POLITICAL REGISTER. 1872. THE TRIBUNE ASSOCIATION, New York.

THE ILLUSTRATED ANNUAL OF PNEUMATOLOGY AND PHYSIOLOGY. 1872. By S. R. WELLS, Editor of THE PNEUMATOLOGICAL JOURNAL. New York: SAMUEL R. WELLS, $2 BROADWAY.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

THE PAGAN HYMN OF CLEANTHES.

PARAPHRASED BY ELLUR WRIGHT.

Great God, the genial cause
That gives all Nature birth,
Tis meet we hymn thyself and laws,
Who, only, speak on earth.

The willing worlds are ruled by thee,
For in thy mighty hand
The fiery energy they see
That does what thou hast planned.

King thus by everlasting right,
Through earth and sea and sky
All works are tokens of thy might,
Though folly works awry.

For chaos, yielding to thy reign,
With beauty blooms to thee;
All hateful things resist in vain
Thy doom of harmony.

What woe befalls the bad who shun
The way thy wisdom leads—
To clutch thy blessings, headlong run
The round of folly's deeds!

Some strive to win, and starve, on fame;
Some smother 'neath their gains,
Some sink in sloth, or through the flame
Of pleasures speed to pains.

Great God of lightnings and of love,
Chase darknees from the soul,
Till men below, like those above,
Hymn thee from pole to pole.

FEBRUARY 8, 1872.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of Tawarikh, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 31, 1972. Future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the fully paid-up capital; and no provision will be made for the payment of interest on the debt, the effect of which is strictly complied with. The Directors are desirous that the stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

[illegible]

MORE PETITIONS.

The following lists of signatures to the Counter Petition have been received since our last issue.

Mr. W. B. Hearn sends ten names from Cadiz, Ohio; Dr. S. B. S. Wilson sends eighty from Olathe, Kansas; Mr. D. Sandman sends twenty-six from Barre Mills, Wisconsin; Mr. P. P. Field sends twenty-six from Florence Heights, New Jersey; Mr. H. L. Green sends forty-six from Syracuse, New York; Mr. L. Hearn sends twenty-four from Cincinnati, Ohio; Mr. N. A. C. Tabor sends thirty-four from Rockford, Michigan; Mr. Jerome Davis sends sixteen from Ithaca, New York; Mr. D. F. Sweetland sends seventeen from Hornellsville, New York; Dr. P. R. Johnson sends seventeen from Sag Harbor, New York; Mr. N. E. Boyd reports a petition signed by twenty-out of the thirty-one students in the Unitarian Divinity School, Cambridge, Mass.; Mr. C. H. Richardson sends five names from Auburn, New York; Mr. A. A. Knights sends thirty-nine from Boston; Mr. C. C. Slocum sends thirty-seven from Anderson, Indiana (obtained at a lecture by Mr. B. F. Underwood); Mr. T. C. Anthony sends fifty-seven from some place not mentioned; Mr. B. F. Stamm sends thirty-three from Detroit, Michigan; Mr. Jefferson Cary sends twelve from Houlton, Maine; Mr. Nathan Cobb sends fifty-two from Winneconne, Wisconsin.

Friends who are collecting signatures to the counter-petition will please send them in as soon as their lists are complete. But if they wish to get more names still, they can retain the lists until special notice is given in THE INDEX.

The effect of a single great remonstrance will self-evidently be so much greater than that of several small ones sent at different times, that we respectfully urge those journals which are nobly co-operating with THE INDEX in obtaining signatures to the counter-petition to notify their readers that all lists of names should be sent to Toledo, in order to be forwarded together to Congress. For once, at least, let all liberals unite on a common plan, and forget every consideration but the best means of making it effective. The weakness of every liberal movement hitherto has been the fatal scattering of its fire. The old-fashioned broadside of a hundred cannon has given place in naval warfare to the annihilating discharge of the one or two great guns of the iron-clad monitor. Let us learn by experience. Do not pepper this new and dangerous bigotry with buck-shot, but crush it by a thousand-pound shell!

THE DUTY OF THE HOUR.

The Chicago Tribune (surely not a journal with any special sympathy for the views of THE INDEX) says in its issue of January 12:—

A number of very worthy gentlemen, led, we believe, by Judge Strong, of the United States Supreme Court, are to meet in convention at Cincinnati in a few weeks, in order to take measures to ensure the adoption of an amendment to our National Constitution, which shall (we quote) "recognize God" and "vindicate our claim to be a Christian nation." When there is so much to be done in the world, so much to be done in our own country, it is a pity to see time, and talent, and money wasted in such an attempt as this. IF THE PROMOTERS OF THE SCHEME PUSH THE MATTER, THEY CAN VERY LIKELY GET THE AMENDMENT THROUGH BOTH CONGRESS AND THE STATE LEGISLATURES; FOR A SHREWD POLITICIAN WOULD SEE THE DAMAGE THAT MIGHT RESULT IF HE SHOULD BE MADE TO FIGURE IN THE COLUMNS OF THE OPPOSITION PRESS AS A "BLASPHEMOUS ATHEIST WHO REFUSED TO 'RECOGNIZE' HIS GOD." But, when this has been done, what good will it do? We shall scarcely be able in this way to buy the favor of Deity, and the presence of the clause in the Constitution will pretty certainly not turn any one from the error of his ways. Far better, instead of "vindicating our claim to be a Christian nation" by meaningless phrases, if these gentlemen would devote their time to making that claim a true one. Acts speak louder than words.

If a paper like the Tribune, shrewd, practical, given to hard common-sense views of all subjects, admits a probability of success in the Christian Amendment movement, and can coolly put on record this opinion in the words which we have capitalized above, it is very clear that the same opinion, when expressed in THE INDEX, is not the mere product of a frothy fanaticism on our part—still less of an eager desire to make a new "point" against Christianity. It is rather the result of faith in the power of ideas and watchful observation of the times. If the whole body of voters in this country should be obliged to-morrow to vote yea or nay on the adoption of this Christian Amendment, without discussion or reflection, we believe that the measure would be carried. The danger is in unreflective action; the safeguard is in immediate protest.

Apparently without perceiving the frightful evils that would follow the success of this retrograde "reform," the Chicago Tribune has yet penetration enough to perceive the actual strength of Orthodox sentiment in the public mind, and mildly to dissuade from the attempt. But the attempt is now making, and there is no prospect of its being abandoned. If not opposed, there is every likelihood that it will succeed in creating sufficient public interest in the project to secure its end. Once let the forty thousand clergymen of the country become practically a unit in its support (a result which is exceedingly probable), and who can be so blind as to see no danger? Their combined influence would be enormous. The religious beliefs on which the movement rests receive the more or less earnest support of the great majority of our population. What is to check the development of a strong public opinion in favor of it, except the plain exposure of the evils that must ensue? And what is to call public attention to such an exposure but a protest so loud that its voice must be heard?

Friends, the need of a vigorous remonstrance against this movement seems to us so imperative, that we have scarcely patience to urge the reasons for it. Even the liberal Chicago Tribune appears Insensible to the hurricane hidden in that "little cloud no bigger than a man's hand." What, then, can be expected from the average citizen? The Tribune sees only "unmeaning phrases" in the Evangelical creed which will prevent every honest liberal from taking the oath of allegiance to the Constitution of his own country, and therefore make Evangelical Protestants alone eligible to office. Is the attempt to nationalize such a creed a mere toying with "unmeaning phrases?" Yet, without a protest, this attempt will pass on to a sure success. The protest must be made. Will not you help to make it! If you will, then circulate the counter-petition!

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

THROUGH THE LOOKING-GLASS, AND WHAT ALICE FOUND THERE, (Macmillan & Co., 38 Bleecker St., New York), by Lewis Carroll, author of "Alice's Adventures in Wonderland," is one of the drollest and most charming of recent books for children. The illustrations by John Tenniel are capital, and excellently reflect the odd imaginations of the young dreamer. The little folks will go into raptures over the book, and "children of a larger growth" may be touched by the plaintive little poem at its end.—Price $2.00; for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo

THE WONDERS OF WATER (Charles Scribner & Co., New York) is a translation from the French of Gaston Tissandier by Prof. Scheele De Vere, who has made numerous additions to the text. It is the fourth volume in the second series of the "Illustrated Library of Wonders," and brims over with useful information about the ocean, the general system of water-circulation, the action of water on continents, the physical and chemical properties of water, and the various uses of it. Scattered through the volume are diagrams and other illustrations (sixty-four in all) a few of which possess merit as vivid representations of striking scenes in Nature. No book could be placed in the hands of boys and girls which would do more to create a taste for physical science, or to pique their curiosity concerning the wonders that lie hidden in the commonest things. The directions for permanently retaining on glass the beautiful arborescent designs formed on our window-panes by the crystallizations of hoar-frost (p. 101) might at this season of the year lead many of them to experiment for themselves, and thus stimulate a desire for natural knowledge which will not be satiated by mere passive reception of it. It should not be inferred, however, that this book is of interest to the young alone, since the facts it contains will be instructive to all persons who have not made the subject a specialty. We notice (pp. 125-130) that the importance of forests as regulators of the distribution of water is especially insisted on; and the terrible drought of last autumn, followed by the still more terrible conflagrations in Michigan and Wisconsin, may be cited as possibly confirmatory evidence of the theories here presented. There has been unquestionably a great and wanton waste of woodland in all parts of the country; and this fact may have had a real connection with the wide-spread drought of 1871. The "Annual Report of the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution" for the year 1869, for a copy of which we are indebted to the kindness of Prof. Henry, contains a translation of a very valuable paper by M. Becquerel, member of the French Institute, on "Forests and their Climatic Influence," from which we make the following extract:—

"We arrive at the following conclusions: 1. Extensive clearings diminish the quantity of spring or flowing water in a country; 2. It cannot yet be determined whether that diminution should be attributed to the less considerable quantity of rain which falls, or to a greater evaporation of the pluvial supply, or to both causes united, or to some new distribution of the water derived from rains; 3. The cultivation practised in an arid and denuded country dissipates a part of the flowing waters; 4. In countries which have undergone no changes in cultivation, the quantity of water in streams or from sources appears to be always the same; 5. Forests, while preserving such waters, economize and regulate their discharge; 6. The humidity which prevails in woods and the function of the roots in making the soil more perrious should be taken into consideration; 7. The clearing away of forests in mountainous countries exercises an influence on the streams and springs in the lowlands, especially on the latter; 8. Hence the action of forests upon climate is of a highly complex nature."

The book is handsomely printed and bound. Price $1.50; for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

See advertisement of a new INDEX TRACT on the last page.

EXTRA-CHRISTIAN OR ANTI-CHRISTIAN?

I have always thought that every man who comes to believe in religion as a natural outgrowth of the soul of man, and in Jesus as only its most conspicuous teacher, is bound to take what may be called an extra-Christian attitude, or an attitude outside the Christian Church and name. For if he calls himself a Christian, it can only be in some historical sense, or in the sense of some general moral attitude which has come to bear that name—just as he might also call himself a Stoic. But if Stoicism still existed as an organized sect anywhere, it might involve one in the need of constant petty explanations if one assumed that name at all; and so it is now with the term "Christian." It is used in so many senses that it is like a measure with a false bottom; and before dealing with each man, you have to ascertain whether his particular peck-measure holds a quart or a bushel. It saves a great deal of trouble to adopt a simpler metric system; and only to ask whether a given proposition is true, and a given action right, without perplexing the question by asking if it is also "Christian."

Is it now necessary to go farther than this, and call ourselves anti-Christian? Speaking for myself alone, I should say not. That seems a practical question, to be determined by the actual condition of things. There, for instance, is the Roman Catholic Church, certainly the most aggressive and obnoxious form of Christianity. If that church were where it was when Philip II. signed the death-warrant of the whole population of the Netherlands at a stroke of the pen, it would be worth while to die fighting actively against it; but believing as I do that it is dying of slow decline, and that it still does, among the poor and ignorant, a great deal of good to match its evil, I do not feel moved to put lance at rest on that issue. If this be true of that great institution, it must be still more true of that weaker dilution of ecclesiasticism, the Protestant Church. Logically, that institution is as much bound to persecute as was its predecessor; but people generally are not governed by logic, but by the spirit of the age. If the church is practically what it once was, let all lovers of freedom unite and wage war against it; but if the resemblance is merely constructive and logical, there is less blood to be shed. There are so many more important things to be done, I do not see the need of putting on armor against a mere logical implication.

When you look at the lions and tigers in the transparency outside the menagerie, it seems as if one should pay one's last half-dollar to see Van Amburgh enter the cage. But when, on approaching, you find that the lion-tamer's chief difficulty is to induce his sleepy and toothless lions to get up and be tamed, you feel glad that you can at least go out of the uninteresting show, without extra charge. My chief difficulty is to find among my Evangelical or high-church acquaintances a single one who seems seriously anxious about the welfare of my soul; and as for persecution, where is it? The birth-day most conspicuously kept in America, except perhaps Washington's, is that of Thomas Paine; and there is scarcely any religious newspaper in America, I believe, so old as the Boston Investigator. This certainly does not indicate any active spirit of aggression in the Christian Church, or any formidable tyranny to fight against. It is not a particularly cutting age. I believe that our present organizations are destined gradually to perish, but that they are of that class which perish, as Lecky well says, "by difference, not by controversy,"—not destroyed, but found obsolete and left to fade into a shadow.

I see but one thing likely to break this quiet and give us a living antagonist, and that is the proposed "Religious Amendment" to the Constitution. But it is impossible to believe that any considerable portion of what is called "the church" will be mad enough to attempt thus to play into the hands of their enemies. In the foolish frankness with which those who urge this amendment state their aims, I see no trace of Jesuitical skill, and hence a thing very formidable. In the open statement of their aim, that one of their objects is to give the nation power to "educate religiously," they frankly announce a measure that would hand over every child in the nation, bound hand and foot, to be reared a Roman Catholic, a Baptist, or a Presbyterian, as the majority might prevail. There is no spiritual tyranny remaining on the continent of Europe so formidable as might be consistently established in America, were this principle once asserted in our Constitution. Once establish this, and a movement would be set on foot which would sweep away these little men of Cincinnati—these McIlvaines and Mayos,—as chaff before the wind; and either Pope Pius would come in triumph to America to take his own, or else, which is more likely, the contest would result in an immense emancipation. In that view, I wish it would come, but can hardly expect it. Already the few public men who have been drawn into the movement—such as Governor Jewell of Connecticut—are withdrawing from it. He is wise. We have just seen Mr. Harlan, of Iowa, dropped from the U. S. Senate, after appealing to all his Methodist brethren for his support. If "the church" is foolish enough to press this measure, it will turn against it the whole vast body who are now simply indifferent to its claims. American politicians may be bad, but they will prove in this case to be better as well as stronger than the clergy.

T. W. H.

MRS. WOODHULL'S IDEAS.

"I have an inalienable, constitutional and natural right to love whom I may, to love as long or as short a period as I can, to change that love every day if I please; and with that right neither you nor any law you can frame have any right to interfere. And I have the further right to demand a free and unrestricted exercise of that right, and it is your duty not only to accord it, but, as a community, to see that I am protected in it. I trust that I am fully understood, for I mean just that, and nothing less! . . . If our sisters who inhabit Greene street and other filthy localities choose to remain in debauch, and if our brothers choose to visit them there, they are only exercising the same right that we exercise in remaining away, and we have no more right to abuse and condemn them for exercising their rights that way, than they have to abuse and condemn us for exercising our rights our way. . . . Nay, my friends, we have only an assumed right thus to sit in judgment over our unfortunate sisters, which is the same right of which men have made use to prevent women from participation in government."—Extracts from "A Speech on the Principles of Social Freedom," by Victoria C. Woodhull. (Authorized Edition.)

If one of "our sisters who inhabit Greene street and other filthy localities" should publicly demand the rights and protection so vigorously claimed by Mrs. Woodhull, we should, unless her case was considered too hopeless, refer her to the Rosine or some kindred association for the reclamation of fallen women.

Fortunately, however, Mrs. Woodhull, having defined her idea of "rights," proceeds with equal perspicuity and earnestness to condemn the very debauch she would protect, by reminding us that "we have a duty, and that is by our love, kindness and sympathy to endeavor to prevail upon them [the victims of debauch] to desert those ways which we feel so damaging to all that is high and pure and true in the relation of the sexes." After such an unequivocal declaration of duty in the right direction—and the one cited is but one of many made by her,—we prefer to believe that her theories are the result of mental rather than moral deficiency. Most certainly, if her personal character is to be criticised, we must do it, as she demands, not "from a commonplace point of view."

Though Mr. Theodore Tilton, apparently with her consent, has done what he can to invite personal criticism, I confess to a lack of interest beyond that which it is natural to feel in all human phenomena. I am quite willing to regard her as she suggests, as an honest but "deceived enthusiast." In her as a public teacher, however, and especially in view of her present (but let us hope temporary) prominence and influence, every member of society has an interest; for her public utterances are more potent to lead young men into a life of debauch than the vilest ballet performance. "Question me," she says, "of the grounds of my faith." What are they?

Her theory of society is based upon her faith in "Individual Liberty;" and she thinks her claims are fully established by a correct development of that principle. Let us see. Having secured protection for promiscuity and prostitution, suppose some sister more wretched than her companions chooses to parade the streets with a hat on her head and shoes on her feet, but otherwise as naked as when she was born. Who shall prevent? She has learned her lesson, and will she not say—"I have an inalienable, constitutional and natural right to dress or undress as I may, to remain with or without a dress as long or as short a period as I can, to change my dress every day, and to walk the streets without a dress if I please. My right to remain naked is as complete as my right to remain in debauch! My person is for sale; I will advertise my wares if I choose; you may avert your eyes if you wish; but you shall not interfere. I demand a free and unrestricted exercise of my right, and it is your duty not only to accord it, but as a community to see that I am protected in it."

Such declamation would be no more wild and no less offensive than the speech from which I have so freely quoted. It would serve to illustrate the complete Woodhull development and application of the principle of individual liberty. The disgusting brutality of Mrs. Woodhull's demands ought to be a sufficient refutation of them in the minds of decent men and women. But let us look at her ground of faith again.

Her error consists in the inability to recognize the close and intimate relation every member of the community bears to society. Admitting that her individual rights cease the moment they begin to conflict with mine, and that mine are limited by those of others, she fails to perceive that no one or two or more persons can be guilty of flagrant immorality and indecency without invading the rights of society.

Curiously enough, in discussing the crime of murder, she betrays less obliquity of vision; it is when she approaches the question of sexual relations that she becomes muddled. Here is her statement as regards murder;—

"Every person has the right to, and can, determine for himself what he will do, even to taking the life of another. But it is equally true that the attacked person has the right to defend his life against such assault. If the person succeed in taking the life, he thereby demonstrates that he is a tyrant who is at all times liable to invade the right to life, and that every individual of the community is put in jeopardy by the freedom of this person. Hence it is the duty of the government so to restrict the freedom of this person as to make it impossible for him ever again to practise such tyranny."

Even this passage betrays confusion of mind; but overlooking its defects, let us apply the rule here given in our treatment of the "social evil." Before doing this, however, it may be necessary to show that the "social evil" is, like murder, a crime against society. Let Mrs. Woodhull decide this difficult question for us. "Promiscuity in sexuality is simply the anarchical stage of development wherein the passions rule supreme;" it is "damaging to all that is high and pure and true in the relation of the sexes." By her own confession, then, the very social condition she would protect by law is "anarchical," demoralizing and destructive. So much admitted, she is compelled by her own theory of government to call for its suppression; for even Mrs. Woodhull will not contend that perfect individual liberty and anarchy are possible in the same community. The rights of every individual of the community are put in jeopardy by the existence of what have hitherto been called "houses of ill-fame." Mrs. Woodhull would restrain and suppress the murderer of the body by the enforcement of law; but the destroyer of body and soul she would encourage by legal protection.

Should we pursue our examination of her grounds of faith further, it would be easy to demonstrate an equal inconsistency and obliquity in her treatment of other phases of the social question. I have chosen from her many errors the one in which she appears to find especial satisfaction, and about which, if the constant use of italics is evidence, she is very much in earnest and very positive.

In this age of platform, newspaper and pamphlet, it would be surprising if some trash was not spoken and printed; nevertheless it is amazing that one whose life is pure and who on occasion can utter sentiments creditable to the warmest heart and clearest intellect, can stand up in the presence of thousands of her fellows and without shame or reserve defend the right of any one to live a life of debauch and prostitution.

Let her take a more deliberate and thoughtful survey of her subject, and she may yet discover that an individual right, independent of social relations, is not possible in any community of people; and still further that social cesspools and social freedom are incompatible. Individual liberty is impossible unless there is an individual integrity behind it. Rights imply duties; the rights of society are as inalienable as the rights of the individual, and its duties are equally imperative.

In conclusion, let me repeat that with Mrs. Woodhull's personal character I have nothing to do. So far as I am able, I will separate the sinner from the sin, and think kindly of her; but as a professed reformer, a professed expounder of liberty, she is a proper subject for severe reprobation and censure by all lovers of true liberty and good morals.

R. P. H.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

"WHAT THINK YE OF CHRIST?"

SERMON BY THE REV. C. VOYSEY, AT ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LONDON, NOV. 5, 1871.

[No. 2.]

"What think ye of Christ?" MATTHEW xiii: 43.

Last Sunday our attention was directed to the preliminary inquiry as to the trustworthiness of the New Testament and Tradition, from which alone we derive our knowledge of Christ. Finding these sources to be, both of them, hopelessly mixed up with falsehood and superstition, we are driven to conjecture how much genuine history they contain, and tax our own imagination in determining between what is false and true in the documents before us.

My efforts this morning will be directed towards the discovery of some principle which ought to guide us in our attempt to answer the question, "What think ye of Christ?" Have we any broad facts that no reasonable person would dispute, on which to build up a consistent outline of the history and character before us? If it should appear illogical to accept one part and to reject another part of these Gospel narratives, we can only meet the objector by saying that we must treat the New Testament exactly as we would treat any other ancient book which professed to give us history, and yet contained much that was fictitious. No one calls in question the fairness or the logic of this arbitrary selection, when applied to other books; indeed it is the prevailing custom among scholars in our day to exercise this sifting faculty upon many works which had heretofore remained unquestioned. In the first place we should put clearly before our minds the broad facts which no reasonable person would question, and then measure the probability or the improbability of any statement about Jesus by its consistency with those fundamental facts.

These facts are few in number, and, if we accept anything at all from the Christian records, we cannot well accept less, namely, that a man named Jesus, also called Christ, was born in Judæa at the beginning of our era; that he was remarkably kind and good, of simple habits and unsullied purity; that he became a teacher of religion, and opposed the chief priests, scribes and Pharisees of his time; that either he or his followers made a claim that he was the Messiah, and to that extent he would become obnoxious to the Roman empire; that his religious adversaries, the chief priests, had no power to put him to death legally for his revolutionary religious ideas, and so they compassed his condemnation and death by an accusation before the Roman Governor that he claimed to be King of the Jews. For had not Jesus opposed the priests, they would not have taken any notice of his claim to be the Messiah. And had not some such claim been made by him or for him, the Roman Governor would never have taken any notice of his attack upon the Jewish customs.

Now what manner of man was this? His fate, his misfortunes, are his credentials. To have become the object of priestly persecution and to have held out until death,—not to have weakly recanted, nor to have fled from the consequences of his temerity,—are sure and unmistakable signs of his greatness of soul. If we knew nothing more of him than this, this by itself would entitle Jesus to our highest esteem. It is moreover the key to his whole character, and furnishes us with the surest possible test by which to measure the truth or falsehood of what has been said or written about him. He was therefore at all events earnestly religious, a hater of priestly tyranny, a bold reformer, and unflinching martyr. But we have one more unquestioned fact before us, namely, the fact of his influence. He did certainly succeed in bringing over to his own views many of his countrymen, or else he would not have excited opposition. His success was the head and front of his offending. And this gives us some guarantee that he understood human nature; that not only his plainness of speech, but also his clearness of thought, qualified him to become a popular teacher. The poor in his day had the gospel preached to them, and the common people heard him gladly. He must have been gifted largely with what we call "common sense," and have exercised it freely in dealing with the religious rites and doctrines of his time, or else he could not have been listened to. This will be another test of the truth or falsehood of passages in which very unwise sayings are attributed to him.

Nor was his influence limited to his life on earth. Although only about thirty years of age when he was crucified, he had said and done enough to make his memory immortal, to establish one of the most important of the religions of the world. No one who had not really led a good life could have been the founder of Christianity; no one who had not been eminently pure and honorable and kind could have ever reached the pinnacle of worship on which the hearts and minds of nearly all Christendom have placed him. This too is a test by which we may very nearly get at the truth or detect the falsehood in the narratives of his life. But inasmuch as perfect and minute consistency is not to be found in any human being uninterruptedly from the cradle to the grave, we must on the other hand beware of drawing too much an ideal Christ instead of seeking to know what he actually was. It will not altogether do to reject every blemish which the records have left upon his character, his teaching, his example. These blemishes tend rather to confirm their testimony than to weaken it, whenever they do not exceed a certain degree of inconsistency.

When we say, then, that we ought to use the broad, unquestioned facts as tests of the truth or falsehood of the narratives, and of the doctrines built upon them, we do not mean to draw a hard-and-fast line not to be over-stepped, but only to bear in mind that these facts are the only ground we have to go upon, the only basis on which to form our estimate of Jesus at all, and therefore they must, in every step of our inquiry, be scrupulously regarded.

In testing by these facts the primary doctrine of Orthodox Christendom that Jesus was the Almighty God incarnate in human form, the first thing that strikes us is that, exactly in so far as Jesus appeared, lived and died as a man, suffering himself to undergo all the ordinary and extraordinary vicissitudes of human life, just so far—if he was God—was God imposing upon and deceiving his own creatures.

It sounds even blasphemous to say this; but it is not I who say it, but the Orthodox who compel us to come to no other conclusion. They say that, if he was not God, he was an impostor; we say that, if there was imposture at all, which we deny, it would have been practised upon men by his being God and yet seeming to be only man. It is an established fact that every one around him in Galilee and Judæa took him for a man,—a man, it may be, endowed with miraculous powers, but powers shared in by others of his contemporaries. These miraculous powers, in which of course we utterly disbelieve, are at all events ascribed in like manner to other men, and therefore did not avail to disclose to his contemporaries the Godhead of Jesus. If he was good beyond all human goodness, still the men of his time knew it only for human goodness, and were not in the least degree enlightened by it as to the divine or God-nature of Christ. Not one man, woman, or child in all that land ever dreamed that he was God; not his own father and mother, nor his brethren and sisters, nor his nearest and dearest disciples believed such a thing for a moment; or they could not have forsaken him and fled at the very first breath of real danger of being identified with him. They would have rushed to him for shelter instead. The chief priests and scribes, the Roman centurions, Pilate and Herod, and every person named in the narratives, took him for a man, and nothing more. Then, I say, these broad facts of his history drive us into one of these two positions—either that he was really and only what every one thought he was, a man and only a man, or, if he was also the Almighty God, God was purposely imposing upon his own creatures, hiding the real truth from them, and suffering them to offer outrage and insult to their own creator in disguise. The record never tells us that Jesus said he was God; they do tell us that Jesus prayed to God like other men, and called him "My God and my Father," and besought him to rescue him from his persecutors, nobly yielding at the last in those eternal words of courage and devotion,—"Nevertheless, not my will, but thine, be done." On the cross he breathes forth the divinest words which ever fell from mortal lips:—"Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." But if Jesus were all this time Almighty God, and yet, knowing that he was God, pretended to be only man, it was an imposture as unpardonable as it was gigantic. No falsehood of man ever reached the depth of such dissimulation as this. Again, I say, it is you Christians who by implication call one of the world's noblest men an impostor. It is not I. My deep reverence for Jesus, inspired as it is by his being transparent in thought, and word, and deed, and truthful unto death, rouses my indignation at your unconscious blasphemy, when you would fain tell us that Jesus was only acting a part; that, amidst all his agony of human fear and the bitter pains of physical and mental crucifixion, he was exulting secretly in the knowledge that he could not really die, and that in a day or two his wounds would be healed, and his human body restored to him as before. Out upon such an insult to God, such a mockery of man! I think that imposture is nearly played out. At all events the broad facts already spoken of stand in everlasting contradiction to the Church's belief in the Godhead of Christ. Such monstrosities as these would never have appeared among human beliefs at all, had it not been for the fundamental assumption that God is not a moral being, that he is under no obligation to his own eternal laws of Right; under no obligation to his creatures; that he may do without shame or word of reproach from us whom he has made, that which his own voice within us bids us abhor. To this it is owing that many sayings in the history of Jesus, which Christians would shrink from saying themselves, they readily excuse on the ground that he was a God, and might do as he pleased; that it was not wrong in him, for instance, to treat his mother with a studied indifference, nor to use harsh invective against his clerical opponents, because he was super-human.

The next claim made for Jesus which we must test by the unquestioned facts is the claim of Messiahship. It is a fact beyond all dispute that the Messiah or Christ, for whom the Jewish nation had been so long waiting, was in almost every particular the exact opposite of what Jesus of Nazareth really was. Without examining the so-called Messianic prophecies, for which we have no time, we are justified in inferring from their general tone that the Messiah was expected to be the temporal sovereign and deliverer of the Jewish people, was to rescue them from Roman vassalage, to conquer for them all their enemies and to place them as a nation at the head of the world. To give but one or two specimens of Messianic prophecy, there is the 110th Psalm, said to be quoted by Jesus in his own favor:—"The Lord said unto my Lord, Sit thou on my right hand till I make thy foes thy foot-stool." In the 5th and 6th verses of that Psalm, we read concerning the Messiah—"The Lord at thy right hand shall wound even kings in the day of his wrath. He shall judge among the heathen, he shall fill the places with the dead bodies; he shall wound the heads over many countries." Such a picture of a blood-stained warrior can hardly belong to the meek and lowly Jesus of Nazareth. Again, take a favorite chapter selected by the Church for reading in Passion-week, the 63d of Isaiah:—"Who is this that cometh from Edom, with dyed garments from Bozrah, this that is glorious in his apparel, travelling in the greatness of his strength? I that speak in righteousness, mighty to save. Wherefore art thou red in thy apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-press? I have trodden the wine-press alone, and of the people there was none with me"—(a triumphant text for the believers in the Atonement if it only stopped there, but read on),—"for I will tread them in mine anger, and trample them in my fury, and their blood shall be sprinkled upon my garments, and I will stain all my raiment."

Such passages, and there are more of them, show the impossibility of believing that Jesus was the Messiah expected by the Jews. He was indeed not the Christ in the legitimate sense of the word, as understood by the people of his own times. If, driven from that position, the Orthodox urge that he was the Christ in the sense of being the anointed, or appointed, messenger of God, then we can only say that he was one out of many Christs, that every man has his definite mission in the world to which he has been called by the regular and constant Providence of God, and each in turn is in this sense a Christ. But this is only playing with words, and we may be very sure that, in the time of Jesus, only one broad signification—namely, that of a temporal ruler and deliverer—was attached to the name of Messiah or Christ. Now what light is thrown upon this claim by the facts?

Nothing can be clearer. The Jews saw that Jesus was not the Messiah they were looking for, or they would thankfully have welcomed and obeyed him. The Romans proved that he was not that Messiah by putting him to death at the request of the Jews. It is even reported of Jesus that he said—"My kingdom is not of this world," whereas the kingdom of the true Messiah was of this world alone. Even his disciples after his death admitted that they had been deceived in their expectations, saying, "We trusted that it had been he which should have redeemed Israel, but now this is the third day since he was crucified."

An important question here arises, how far Jesus himself originated or sanctioned the application to himself of this title, Christ. The records on this point are hopelessly at variance, but in the first three gospels he is reported as only acknowledging the title at the very close of his ministry, and that only in secret to his disciples. In the fourth gospel he is represented as being recognized as the Messiah from the very beginning by John the Baptist and by the people of Samaria, and as arguing in proof of it publicly before the people from first to last.

If one so simple-minded, modest and spiritual as he was ever yielded to the temptation of assuming such a lofty and imperious title, it could only have been in consequence of the perpetual disparagement, obloquy and contempt which he received at the hands of the hierarchy in Judæa. It is of the very essence of abuse which comes from people who do not command our respect, to make us proud and conceited, to generate all sorts of vain fancies about our worth, our position, and our mission; whereas our real successes ever tend to make us more and more lowly, more diffident, more intense in our efforts to do good. The sneers of the Pharisees and chief priests may have thus swelled the bosom of Jesus with personal and ambitious thoughts, while the gratitude of those to whom he had been good and kind would overwhelm him with humility, and lead him to say to each one in turn, "Go thy way, and see thou tell no man." We shall find it so ourselves. Unjust depreciation kindles conceit, while every acknowledgment of service actually rendered only makes us humble and lowly, and long to do more.

Only on such ground as this, can we conceive it possible that Jesus allowed himself to be called Messiah or Christ, if he ever did so at all; and even then he would only do so in a sense new and altogether unintelligible alike to a Caiaphas and a Pontius Pilate. It is, however, open to a considerable doubt whether the story of his claim to the Messiahship was not originated mythically out of the false charge preferred against him by the Sanhedrim of aiming at a civil revolution. The name of Christ was not attached to the inscription on the cross, said to be written by Pilate, although he did not scruple to describe him as the king of the Jews.

Collateral history tells us that there were others besides Jesus who assumed the title and aimed at the dignity and powers of Messiahship; but all of these were political agitators. And this brings us to reflect that there is not a single one out of all the high claims set forth by the devotees of Jesus, that has not its parallel elsewhere.

Is it claimed that he was Almighty God incarnate? The second person of the Hindu triad, Vishnu, had been incarnate nine times over before Jesus was born. In like manner the Buddhists deified the founder of their faith, and believe him to be perpetually incarnate in the Grand Lama of Tibet.

Is it claimed that Jesus was miraculously born without a human father? Not to refer to Pagan mythology, the New Testament itself tells us of a Melchisedec who was born without either father or moth-ar, without descent, having neither beginning of days nor end of life.

Is it claimed that Jesus wrought miracles? The New Testament itself describes Jesus as acknowledging that the sons of the Pharisees had similar power, and no recorded miracle of Jesus could surpass the exuberant marvels of the exploits of Moses in the wilderness or those of Elisha, whose dead bones, it is said, restored a dead man to life.

Is it claimed that Jesus was absolutely without sin? The same has been said of Sakya muni, and by Jesus himself of Nathaniel,—"Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile." Of David, even, it is written that he was a man after God's own heart; of Job it is said that "he was perfect and upright, one that feared God and eschewed evil." And these very words are ascribed to Jehovah:—"Hast thou considered my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a perfect and an upright man?" And in the midst of agonies far surpassing those of Jesus' last hours, it is also said of Job:—"In all this Job sinned not, nor charged God with folly."

Is it claimed that Jesus rose again from the dead the third day? What is that beside the marvel of Elijah, who went up alive into the sky in a chariot with horses of fire?

Is it claimed that he alone taught man his duty to man and to God? He does but quote the noblest sayings from the ancient Jewish scriptures, and we now know that the same eternal lessons were known to so-called heathen sages long before the birth of Christ.

It is true, my friends, that on every hand we find parallels for all that we were once accustomed to believe to be peculiar to Jesus of Nazareth, and from this fact we can only draw the conclusion that, if he were proved to be God by these tokens, others besides him must take their places on the throne of Deity, and our religion once more must degenerate into Polytheism. But if all these pretensions are alike untrue, then Jesus must take rank among the noblest and best of men, if you will; but man he is, and only man, helping us a thousand times more, both by his precepts and his example, than if he had been God. For otherwise, were he more than man, we could never hope to imitate his greatness; and to call his goodness in that case "virtue" would be only to desecrate the most precious word which we can take upon our lips.

We invite attention to the subjoined article from the Christian Statesman, published fortnightly at Philadelphia in the interest of the Christian Amendment movement. Note well the confident tone that pervades it, and the plausible professions of submission to the government under all contingencies. Would it carry out these professions, if the Chinese should become the majority in America and make this a Buddhist government? We doubt it. But there is an abuse of government to which freemen, at least, will never submit. We owe allegiance to this government so long as it is a free government—not a day longer. The "National Association" seeks to destroy its freedom. The success of this movement would be the concentration of all political power in the hands of an intolerant church party. Such success is an impossibility. But the impossibility lies in the certainty that the freemen of America would rise in arms as one man, before they would suffer ecclesiastical ambition to plant its foot upon their necks. We deprecate strife, but we believe in self-defence; and we have no self more dear to defend than the liberty of Man.

[The following morceaux, sent by a friend, are quite too good for us to steal the credit of them.—ED.]

The Boston Investigator in a recent issue speaks editorially of "the great cause of civil and religious liberty." We fear it has thereby fatally exposed itself to a sharp attack from the Christian Register for inconsistency. For according to the hair-splitting logic of the Register, must not the Investigator editor now be called a "Religionist?"

Rev. James Freeman Clark, in his recent sermon in Boston on Mr. Hepworth's secession from Unitarianism, says that he "dislikes radicalism and thinks that it is following a false path, which will end in a squirrel-track and run up a tree;" yet adds that he "likes radicals and thinks that they are doing a good work,"—probably because he likes the nuts which they bring down from the trees. It certainly is more comfortable to eat the nuts after they have been brought out by others into the broad highway than to run the risks of exploring thickets and climbing trees to gather them. Yet after all there is not a little pleasure in the heroic adventures of the pioneer; and it is something to have the nuts at first hand. Moreover, as a friend very justly adds, there is very high Orthodox authority for spiritual tree-climbing, namely,—

"Zaccheus he Did climb the tree
His Lord to see;"—
And why shouldn't we?

A CLEAR-SIGHTED ANTAGONIST.

[From the Philadelphia Christian Statesman of Jan. 15—the organ of the "National Association" which seeks to secure the Christian Amendment of the U. S. Constitution.]

THE INDEX, edited by Francis E. Abbot and published at Toledo, Ohio, is the organ of the extreme radical or destructive school of unbelievers, who refuse, what Mr. Tilton and other infidels claim, the name "Christian," and seek not to reform Christianity, but to substitute "Free Religion" in its stead. Its position may be understood from its leading editorial in the number for the 6th inst., entitled "The Impeachment of Christianity." The indictment is lodged "in the name of human intelligence," because the Christian religion is "the great organized superstition of the western world, the great enemy of science and the greatest stumbling block in the pathway of civilization, inasmuch as it withdraws attention from the natural affairs of this life, concentrates all earnest thought on a future life, makes a merit of neglect of this world's riches in order to 'lay up treasures in heaven,' and frowns on active enterprise as a dangerous devotion to 'carial things.'" The indictment is urged further "in the name of human virtue," because Christianity teaches "that the virtue of the Savior can be a substitute for the virtue of the saved, that merit and demerit do not belong to the individual, but can be transferred like a garment from back to back;" "in the name of the human heart, because it requires that all natural affections shall be subordinated to an unnatural love of Christ;" "in the name of human freedom, because it sets up a despotic authority, which, whether as Church, as Bible, or as Christ, makes man a slave in his very soul; because it has always allied itself with despotism in civil government; because, as Catholicism, it has been an unmitigated spiritual and temporal tyranny, from which many centuries of constant struggle have to day only partially emancipated the world, and because, as Protestantism, it has been an unmitigated spiritual tyranny, and is even now plotting in this free republic to re-establish itself as a temporal tyranny also."

The adversary who thus frankly lifts his visor couches his lance against the proposed Religious Amendment. In the same issue is published a long discourse read by Mr. Abbot to a congregation of free-thinkers on Sabbath, December 24th. The speaker read the call and signatures in full, and said:—

This whole document is prepared with consummate ability, and shows a thorough knowledge of the state of the average Protestant mind. Compared as the Protestant public may be to-day to carry out the plans of this Convention, there is little or nothing in the Call itself that any thoroughly orthodox believer would venture to dissent from. It does but state the commonplaces of his creed, as applied to government. It does but lay down consecutively and clearly the propositions to which he listens with acquiescence every Sunday. The single principle of the Call does not lie in the enumeration of any novel principles or ideas, but solely in the avowal of a purpose to carry old, universally accepted doctrines into practice. The first three paragraphs of the Call would be immediately assented to by nine orthodox believers in every ten, even here in America; the dissent would begin to be heard at the fourth and last paragraph. They are not prepared as yet for such a step as this. Hence I say that the Convention has been drawn up with consummate ability—with admirable tact, sagacity and tact. It first rehearses with soberness the A B C of the Protestant Christian Gospel, receiving the listener's spontaneous assent; it then simply summons him to act out his admitted convictions, and square his conduct with his professions. This is the gist of the Call. It states conceded principles, and simply demands the consistent performance of it. It recites the Christian catechism concerning government, and simply enjoin obedience to it. That is all. But there is terrible power latent in its simple logic, as events will show.

Now I believe that this Call fully expresses the character of the movement from which it has proceeded. I believe that this movement is the most honest, the most earnest, the most logical, and therefore the most formidable, of all movements now carrying on within the limits of the Christian Church of this country. It is exceedingly impolitic, in one sense of the word, for it must, in proportion to its success, excite intense opposition by its very openness; but impolitics is never a merit of hypocrisy. It is also exceedingly fanatical; but fanaticism merely means intense devotion to ideas which you and I do not believe in. Every man of intense convictions is a fanatic to all who disagree with him. The men who are at the bottom of this movement must be grimly and dangerously in earnest, devotees of their ideas. . . . I doubt not there are many cooler-headed Christians who would hold these fanatics back, and advise a more moderate course; but, widely as I differ from them, and sternly as I would oppose them, yet I respect the earnestness which dispels caution, and the singleness of purpose which defies a double-faced expediency. It is these on-and-out Christians who propose not to wait to convert India, but to outlaw Christianity in America and exterminate the heathenism at their own door, who mean to waste no time on the mere outworks of the enemy, but to attack him in his very stronghold, that excite in my own mind a feeling of respect and personal respect that I cannot feel towards the colder-blooded Christians whose faith is feeble enough to save them from such fanaticism. There is a dash of heroism about this rash assault on the very cradle of American liberty that commands my admiration, even while it fires every instinct and energy of resistance. Who these men are that are the leading spirits of the movement, I do not know; but I suspect that the United signers of the Call are not its real originators. Be this as it may, they are men in earnest, who deserve to be met in earnest; and what I have to say will be said in earnest.

It is a satisfaction to have debate carried down at once to the principles by which it must at the last be decided. Mr. Abbot sees, as all clear-sighted infidels see, that this movement arises logically from the first principles of the Christian religion. It utters the dogma of no party or sect, but the universally recognized teachings of Christianity. Every Christian must, in consistency, favor it. It has no legitimate opponents except among the votaries of free religion. This Mr. Abbot strives to make plainer still by saying: "Let me say that I regard this proposed change in the Constitution as distinctively a Christian Amendment. It aims to make the nation a professedly Christian nation, and the government a professedly Christian government; and it aims to do this by the express recognition in the National Constitution of distinctively Christian ideas." Exactly; and to that surely no Christian can object. We welcome THE INDEX as a valuable helper in our work.

It will assist powerfully in arousing Christian people to a sense of the propriety and necessity of this amendment.

As a clear statement of the fundamental principles of the movement, the following paragraphs have never been surpassed:—

"The very first words of the Call I have read to you are a bold denial of the first principles of American liberty. 'GOVERNMENT IS INSTITUTED FOR MAN.' Note the words. For Man, not by Man! Yet the Declaration of Independence proclaims that, 'We secure these [human] rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.' The very first words, then, of this Christian call are a repudiation of free government, a confession of treason to the Republic.

"But I pass on, and will read further still. '1. A nation is the creature of God. 2. It is clothed with authority derived from God. 3. It is under the dominion of Jesus Christ, the appointed Ruler of nations. 4. It is subject to the Bible, the special revelation of the moral law.' Here are four immeasurable, unfathomable falsehoods. On the contrary, 1. A nation is a creature of Man. 2. It is clothed with no authority not derived from Man himself. 3. It is not under the dominion of Jesus Christ, or any other usurper. 4. It is no more subject to the Bible than it is to the Koran or the Book of Mormon. These counter-propositions are all implied in the saying of the Declaration of Independence that governments 'derive their just powers from the consent of the governed.' The proposed amendment involves the overthrow of the Declaration of Independence root and branch, and the erection in its stead of the dismal catechism of the Westminster Assembly as the law of the land."

The historical error involved in the writer's allusions to the Declaration of Independence, and the unfairness of his imputation that our movement is inimical to liberty, we shall expose at another time. Finally we quote his exposition of the inspiring cause of the movement:—

"The list of appended signatures is the most alarming feature of the case. Here is a body of men, all distinguished in their various walks of life, all educated, all influential, all representative. Governors and Ex-Governors, Judges, and other officials, Presidents and Professors, Bishops and clergymen, these men do not know what a terrible upheaval of this country they are in danger of producing. They are swept into this movement by causes deeper than they comprehend, and know nothing of the true nature of the oneness which makes them join it. They little perceive that Christianity feels itself desperately endangered in this country, and that this is a wild effort at self-preservation. The real causes of the movement are the alarm felt by good, honest Christians at the rapid spread of liberal ideas, and their own conscious inability to cope with them by argument and scholarship. Hence, as a last resort, they look to the influence of a civil government made Christian to stay the flood of infidelity."

THE INDEX has, we presume, a considerable circulation in Cincinnati. If its readers share its spirit, will follow its logic, and can gather the necessary force, they will suppress the approaching convention, at every hazard. Hear its subtle appeal to the worst passions of men:—

"I am no lover of the spirit which hastily appeals to force as the arbiter of controversy. I would oppose the adoption of any such 'amendment,' by every peaceable means which could be devised. But if Christian bigotry, emulating the spirit of secession, should open fire on a new Fort Sumter, and should succeed with mad fanaticism in destroying no constitutional guarantees of our religious liberties, it could be met in no other way than the most rapid and have been met, in case they had captured Washington, amended the Constitution to suit themselves, and seized upon the whole machinery of our government. Would the North have submitted even in this dire extremity? Ought it to have submitted? No—a thousand times no! The nation would have fought as never before to conquer back its ravished freedom. No should it be now. We must repel these mad attempts at any cost. We can never submit to the murder of Liberty. We must defend her—peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must. We must make the reign of ecclesiastical despotism on this continent impossible. Rather than see that day dawn upon us, every man who loves freedom and civilization and the integrity of the human soul will shoulder his musket, and march to his death as willingly as to a gay and joyous feast. Better that our gutters should run red with blood, and our cities be laid more low than poor Chicago in ashes and utter ruin, than that thus the hope of humanity should be quenched in a worse than Tartarian gloom. For one, there is no sacrifice so extreme, no fate so terrible, that I would not rather meet, than behold the glory of this Great Republic thus snatched like a star from heaven, and the bloody banner of the Cross waving from the dome of the Capitol where now stands, benign and pure, the goddess of Universal Liberty."

Mark the man! He will not submit even to the peaceable and orderly decision of the nation itself, acting according to its own Constitution! Rather then live under a government calling itself Christian, he would die resisting the declaration. For him, then, this is not a question for debate. Debate implies an arena from which force is excluded. Truth, speaking to conscience and reason, is the only arbiter. From this tribunal he has already appealed. Logically, he ought to prosecute it at once with bludgeons and paving stones, whenever he dares. We are not of this spirit. We submit our cause to be decided by argument. If the people of this country should decide to blot out every trace of Christian influence from our government, we will dissent, we will argue and labor and pray for its reformation, but we will not rebel. We shall expect the same submission from others, when the nation declares itself Christian. [The italics are ours.—ED. INDEX.] Has not Secession and its failure taught us that a nation is sovereign, and that the individual has no appeal from its decisions, except to the power of truth and the providence of God?

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,
Box 2000, St. Louis, Mo.

110—1360W.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, on REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance, and no slight, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, coarseness, and inefficiency of the system of Foreign Missions. Full of Fugues, Fads, and Interesting Excursions. Also, a very remarkable article by a famous Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution? Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to secure it so. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly religious treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to incorporate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution—the list of its most prominent supporters—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Stated and Answered from a Bible standpoint, a pamphlet published by A. J. GOSWELL, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE!

BOOK BUYERS who wish the LIVE BOOKS OF THE DAY can have their orders filled promptly by mail, post-paid, by sending the Publisher's price to

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Bookseller and Publisher,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE WORKS OF Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Tyndall, Proctor, Froese, Emerson, Max Mueller, Locky, M. D. Conway, John Weiss, James Freeman Clarke, Rev. C. Colver, Robt. Dale Ows, and all of the POPULAR BOOKS OF THE DAY, constantly on hand.

PRICE LISTS AND CATALOGUES sent upon application. Correspondence and inquiries solicited.

ANY BOOK PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED STATES

Sent post-paid on receipt of Price. Address

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Bookseller, Toledo, O.

Robert Collyer's Works!

I.

NATURE AND LIFE.

TENTH EDITION.

Price $1.50. Fine edition, bevelled boards, gilt edges, with fac-simile of Mr. Collyer's Autograph stamped in Gold, and a View of his early Home. Price $2.00. Sent by mail on receipt of price.

II.

THE LIFE THAT NOW IS.

With an excellent Steel Portrait of the Author, engraved by Perino. Price, $1.50.
Fine edition, bevelled boards, gilt edges, price $2.00.
A new volume, by Robert Collyer, of Chicago, is announced by Horace B. Fuller, of Boston. That it will be a treasury of wisdom and wit, of the most delicate insight, the most humane of sympathy, the most poetic imagination, all who have heard the eloquent preacher, or read his delightful "Nature and Life," will be sure.—GOSWELL FULLER CURTIS, in Harper's Weekly.

HORACE B. FULLER, Publisher,
14 Bromfield St., Boston.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
F. H. BATESON,
A. E. MACOMBER,

President.
Vice President.
Secretary.
Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON,
WILLIAM J. POTTER,
ARA E. BUTTS,
RICHARD P. HALLLOWELL,
FRANCIS E. ABBOT,
A. E. MACOMBER,
CALVIN CONE,
EDWARD BISSSELL,
P. H. BATESON.

Newport, R. I.
New Bedford, Mass.
New York, N. Y.
Boston, Mass.
Toledo, O.
" "
" "
" "
" "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo,	O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	"	"	Fifteen	1,500
C. CONE,	"	"	"	1,500
EDWARD BISSSELL,	"	"	"	1,500
F. E. ABBOT,	"	"	Forty	4,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	"	"	Ten	1,000
GUIDO MARX,	"	"	"	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	"	"	"	1,000
H. E. BOWEN,	"	"	"	1,000
W. C. FISK,	"	"	"	1,000
J. M. HUTHRIE,	"	"	"	1,000
V. KEEN,	"	"	"	1,000
ALANSON WOOD,	"	"	"	1,000
WILLIAM KRAUS,	"	"	Five	500
J. G. HOLEWANTH,	"	"	One	100
JOS. E. MARK,	"	"	"	100
C. A. CLARK,	"	"	"	100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York,	N. Y.,	Thirty	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport,	R. I.,	Two	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin,	Pa.,	Five	500
Geo. ROADLY,	Cincinnati,	O.,	Two	200
"	Defiance,	"	One	100
MISS A. HALL,	Northampton,	Mass.,	"	100
G. N. JENKINS,	Tonika,	O.,	"	100
J. S. GOSWELL,	Painesville,	O.,	"	100
CARL POST,	Monroe,	Mich.,	Three	300
HENRY MILLER,	Sacramento,	Cal.,	Five	500
L. R. SUNDERSLAND,	Quincy,	Mass.,	One	100
J. L. WHITING,	Boston,	"	"	100
LOUIS BRITTON,	Croydon,	N. H.,	"	100
J. E. SUTTON,	Oklahe,	"	"	100
S. I. DUNN,	"	"	"	100
J. M. HADLEY,	"	"	"	100
R. L. HILL,	Florence,	Mass.,	Ten	1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill,	"	Two	200
JON. F. BARRETT,	Boston,	"	"	200
E. W. WELLS,	La Grange,	Ind.,	"	200
"	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	500
FRANK PRATHER,	Wellsville,	Kan.,	One	100
E. P. DISBORNE,	New York,	N. Y.,	Two	200
J. T. DECKENSON,	Middlefield,	Cal.,	Fourteen	1,400
W. J. POTTER,	New Bedford,	Mass.,	Three	300
G. C. GLATTE,	Kendallville,	Ind.,	"	200
W. C. GANNETT,	Boston,	Mass.,	"	200
MISS M. C. PERKINS,	"	"	One	100
MRS. S. EMERSON,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	100
MISS E. EMERSON,	"	"	"	100
W. H. DUNN,	Birmingham,	Ala.,	"	100
B. POLSON,	Lebanon,	Mass.,	"	100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren,	Pa.,	"	100
W. C. RUSSEL,	Ithaca,	N. Y.,	"	100
WM. CLARK,	Toledo,	O.,	Three	300
C. L. SMITH,	"	"	One	100
"	"	"	Twenty	2,000
J. N. LYMAN,	Cincinnati,	"	One	100
L. G. FELCH,	Monroe Centre,	Pa.,	"	100
A. POLSON,	Boston,	Mass.,	Three	300
L. O. BASS,	Colebrook,	Conn.,	One	100
S. E. SEWALL,	Boston,	Mass.,	Five	500
ELIOT WRIGHT,	"	"	"	500
E. B. WARD,	Detroit,	Mich.,	Twenty	2,000
A. D. WILEY,	Dayton,	O.,	One	100
R. S. BOKER,	Keokuk,	Iowa,	"	100
WM. JONES,	Peekskill,	N. Y.,	"	100
"	Oskaloosa,	Iowa,	"	100
S. H. DAME,	Dover,	N. H.,	"	100
J. H. YOUNG,	"	"	"	100
JOS. HATES,	"	"	"	100
G. P. FOLSON,	"	"	"	100
"A FRIEND,"	"	"	"	100
MRS. H. E. PERKINS,	"	"	Two,	200
WILLIAM GREEN,	Boston,	Mass.,	One,	100
"A FRIEND,"	Orange,	N. J.,	"	100
"	Lowell,	Mass.,	"	100
D. B. STRIMAN,	Brattleboro,	Vt.,	"	100
Mrs. F. W. CHRISTIAN,	New York, N. Y.,	"	"	100
C. W. PARCOT,	Kelley's Island, O.,	"	Two	200
EDW. M. DAVIS,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	"	One	100
Mrs. LUCRETIA MOTT,	"	"	"	100
MISS M. A. WRIGHT,	Jersey City, N. J.,	"	"	100
A. S. BROWN,	Worcester, Mass.,	"	"	100
EDWIN BROWN,	"	"	"	100
R. P. HALLLOWELL,	Boston,	"	Five	500
BENJ. ROYMAN,	New Bedford,	"	Three	300
H. B. CLARKE,	"	"	"	300
"	"	"	Five	500
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo,	O.,	Ten	1,000
M. L. HOLBROOK,	Houlton,	Me.,	One	100
W. H. BOUGHTON,	New York, N. Y.,	"	"	100
"	"	"	"	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	"	"	Two	200
E. G. BURNETT,	Webster,	Mass.,	"	200
J. E. FOLLETT,	Winona,	Minn.,	One	100
JOS. WARRASSE,	Newton,	N. J.,	"	100
"	Franklin,	Pa.,	"	100
T. M. LAW,	Worcester,	Mass.,	"	100
W. H. DYER,	Prairie du Chien, Wis.,	"	"	100
W. H. SPALDING,	Duluth,	Minn.,	"	100
LOUIS BELLOSS,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	"	Two	200
LEWIS KENTZ,	Augusta,	Kan.,	One	100
SAM'L WARRASSE,	La Fayette,	N. J.,	"	100
W. L. RAYNE,	Amesbury,	Mass.,	"	100
W. EMERSON,	Boston,	"	"	100
C. H. BORN,	Dover,	N. H.,	Two	200
MISS I. THOMSON,	"	"	One	100
BENJ. HALLLOWELL,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	"	"	100
Mrs. M. K. VAN RENSSLAER,	N. Y. City,	"	"	100
R. B. STONE,	Aberdeen,	Mass.,	"	100
WM. ROTCH,	Fall River,	Mass.,	Two	200
Mrs. J. WHITAKER,	New Bedford,	"	Five	500
S. H. ROYCE,	Kirkkonen, N. Y.,	"	One	100
Mrs. R. D. FRANCIS,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	"	Two	200
CHAR. BONNALL,	Salem,	O.,	"	100
G. H. BRIGGS,	Amesbury,	Mass.,	Two	200
C. T. CLARKSON,	"	"	"	200
O. W. NEWTON,	Castleton, Ill.,	"	One	100
HENRY JENY,	Toledo,	O.,	Two	200
OTTO KLEIN,	"	"	Two	200
H. G. KNEUBERT,	"	"	Two	200
A. BOKNET,	"	"	One	100
"	Detroit, Mich.,	"	Thirty	3,000
TOLEDO PRINTING CO.,	Toledo, O.,	"	Thirty	3,000
T. K. FECK,	Westminster, Ct.,	"	Two	200

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO OFFICE NO. 90, ST. CLAIR ST.
NEW YORK OFFICE NO. 22, VESSEY ST.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is TWO DOLLARS a year in cash and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $3.50 and 72 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

LOCAL AGENTS.

HENRY H. RICHARDSON & Co., 22 Vessey St., New York.
RICHARD P. HALLLOWELL, 98 Federal St., Boston.
PARKER PILLSBURY, Salem, Ohio.

GENERAL AGENTS.

A. E. BUTTS, New York City.
H. L. GREEN, Syracuse, N. Y.

Any person, acting as an agent for THE INDEX, may forward the names of NEW SUBSCRIBERS and retain twenty per cent. of their SUBSCRIPTIONS.

All Letters and Communications to be addressed to
THE INDEX,
DRAWER 28, TOLEDO, O.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MUMFORD, 95 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

THE ANNUAL REPORT for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WOMEN OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Chandler's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (20 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's Essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (30 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER, Secretary.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vessey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILLA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. K. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription. Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 28, Toledo, Ohio.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 8) will be sent postpaid on receipt of fifty cents. These include "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham, and other equally valuable Tracts.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 10, 1872.

WHOLE No. 111.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible to at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BODDERS BROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINS, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CUNNEY, Rev. CHARLES VOTAW (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.
Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio."]]

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1872. SOCIAL IDEALS. BY DAVID A. WASSON.

[Fourth Lecture in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religion Association, January 28, 1872.]]

There are great common or social ideals which arise in the world, are diffused, gain supremacy, and remain, it may be, for many centuries, ruling men at the very roots of their souls. The coming of such into existence and power is perhaps the most important kind of event that ever occurs on the earth. Compared with this, the rise of a kingdom like Prussia, or of a republic like the United States, is, to speak moderately, an event of secondary importance. Such an advent there was in the rise of Christianity; and all that Christianity has done in the world, all its effect upon minds and morals illustrates the power of a common ideal to make, unmake and transform. If you would understand the past, study its ideals; history is unintelligible without them. If you would know your own age, study the "spirit of the age," its ideal, that is. And especially if there are tokens that we live at the opening of a new epoch, when ancient ideals are dying, and another sovereign, not of the same blood, is coming to the throne, an inquiry into the nature of the change thus going on must be of surpassing interest.

We do indeed live at one of those turning points in history. From the fourth to the fifteenth century one ideal, represented by Catholic Christianity, but enclosing within it from the eighth century another, embodied in the feudal system, reigned with undisputed sway in the occidental world. Copernicus, Columbus and Luther,—the first giving to the human mind a new heavens, the second a new earth, the third a new moral poise,—put an end to that period, already disturbed by the crusades, the Black Death, and the flight of Greek learning from Constantinople to the West; and two centuries later,—for profound alterations of the human mind are manifested but slowly,—the guiding imagination of the mediæval world was gone and irrecoverable. No sooner had it disappeared than the institutions it had given rise to, and which to a large extent remained,—as always happens in such cases,—lost on the one hand the genius that had made them wholesome, and on the other the explanation that had made them seem reasonable; at once they appeared anomalous, grotesque, monstrous, the product of imposture and violence.

Partly, therefore, through the reaction against these institutions, there arose, to replace the old, a new ideal, that of Liberty. Liberty—what a word to conjure with it has that been for a hundred years! And yet during the space of some twelve centuries—centuries that wrought out for us all the elements of our civilization,—it was scarcely, or but faintly, pronounced; even a class of reformers like the Puritans, honest, brave and high-souled as any the world has known, cared not a button for liberty in the more modern sense. Time was that the words "obedience" and "service" made music in men's ears. Then it was the ideal of religion to have no will of one's own; then the proudest nobleman professed, and made it matter of pride, to "serve his liege," that is, his system of relations with all above and all beneath him; then courtesy crowned itself with the title of servant, and the modern gentleman, following the verbal forms of a departed ideal, may still subscribe himself the "obedient servant" of another. Strange!—the title that raw Irish "help" may now refuse as degrading, was once worn as a plume by the very men who made pride a grace, if not a virtue. The "fag" system of Eton, Harrow, Rugby, &c., is a relic, curious to American eyes, of that old world in which service, whether the word or the thing, was not esteemed degrading, but the door to honor. How foreign is all this to what we boast, and without boast may reasonably esteem, as the "spirit of the age!" For good or evil—for good and evil—another ideal has arisen; it has dominated civilization for a century, and is only now beginning to be displaced by a second, of which also, in its turn, I shall have occasion to speak.

The ideal of liberty has its bright side and its eminent use in modern civilization; but unhappily it was formulated in a spurious way,—chiefly in the last century and by Jean Jacques Rousseau; and in this vicious shape has come down to our age. The doctrine that thus got into vogue was substantially as follows: That each individual has by gift of Nature an unqualified property in himself; that he is born to be absolutely his own master, and to dispose of himself at his own sovereign pleasure; that his individual will is therefore his proper guide and supreme law; that this natural liberty, so called, has but one limitation—it should be so adjusted by each to the like liberty in others that he may enjoy his own without encroaching on theirs; that government is a purely defensive expedient, designed to secure to each his perfect possession and disposal of himself, and that it borrows the right to accomplish even this limited task only from the voluntary consent of the individual parties to it.

This doctrine, it may be observed, would be quite as suitable to rats as human beings. Your rat is quite as much attached as a human creature can be to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness—would be nothing less than absolute owner of himself, would make his private inclination his supreme law, and dispose of himself at his own sovereign pleasure; and rat government, could these assiduous rodents arrive at such, would undoubtedly be designed to sustain each in the liberty so dear to him. That order of doctrine, however,—spawned in Europe, not America, and made public in Europe at a time when Massachusetts was as loyal as London to the British crown,—was to be imported into this country, and to have a notable career. To please and propitiate Virginia, Thomas Jefferson was chosen to write the Declaration of Independence. Jefferson, who as late as November 29th, 1775,—five and a half months after the battle of Bunker's Hill,—wrote thus in a private letter, "Believe me, dear sir, there is not in the British empire a man that more cordially loves the union with Great Britain than I do"—a "love" that included allegiance to the British crown,—had in the months intervening between that November and the June following blazed out as a political philosopher of the newest school. Seizing the opportunity to air his neophyte faith under auspices so uncommon, he proceeded, after the fashion of his teachers, to select certain ordinary descriptions of self-interest, common to rats and men, to endow these with "inalienable" rights, and to announce that civil society exists to no end but to assure the said rights of self-interest. This sacred doctrine became a resource, and was much endeared to many good men, during the struggle against slavery; it is now a sacred scripture, much more sacred to numbers than the scriptures commonly so-called. One might compare it, in its actual relation to the spirit of the nation, to a dry bone under ground, around which the rootlets of a vine have wound and woven themselves in a myriad fold complexity of filaments; the vine could well live and flourish and bear fruit without it, but cannot be disrupted from it without injury. Every community has its dry bones so embraced; and, whatever the rude agitator may think, the real thinker knows that it is a serious business to meddle with them. But when in the hollow of the bone poison is hid, and the rootlets have penetrated to it, and the leaves begin to wither and the fruit to rot by effect of it, then the time for root-pruning has come, and the knife should be taken in hand. The feeding roots of this nation have now, it is manifest, struck through to the poison in Jefferson's doctrine. This doctrine is to-day furnishing the logic of "free love," and, if the premises be admitted, an unalterable logic. It is propagating to-day a putrid ferment to destroy not only the most sacred of social institutions, but the very grounds of social duty.

Under these circumstances, everything admonishes us to return and resume the sober, constructive spirit of Washington, Adams, Jay, Hamilton, Ames, Osgood. During the gullant, but alas, ineffectual struggle of the Federalists against Jacobin politics, Rev. Dr. David Osgood of Medford, Mass., delivered a number of political discourses, so replete with sound judgment and just sentiment, and marked by so high an order of grave eloquence, that the author was honored with a share in that secret, cowardly vituperation which Jefferson poured out so prodigally upon the best men of his time. That certificate of character should entitle him to remembrance. Over this, Jefferson's style of political speculation triumphed in what he himself vaunted as "our second great revolution, not inferior to the first, that of 1800,"—a revolution of which himself was the hero and himself the eulogist. The hour has arrived when we should reverse the triumph, and, instead of finding a foundation in isolating self-interests and rights of self-interest, should find it where eternal wisdom laid it, in connecting and commanding obligation,—the hour when rat-liberty, or such as consists in pursuing in one's own fashion whatever one esteems happiness, should be recognized as proper only to beasts, and only to the wild among beasts, while it is at once the privilege and the imperative vocation of human beings to put this unequivocally away, that, through the duty of all, and the discipline of all and productive restraints submitted to by all, men may create for themselves a chartered and fruitful freedom, to liberate and empower them in head, heart and hand.

It is undoubtedly a function of civil society to protect individual rights, that is to say, the rights of individual self-love. Had Jefferson said just this, and with the due qualifications, he would, so far, have done well. But in the first place, he ran to an absurd excess by announcing these rights as "inalienable." Inalienable! If the right to life is so, this nation did a murder with every rebel shot on the field in our great civil contest. The right to liberty,—if that is inalienable, the State commits a crime with every thief sent to jail. Not only are all such rights qualified, conditional, alienable, but it is the express office of the commonwealth to affirm personal responsibility by treating them accordingly, extending over them the sovereignty of moral law. Inalienable! The statement is preposterous, and only as practically set at naught by the common sense of the community, can it fail to be mischievous.

Again, it is not the sole function of the State to protect individual self-interest and rights of self-interest; and in restricting it to this, Jefferson betrayed the one exceeding, fatal vice of his political philosophy. Above all that, civil society has a productive function; it is to embody and exact the duty of all men to concur in doing unitedly whatsoever is necessary to an honorable, fruitful, progressive social life,—as, to take familiar examples, in establishing courts of justice, making roads, providing for education, &c. Farther, and more comprehensively, it is to make a field and climate for the virtues of civilization, such as constitute its life-blood, as industry, honesty, chastity and the like. In fine, its grand function is, in duly protecting the rights of self-interest, to hold them in perpetual correlation with the social principles and social duty which are severally imposed upon humanity by its civilizing genius.

Take this point of view, and you have an answer to the disintegrating doctrines now getting abroad; assume Jefferson's point of view, making private rights inalienable and exclusive, and you have no answer but a fetch. Does some one, male or female, come forward to cry from the housetops, "Hear, O heaven, and give ear, O earth! My pursuit of happiness is interfered with by the State!" My distressed friend, I would say, if you are not willing to pursue happiness in subordination to social duty, that is, to the great, necessary laws of all human welfare, then are you one of the very persons to whom civil society should supply a will wiser than their own.

But instead of proceeding with mere criticism I will try to sketch very rapidly and briefly what approves itself to my judgment as a sound doctrine,—finding in the end what there is of wholesome and useful in the modern ideal of liberty.

1. Man has, as I often say, a pregnant genius, by the law and promise of which he is bound. That is his distinction. Nature has endowed him with the functions of her own maternity; to bring forth civilization, with all the wealth, material and spiritual, that belongs to it, he is brought forth by the universe. That function gives a supreme law to his being; all his duties, rights, hopes, with his entire privilege and price as a human soul, are rooted in it and inseparable from it. To subvert that civilizing genius, to distinguish and enforce the obligations implied in it, and so to make the necessary basis of civilization, government is instituted and civil society exists.

2. The matrix of civilization is social. What we are to each other makes us to be what we are in ourselves. The individual nature, taken strictly as such, is utterly sterile, an inhuman nature,—is what a seed buried in the soil would be, were the sun blotted out of the heavens. Isolate from earliest years a creature born from the loins of humanity, and of the fruition of humanity there will in him be nothing; he can become by his physical growth only a beast, wanting even articulate speech. Thoughts, morals, manners, arts, industries, language, everything that distinguishes human beings, comes of the relation between human beings. Could anything be more irrational than to put all this out of sight in stating the grounds of civil society—to set out with absolute individualism, absolute individual liberty,—to limit social duty to the one point of property letting each other alone, that each may pursue happiness, à la mode, according to his own inclination—and to regard civil society as instituted only in order that the right to be let alone may be respected and sustained? And yet that is the doctrine which, having long dominated in politics, is now coming to be applied to the most intimate and vitalizing of social relations—and it is even accepted by some as the type of true "radicalism."

3. Man being born and bound—bound by everything human in him—to make for himself such a kind of life as he has not by mere gift of Nature, it is important to notice that his first act, at the outset of his human career, is to put his natural liberty away, and to accept in place of it a system of productive restraints and imperative duties, and with these measured liberties, always submitted to law, while determined in their measure by considerations of general utility. Natural liberty! Why, the institution of property alone takes the very ground from beneath its feet, leaving it not a spot to alight on. Inalienable natural liberty! And yet every human being born in this community comes into the world to be deprived in toto of his liberty of self-disposal for the space of twenty years, two thirds the average life of a generation. One half of all human beings die, and never, by any legal allowance, touch that liberty with so much as the tip of the finger. The first lesson set to each, and the one at which each is kept so long, is the lesson of obedience; and if many were kept at it longer, it would be much better for them. Every child, again, in being taught honesty, veracity, and the like, is instructed to put that liberty away, and substitute for it fixed obligations. You must do this, and you must not do that, we say; and until he has got that must by heart, and learned to make it steadfastly predominant over his natural liberty, he is fit for no liberty whatever. And so it is that all civilization and all culture mean the sovereignty of obligation over inclination, and the submission, rather than the supremacy, of the casual, private will. If, therefore, you wish to get a principle the most vicious possible, take that "natural liberty" for a principle; and if you would turn the world upside down, emptying all civilization into the abysses of beastly nature, reason from that, and apply it with uncompromising logic, as a principle.

The limit of liberty is this: Every man has a right to do what is right, and no other. We have been told of late that a class of our "sisters," inhabiting certain "filthy localities," have a right to pursue happiness in their own way,—"as good a right" as others to live chastely and decently. The sufficient answer would be that, if it is right for any woman to profane her womanhood, then she has a right to do so; but neither woman nor man nor any other creature can have a right to do harm and wrong, any doctrine of liberty to the contrary notwithstanding. True, that strange judgment was reasoned cogently enough from the original and indefeasible liberty, of which there has been so much and so unwise talk; and one might say to the indignant democratists,—You have prostituted the franchise, and the sentiment is more respectable than the logic which forbids you to do the like by your homes. If every barbarian in New York, because his "natural liberty" must be compromised with, has a right to vote, even though his vote will tend only to sepulchre the city in infamy, then I see not but the said "sisters" have a right to do their kind of mischief,—which is perhaps little worse for themselves, while it does not necessarily involve others, and threaten the hopes of the nation, at all in the same, nor even in a comparable degree. I, however, recognize a liberty to do right, not wrong, and to do good, not mischief; and recognize no right to liberty as taking precedence of our common right and duty to make a healthy society, a well-ordered life, a productive and honorable civilization; and any liberty not held in submission to the laws of welfare, and made serviceable toward welfare, is one that has only a vicious imagination and spurious ideal for its support.

4. One has a right, I have said, to do what is right, and to get it done for himself and others. We are bound, every one of us, to put away our irresponsible liberty as beasts, and to put obligation in the place of it; and every life is inchoate save as this is done. How shall it best be effected? Shall the wisest, assembled in Congress, say, determine for every man, and in all particulars, what he ought to do? Yes, if human life will best profit by that. I have no right to desire anything but the best law for my life, and no liberty to reject such law, no matter how or by whom it is got at. But here some considerations of great importance come in, and here we reach the whole some side of the modern ideal. Social regulation, it has been discovered, may be overdone, while too much of it makes barrenness rather than fertility. In the first place, there is an important class of actions not properly under the control of the will. No man can rightfully choose what he will think; and in the degree that he attempts to do so, his mental action becomes vicious and destructive. Thought is not thought unless it is a law to itself. The practical recognition in modern times of this truth, though partial as yet, has been of incalculable profit to civilization, and is rightly regarded as at once a token and means of progress. Again, the corporate community is fallible, it also like the individual; and when all the ignorance and barbarism of the land is held to have the same title with knowledge and civilizing mind to political function, the amount of fallibility exhibited by it is likely to be liberal; a certain frugality of civil regulation is therefore discreet. Farther, general and pre-emptory rules can never be flexible and adaptive enough to anticipate all the fine elections of character; an excess of them would therefore tend to suppress character, converting men into animate machines. Once more, spontaneity is precious. Spiritual, like physical, productivity is inseparable from it; room must be made for this, ample room. Hence social regulation, effected by government and law, is sane only as it is wisely sparing,—making thorough work indeed so far as it goes, but carefully not going too far. The modern mind is much impressed with the need of that wise abstinence: and so far its ideal is good.

On the other hand, suppose one should deny the jurisdiction of the corporate community altogether, and make that of the individual exclusive; suppose he should lay it down for an absolute and universal principle that each is privileged to determine for himself, and in all particulars, what is right. That were wild. Men have a life, a welfare, a productive function in common; they exist as moral and intelligent human beings, they have articulate speech even, only through the effect of their relations, their interdependence, their social complexity; and the last violence is done to the truth of Nature by him who would regard each of them as rounded completely in his separate self, and endowed with an invincible independence. There is no such independence; interdependence is a first law of human life; and it is only by the recognition of this, and the regulation of it, and an ordered integration of society, that the productive function of humanity is otherwise than abortive. We must,—Nature has said that we must,—have fixed common understandings, fixed for all, and obligatory upon all, in order that the soul of any man may have its proper fruition. There can be, therefore, no right of a jurisdiction exclusively individual—no principle in Nature to that effect.

No exclusive jurisdiction, then, of the social body, and none of the individual. Either of them practically asserted as exclusive would make human nature barren and prohibit civilization. What then? The jurisdiction must be composite, partly social, partly individual. With respect to our broadest and strictly necessary relations of interdependence, it should be conceded to the corporate community; while with respect to all others, where the interdependence is less strict, and to which invariable rules could not well apply, it should be assigned to the individual. In general, the best modern sentiment inclines to say,—Leave as much to the discretion of the individual as may be without compromising social integrity and health. Spontaneity is so valuable, so essential, to the finest essays of genius and the riddlest energies of enterprise and invention, that to make ample room for it is the part of wisdom. We hold, therefore, that it is well to simplify the functions of civil society, and by getting just enough done thoroughly, surely, sensibly, to make it safe that the conceded jurisdiction of the individual should be liberally extended. But just in proportion as social powers are yielded to mindlessness and barbarism, this liberality becomes unsafe; there must be more governing in quantity to make up for the defect of quality; the functions of government are at once overdone and insufficient; and a fluctuating, confused, desultory mass-despotism sprawls over the whole field of human action, covering all, and usefully occupying no part of it. Are there no signs of a tendency to just this in our community? Such a plethora of laws, and never enough effect of law! The statute books bursting with fulness, and private usurpations grown to enormity! Interference with what should be the allowed liberty of individual action, such as no European people would endure, and the right effects of civil order too imperfectly attained! Our democracy is like a full bowl in unsteady hands, always slopping over upon floors and garments, and giving us in that way a great deal too much of its contents, while for this very reason it never brings enough to the lips. Our reformers, some of them, wish to vote everything, and run to the ballot-box as a little boy to the imagined omnipotence of his papa, to ask for all things, possible and impossible; and meantime, with continual excess, we have continual deficiency.

Time now to rectify our ideal. To do so, one truth, one grand truth, should be recognized; all men are justly bound by the end for which all men exist, to wit, an honorable, productive, progressive life. That fact goes before liberty; it is the principle. Our "wagon is hitched to a star." Jefferson, Paine and Company undertook to cut the traces, and make the wagon "free."

Bound by that end, all men are bound to the means, adjustments, principles and applications of principles necessary to its realization. Of the things thus necessary, the two first and broadest are strictly correlative; first, social law, social integration,—as necessary to the end for which man is created as individual existence even, and to be reasoned from, as ordered by, its own principles; secondly, the spontaneity, the initiative, of the individual. Neither of these without the other; neither to be borrowed from the other. As the effect of their just correlation, honorably maintained, there will come an upward liberation, which consists in man's higher use at once of himself and of what the world offers him for use—in the flowering and fructification of his life. That liberation, that flowering and fruiting of his life, that higher use of himself and his conditions, is freedom, real freedom. For this the State exists, and for this the conceded jurisdiction or "liberty," of the individual exists; both for their uses, both for the same use, and both by the same right—the right, duty, imperative vocation, of man to bring out of his life the just fruit of it.

Now, all this has been pushed aside. We have been beguiled into setting up individual "natural" liberty, as an exclusive, absolute principle—against the primary law of social interdependence, against the commanding obligation of that high end for which man is created. So isolated, this liberty becomes beast liberty, rat liberty. Everything, however, it is thought, must hinge upon that. And because it is no true human principle, the doors are tumbling off their sham hinges, the tempest sweeping in, and we a nation of Mrs. Partingtons trying with busy broom to sweep the tempest out: quite in vain; it pours through the halls, through the rooms, to the marriage chamber, to the marriage bed; and if we are not to be swamped, it is necessary that we come to a better understanding, beginning with Duty,—social duty, to be socially defined and enforced, for the broad necessary relations of interdependence, and individual duty—duty still—for so much as may wisely be entrusted to that; thus, through duty done and discipline established, we shall arrive at all the richest effect of social integration, while enabling ourselves to secure also the richest effect of spontaneity, by making it not only safe but profitable to allow the discretion of the individual large room and function. Cherish liberty, then; 'tis a treasure; but do not make it a first principle, for then it is no treasure. Duty for the first principle, and liberty only and always under the sovereignty of Obligation.

But we have another ideal, which also has its good aspects, but which long since began to become spurious by excess, while in the doctrines of the International Association, it is just now arising in a shape of the last extravagance to claim supremacy in the modern world. It is the ideal of Equality, which in its excess becomes that of uniformity, or universal sameness—the same function, the same fortune, the same of everything, as nearly as may be, for all. It is plain that the term equality has made a vast impression upon the modern imagination, has become one of the magic words, words to conjure with; we roll it as a sweet morsel under the tongue, and it is like wine to exhilarate; the sound of it is music in the ear; it seems to assure the goodness of all that comes under its patronage, while everything looks black and cruel which is dissociated from it. Forty years ago De Tocqueville, in his remarkable chapter entitled, "Why Democratic Nations manifest a more ardent and enduring love of Equality than of Liberty," wrote as follows: "Everybody has remarked that in our time, and especially in France, the passion for equality is every day gaining ground." He speaks of this passion as "ardent, insatiable, incessant, invincible," and ventures the statement, certainly important if true, that the communities possessed by it will sooner choose "equality in slavery" than liberty without it,—will purchase equality, if need be, at the price of "poverty, servitude, barbarism." These surprising words, emanating, be it remembered, from no lover of monarchy, though from one who carried France in the eyes somewhat too much to detect the finer shades of sentiment in other lands, were penned while Red Republicanism was yet in the egg. The brood has been well hatched since that day. If the statement were true then, it is thrice true now. I do not doubt that this penetrating observer saw justly what was before his eyes in his own land; and as little doubt that Renan, in that wondrously prophetic essay wherein before the late war he predicted the down-fall of France, as the necessary result of internal decay, was right in attributing that decay chiefly to the inflamed egotism which will sooner embrace barbarism than frankly acknowledge a superior.

Now this sentiment, though vicious and destructive, implicates a measure of what is true and good. As our admirable Fisher Ames said at the beginning of the century, "Most of the democratic articles of faith are blended with truth, and seem true." (He added: "And they so comfortably soothe the pride and envy of the heart that it swells with resentment when they are contested, and suffers some spasms of apprehension even when they are examined.") There is a sense in which equality of rights ought to be affirmed and maintained. The benefits produced by a system of social order may be, and ought to be, open to all impartially. The right to personal protection, the right to hold property, the right of inheritance, should be maintained for all in the same sense; access to the courts of justice, the use of public schools, public roads, public conveyances, and the like, should be assured to all with the same restrictions and the same freedom. There is a certain public inheritance, a wealth produced by the system of social order, to which of right every citizen is heir on the same terms with every other. Observe, this is no right of every unclean or incapable individual to be reckoned personally the equal of the wisest and best; nor is it an equal right of function in the state or elsewhere, irrespective of capacity and fitness; for all right of function must be conditional strictly—conditioned upon the ability and disposition to make the function serviceable, that is, to make it real function rather than obstruction; it is simply a common privilege of access, on the same equitable terms, to the benefits produced by political function, that is, by a system of civil order.

That is the sane, republican doctrine of citizen-rights,—the same for all citizens who do not forfeit them by misbehavior. There has been occasion to assert it with emphasis in Europe, against a system which, upon no equitable ground, made over the best fruits of civil order to a preferred, hereditary class; and there has been occasion to assert it with no less emphasis in our country, where a provincial prejudice would exclude Frederick Douglass from public tables, forbidding him to take food beside men, not one of whom but were honored to be reckoned his peer. This republican doctrine of citizen rights is as dear to me as to another. Call them equal rights, if you will,—provided always that an enthusiastic, passionate, purblind imagination of equality as universally necessary, and even as a universal fact in nature, does not creep in under that word equal, to run away with your wits. Numbers, as every one may see, have in fact been deported thus from the domains of common sense, and cast away upon the quicksand-conceit that in the political institution character and capacity should go for nothing, since, forsooth, "all men have equal rights." Said Fisher Ames—to quote him again:—"If the philosophers among the democrats will restrict the word equality as carefully as they ought, it will not import that all men have an equal right to all things, but that to whatever they have a right, it is as much to be protected and provided for as the right of any persons in society." This, however, was only good sense, while what the "democratic philosophers" craved, and the only thing to content them, was a blown imagination.

The "passion for equality" first over-stepped the bounds of sound sense, and manifested its character as a passion, unreasoning and irrational, by asserting the personal equivalence, the equal personal value, of all men. It no longer said simply that citizen rights, properly discriminated, are the same for all citizens who do not alienate them by misconduct, but quite struck beyond this and said broadly, with Thomas Jefferson, "All men are equal." This violent and absurd imagination was at first applied only in politics, and in our country has never gone very much farther. Indeed, and as it might seem, strangely, it was felt to be true only in politics. All men are equal, we were told; but even in the minds of those who said so with greatest gusto, this meant only that all are equally entitled to the elective franchise. For as a man will on Sunday, and in the Wednesday evening prayer meeting, believe fervidly in the dogmas of total depravity and eternal damnation, while for the rest of the week he will perhaps cherish as his dearest friend one of the very persons whom his Sunday-belief proclaims a child of the Devil, doomed to everlasting burnings, so it is with all formalists; they have all their box-truths, true inside the box and not at all so outside. Never was this sectional and cooped belief better illustrated than by the democrats who proclaimed all men equal. The box that defined the space of their "great truth" was the ballot-box.

Rousseau formulated this dogma, as he did that of natural liberty. According to him, we have seen, each man's will is his supreme, only law. Each, accordingly, being absolutely independent, is the equal of every other, just as all perfect circles are equal in the sense of being equally circles. As, therefore, from the absoluteness of the individual will, he argued that no man can owe, or be required to acknowledge, any social obligation but such as he chooses to make for himself, so from the personal equivalence of all, he argued that each is entitled to an equal function in the State with every other. This conceit became that of his nation, and with this it is that the modern career of France began.

And here it was that opened the contrast and chasm between French democracy and our ancestral republicanism. The latter, as represented, for example, by its illustrious martyr, Algernon Sidney, had the infirmity to choose plain, sterling good sense as against inflated imagination, quite false to be sure, but then so big and so enticing to heads of a certain quality! Sidney says: "That equality which is just among equals is just only among equals; but such as are wise, ignorant, vicious, slothful or cowardly are not equal in natural or acquired virtues to the generous, wise, valiant and industrious, nor equally useful to the societies in which they live: they cannot therefore be an equal part in the government of them; they cannot equally provide for the common good; and 'tis not a personal but a public benefit that is sought." Our ancestral republicanism had an honorable purpose to make citizenship, under the conditions of good behavior, a ticket of admission to the benefits of a sound social system. Rousseau, and France with him, flew away from this good ground to perch upon a crazy conceit instead; and Jefferson, sprawling his new-found French wings to the airs of a great occasion, flew to the same roost.

Limited, for the most part, in our country to the field of politics, though always growing and encroaching, as such moral fungi will, this conceit, this imagined equilibrium of egotism, had in France at the outset the aid of a passionate reaction from old manners and institutions, has had a longer period there than here, and has not been resisted by a characteristic sobriety of mind in the nation. There it has for some while prescribed the customary attitude of men toward each other; and the result is a moral atrophy, a dry-rot of the higher sentiments, a debility of character, an impoverishment of natures through their mutual relations, a death of discipline at the root, a destruction of authority, a shrinking and shrivelling of capacity, an incapability of any better alliance than such as may be found in the lumped egotism of classes, and in fine, a deterioration of the national spirit more rapid than was ever seen in history before,—all of which may serve for a warning, and cannot fail, one would say, to warn none but those who are blind and deaf and dead to instruction. France has beautiful capabilities,—the brightest, most vivacious genius, the most charming manners, in the world; and I could do anything sooner than exult over her misfortunes; but to be bewitched with spurious ideals was her first misfortune, upon which the others have followed; and one must take his instruction where it is offered.

"By no weak pity might the gods be moved," and man, though moved by pity, should at least not suffer it to blind his eyes.

All those effects might have been anticipated. A nation is not in a good way if it does not invite and nourish asperities by grateful recognition, and by offering them a proper field and function; but a nation jealous habitually of them, habitually intent on making a bad climate for them, purchases the mediocrity it desires. A nation filled to the lips with an impassioned, intolerant conceit of equality does just this; and is punished by obtaining what it imagines, actual equality, to wit, an equality in universal littleness. France has won a long way in this direction. During the war she had no general, and after it no statesman. She has passed through her great struggle without showing one trace of great character—unless a certain elevation and amplitude of mind in the writer, Renan, furnish a solitary exception. Admirable litterateurs she has; but even in literature her best is tarnished silver, not gold. Meantime, the leveling passion, having always for its ideal an equilibrium of egotism, destroys all that gives depth, fertility, richness to the social spirit,—reciprocal reverences, reciprocal, glad recognition of special superiorities, honorable, fruitifying exchanges of deference and obedience, and the like. The "three reverences" of Goethe are precisely and pre-eminently what this spirit can not endure; and therefore it cannot endure that which above all ennobles character and gives dignity to human life. The nation, accordingly, has continual agitation without silent, long-breathed, fruitful activity—that "distressing small motion," of which De Tocqueville speaks; and its life is likely to be polarized, as that of France has been so largely, between the narrowest, disintegrating egotism and the painted quackeries of sentimental politics. A peculiar aversion to discipline becomes a national trait, because discipline implies obedience; and if the individual must obey, he will by preference obey some one whom he does not at the same time feel painfully compelled to respect,—some little man, easily seen to be a pigmy perched high, easily felt to be an "equal," or else one who, if possessed of ability, atones for it, and reduces himself to the required level, by defect of character. The representative of public authority must maintain himself either by purchased adhesion and military force, like Napoleon III, or by pouring out floods of flattery upon catfish, with Trochu, whose fulsome eulogies of troops that got under fire only to scamper away were exacted by the "passion for equality." It is to be observed that the one general who had the manliness to rebuke insubordinate and cowardly regiments, compelling them for a moment to feel their beloved equality pretty thin stuff, was murdered the moment the communists got him into their hands. And the communists had to reassert their sense of equality by shutting up their own leaders in jail once a fortnight or so,—Assi for example.

It is the last result of this spirit that genuine, sterling self-respect becomes an all but impossible virtue, being displaced by that self-conceit which lives only in comparisons. Self-respect, a sentiment without which men were of no more worth than frogs in a pool, is wholly simple and positive, like the growth of herbage or the shining of stars: it does not feed upon comparisons, is incapable of envy or mean jealousy, and is nourished rather than depleted by its association with deference and reverence. Nothing is more foreign or more fatal to it than the spirit which says, "I am as good as another, and will never acknowledge a superior;" it dies before that base self-assertion can go from the heart to the lips.

I remember the powerful and significant impression made upon me years ago by Toschi's engraving from the St. John and St. Augustine of Correggio. The apostle, a little elevated above the other, is intruding him; his face radiant with intelligence and benignity. Augustine stands with his head slightly bowed, listening with ear and soul. His serious, noble countenance expresses profound reverence, purest thoughtfulness and incorruptible self-respect, not opposed and contending, but united to make by their union the indivisible majesty of character and manliness. He receives every word as the coined gold of heaven's truth, yet does so with a mental poise and self-possession no less than perfect; and his vast docility lends itself with untold enhancement to all that which makes his spirit masterly. No upstart conceit there to squeak, "I am as good as you!" One imagines how that noble aspect of the man would be cheapened and degraded by the slightest access of this self-assertion, jealous and pert. And partly, it may be, because this is quite wanting, there is no arrogance of superiority in the face of the apostle,—no line there to say, "Stand apart, I am better than you." The conceit and blurt of equality, the arrogance and exclusiveness of caste,—of neither is there a vestige.

It occurred to me while looking on that picture why it is that the modern artist must leave men aside, and turn to landscape, in order to produce what may finely affect the beholder. A noble form of human relation can no longer be imagined with artistic clearness and simplicity. The typical modern must be "independent" to be manly, indolent to be sincere, and jealous of superior qualities to preserve the equalizer's substitute for self-respect. The passion for equality, after debilitating all productive social principles, has swarmed like a plague of moths upon the human mind itself to prey upon its blossoms. Well for Correggio that he was not born in modern France! He would probably have found in himself a genius to paint only horses, bear-hunts, or spectral impossibilities, like those in which Gustave Doré revels with the pencil and Victor Hugo with the pen.

But every ideal, genuine or spurious, must of necessity go on developing itself to bring forth all of good or of evil there is in it. Thus that of Catholicism is compelled, even in its decrepitude, to produce new dogmas, new pretensions, more and more alien to sincere modern intelligence. So in the present instance: the ideal of equality, long since become spurious, advances upon itself, rejects its own past, develops new designs, and becomes more exacting and intolerant as it becomes more extreme. It has of late generated the demand for an artificial, constrained equalization of conditions, to be established and maintained at the expense, and to the utter displacement of all liberty whatsoever; and a powerful, widespread organization, vaunted publicly in the present Congress, as comprising "the leading minds of all civilized lands," has arisen, and is secretly, inexorably at work, to effect that purpose. Time fails me, however, to discuss this branch of the subject. In one or two remarks your patience will perhaps indulge me.

This equality has no room, and knows that it has no room, and means to have no room in fact, for liberty, whether the natural liberty of Rousseau, on which I set no value, or the chartered and fruitful freedom of individual action in civilized communities, which every man ought to value greatly. Now it is well known that Jefferson in his famous preamble put equality before liberty; probably, however, it is not generally known that his first draught of that paragraph revealed his point of view more explicitly. In that first draught he expressly represented the right, not only to liberty, but to life itself as borrowed from, and contingent upon, his great first truth, equality. He wrote thus: "We hold these truths to be self-evident; that all men are created equal and independent; that from this equal creation they derive certain inherent and inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." The right to life "derived" from natural equality! He drew his pen through that; but there must have been a strange speculative bias in the man who could indite such a statement at all. It was a bias, however, in what was coming to be "the spirit of the age;" and this spirit, continuing and producing itself, has already become in some quarters a Turk that endures no brother near the throne.

With good enough warrant, too, if the "great truth" of equality be indeed a great truth. Suppose we had been fervidly saying for a century that all horses are equal,—proclaiming this as the grand fact about horses. Well, one day a fellow rides up to my stable (I have none), takes out my blood horse, puts his own half-hipped, spavined nag in the stall instead, mounts and coolly rides away. I have him arrested for robbery; whereupon he proves from my own lips that all horses are equal, therefore that I had suffered no loss! A just lesson for a loose tongue, I should say! Somewhat in this fashion it is that the new equalizers have taken up the talk of democratic politics, to proceed upon it in dead—and killing—earnest. I imagine them addressing the astonished democrats on this wise:—

"Equality is a fact in Nature: you confess it such: we are about to make it a fact of civilization. Think no longer to put us off with mere ballot-box equality: that little game is played out; we have been at school for a century, and are not to-day the green heads you gulled so easily once. You baited your hook with liberty, and caught your gudgeon; we know the smell of the bait now, and are not the gudgeons you take us for. You got up for us a little, special, formal equality at the polls, as an expedient to cheat us out of the real thing; you did cheat us, to our shame be it said, but see if you can do it again! All men are equal of right; we have sworn that they shall be so in fact. They can be so in fact only if conditions are equal; and conditions will be made equal only when personal liberty and private property are done away,—only when the collectivity, centered in an efficient

We desire here to express our warm appreciation of the frankness, courtesy, and kindness with which we were treated by the officers and members of the convention; and to say emphatically that we found them to be so thoroughly sincere and earnest in their purpose that they did not fear the effect of a decided but temperate protest. This fact speaks volumes in their praise, as men of character and convictions. We saw no indication of the artful management which characterizes most conventions. The leading men,—Rev. D. McAllister, Rev. A. M. Milligan, Prof. Sloane, Prof. Stoddard, Prof. Wright, Rev. T. P. Stevenson,—impressed us as able, clear-headed, and thoroughly honest men; and we could not but conceive a great respect for their motives and their intentions. It is such qualities as these in the leaders of the movement that give it its most formidable character. They have definite and consistent ideas; they perceive the logical connection of these ideas, and advocate them in a very cogent and powerful manner; and they propose to push them with determination and zeal. Concede their premises, and it is impossible to deny their conclusions; and since these premises are axiomatic truths with the great majority of Protestant Christians, the effect of the vigorous campaign on which they are entering cannot be small or despicable. The very respect with which we were compelled to regard them only increases our sense of the evils which lie germinant in their doctrines; and we came home with the conviction that religious liberty in America must do battle for its very existence hereafter. The movement in which these men are engaged has too many elements of strength to be contained by any far-seeing liberal. Blindness or sluggishness to-day means slavery to-morrow. Radicalism must pass now from thought to action, or it will deserve the oppression that lies in wait to overwhelm it.

Without further comments at present, we append the remonstrance to which Rev. Mr. Mayo made a disingenuous and evasive reply. It was not read, as reported, but the substance of it was given extemporaneously in different language. The opening sentence was written with the expectation of not being allowed to speak—an expectation afterwards agreeably disappointed by the courtesy and liberality of the officers of the convention.—

In accordance with the convention's vote, I submit the following written remonstrance to the Business Committee, although I requested the privilege of making an oral one:

Without casting any reflections upon the motives which have led to this attempt to Christianize the United States Constitution, I wish to enter a most earnest protest against the attempt itself. I will not inflict a long document on your attention, but confine myself to a single point of vast practical importance.

If the proposed changes are ever made in the Constitution, their necessary result will be to prevent all persons except Christian believers from holding any office, civil or military, under the American government. No honest disbeliever in the newly incorporated doctrines will be able to take the oath of allegiance required from all United States officials and soldiers. Only Christian believers and dishonest disbelievers will be able to take it; consequently the entire power of the government, both political and military, will be constitutionally concentrated in the hands of those who believe, or profess to believe, the doctrines thus incorporated.

The very large portion of the American people who do not believe in these doctrines will thus be rendered incapable of holding office, deprived of all representation in Congress and the other branches of the national government, and robbed of rights which have been hitherto recognized as theirs from the very adoption of the Constitution. They will be degraded to a subject class, ruled by an aristocracy of Christian believers.

This state of things once established, the "appropriate legislation" by which the new policy must be sustained will necessarily involve the proscription and suppression of free thought, free speech, and a free press. Whether intended now or not, oppressive persecution must be the consequence of the adoption of the proposed amendment. All your disclaimers of the intent or wish to persecute are utterly idle. The matter will not be in your hands. Persecution will grow like a cancer in the body politic just so soon as the coveted inequality of religious rights once poisons its blood.

Now I urge you to consider well the temerity of your proposed usurpation of political power. I warn you against the peril of instigating the Christian part of our population to attempt this usurpation. I caution you against the folly of supposing that the majority of the people will finally consent to this subversion of their common liberties. I beg you to count the cost of this agitation before you carry it further. It is a wild and insane delusion to expect that the great body of freedom-lovers will ever submit voluntarily, or can be made to submit by force, to any such outrageous oppression, whether in the name of God or man. I make no threat whatever, but I state a truth fixed as the hills when I say that, before you can carry this measure and trample on the freedom of the people, you will have to wade through seas of blood. Every man who favors it votes to precipitate the most frightful war of modern times; and it is simply preposterous for any of your number to speak of the liberals as "threatening war." You threaten war when you avow a purpose to destroy the equality of religious rights now guaranteed by the Constitution to all American citizens. On the assailant in this struggle be all the responsibility of its results!

In the name of freedom, and humanity, and peace, I appeal to you to recognize the real tendencies of your enterprise, and to abandon it as not only hopeless, but also most dangerous to the tranquillity of the land. If you are thoughtlessly favoring a scheme whose success would be the establishment of a Christian oligarchy on the ruins of this free republic, you will turn away from it with horror when reflection has shown you its true issue. But if you deliberately aim to compass this usurpation of power and the disfranchisement of all but Christian believers, notwithstanding the inevitable calamities involved, you will, if as honest and earnest as I believe you to be, point out to the people the abyss that yawns before their feet. Of this be sure—there are millions of men in America who will never submit to be ruled by an oligarchy, whether Christian or anti-Christian. If I wished to destroy Christianity in this country by unscrupulous means, I should encourage your attempt in every way; for the reaction you will create will open the eyes of millions to the fact that Christianity and freedom are incompatible. But because you are not only Christians, but also fellow-citizens, fellow-men, and brothers, I appeal to you most earnestly to be content with the equal rights you now enjoy before the law, without seeking to destroy the rights of those who are not Christians in belief. I appeal to you to make no further efforts to fan into a flame the dangerous fires of religious bigotry; for the conflagration, once kindled, you will be powerless to control. Rise above the temptation to seek the triumph of your creed by political strife, and trust your cause, as I trust mine, to the power of truth over the human soul.

THE PROTEST SPREADING.

Since our last issue, the following additional lists of signatures to the Counter-Petition have been received:—

From Mr. P. C. Turner, Albany, N. Y., one hundred and twelve names; from Mr. Wm. A. Wall, New Bedford, Mass., twenty names; from Mr. H. S. Runyan, Concord, Ill., thirty-six names; from Mr. L. T. Tufts, Chelsea, Mass., fourteen names; from Mr. T. H. Stewart, Kendallville, Ind., seventy-three names; from Mr. A. Cochran, Franklin, Pa., one hundred and twenty-three names; from Mr. B. S. Wells, Oneida, Ill., eighteen names; from Mr. R. L. Roys, Cromwell, Conn., five names; from Dr. C. Pearson, Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, one hundred names; from Rev. N. M. Mann, Rochester, N. Y., two hundred and sixty names; from Mrs. A. A. Williams, Milwaukee, Wis., twenty-two names; from Mr. Hugo Andriessen, Beaver, Pa., thirty-six names; from Mr. La Roy Sunderland, Quincy, Mass., one hundred and thirty-five names; from Mr. H. E. Parsons, Ashtabula, O., twenty-eight names; from Mr. J. Sedgemoor, Painesville, O., one hundred and thirty-seven names; from Mr. Wm. Hopkins, Fremont, Ind., sixty-five names; from Mr. C. K. Whipple, Boston, Mass., nine names; from Mr. S. A. James, Kittery, Me., sixteen names; from Mr. J. M. Hall, Lagrange, Ind., sixty-three names; from Mr. J. Whitaker, Kerkhonkson, N. Y., nineteen names; from Dr. J. B. Dunton, Waverly, N. Y., seventy-seven names; from Mr. A. Raymond, Havana, O., eighty names (including a number of Catholics); from Mr. Manton Erwin, Columbiana, O., one hundred and ninety-three names (forwarded by Mr. Marius R. Robinson, of Salem, O.); from Mr. Charles Bonsall, Salem, O., one hundred and seventy-eight names; from Mr. I. W. Graffam, New Bedford, Mass., one hundred and twenty-two names; from Mrs. R. T. Townsend, Tipton, Iowa, fifteen names; from Mrs. Lydia A. Bean, Corinna, Me., six names; from Mrs. A. H. Reed, Lowell, Mass., eight names; from Mr. Eugene Hutchinson, Reeds Ferry, N. H., fourteen names; from Mr. Geo. W. Musso, Lynn, Mass., fifty-four names; from Mr. Geo. Kirkville, Columbus, Kan., thirty names; from Mr. E. V. Lapham, Morrison, Ill., thirty-one names; from Mr. Wm. Miller, Lagrange Co., Ind., forty-one names; from Mr. Samuel Smith, Neodesha, Kan., fifty-eight names; from Mr. Jas. W. White, Jersey City, N. J., fifty names; from Mr. Edward L. Crane, Tippecanoe City, O., one hundred and seventy-seven names; from Mr. Samuel Wills, Cuyahoga Falls, N. Y., twenty-nine names; from Mr. Edwin Hunt, Boston, Mass., twenty names; from Mr. Preston Day, Pompey, N. Y., seventy-four names; from Mr. P. Armington, Lawrence, Kan., sixteen names; from Mr. Geo. Santee, Port Clinton, Pa., eighty-nine names; from Mr. Fred. S. Allen, New Bedford, Mass., thirty-one names; from Miss Ella F. Edwards, Cambridgeport, Mass., eighteen names; from Mr. R. K. Price, Sen., Dexter, Me., forty-three names; from Gattiker Bros., Baraboo, Wis., one hundred and thirty names; from Mr. E. Rulor, Three Rivers, Mich., sixteen names; from Mr. Jos. T. White, New York city, twenty-one names; from Mr. Chas. W. Pierce, Philadelphia, two hundred names.

Col. J. O. Martin reports a successful Mass Meeting at Indianapolis, Ind., on the evening of Jan. 28, in opposition to the Christian movement. "The weather," he says, "was intensely cold, thermometer six degrees below zero. Had the weather been favorable, the hall would not have held the people. The one hundred copies of THE INDEX went off like hot cakes, but did not supply the demand." Stirring speeches were made by Rev. S. S. Hunting, Western Secretary of the American Unitarian Association (who should evidently take in hand his refractory subordinate of Cincinnati), and by Col. Martin himself. The latter justly called this movement "a rank treason to the Constitution as was ever hatched in a Southern Secession Convention." According to the Indianapolis Sentinel, "the audience was composed mostly of adherents of the liberal church, with a few Jewish citizens, and was a remarkably intellectual-looking crowd." The meeting had especial significance from the fact that the Mayor of Indianapolis had appended his name to the call for the Cincinnati Convention; and Col. Martin writes he has already over five hundred names on the counter-petition. Too many such meetings cannot be held.

THE JEWEL CONSISTENCY.

All professions and classes of persons do their full share towards proving how rare a "Jewel" consistency is both in thought and in action. Theological and ecclesiastical bodies do not perhaps illustrate its rarity more than do other organizations. Yet, as theological and ecclesiastical bodies profess to aim at absolute truth and rectitude, any violation of consistency in their statements and methods is more glaringly apparent than it is in other cases.

Of ecclesiastical inconsistency I remember no more notable example than one that was furnished by the State Convention of the Methodist denomination recently held in Syracuse, N. Y. The question of reading the Bible as a devotional exercise in the public schools was discussed. The result of the discussion was the passage of a resolution to the effect that the Bible ought to be retained in the public schools. But immediately upon this resolution, another resolution was voted upon and passed, that no money raised by public taxation ought to be appropriated to the support of sectarian schools. These two resolutions, clearly, are antagonistic to each other. The first of them makes the schools sectarian,—not, perhaps, as between one Protestant sect and another, but as between the Catholics and the Protestants, and as between the Protestants and a large body of liberal people who do not believe in reading the Bible as the inspired word of God. So long as the Bible is read in the public schools as a devotional exercise, the schools, to a certain extent, are used to inculcate certain religious views, and to that extent are sectarian. In their first resolution, therefore, the Methodists, by voting for the Bible in the public schools, voted that the public schools should be sectarian; while in their second resolution, they voted that no public money ought to be permitted to be used for sectarian schools! It would be well if they would now inform the public how, if the conditions of both these resolutions were to be acted upon, the public schools would be supported, or how there would be any public schools at all.

The ecclesiastical inconsistency of the Methodists on this particular question was still further illustrated in this same convention, when the fact, well known in the denomination, came to be talked about, that they had just received, by vote and taxation of the city of Syracuse, $100,000 towards the endowment of the University which the denomination is about to establish in that city. So eager, indeed, were they to get this appropriation from the public treasury of Syracuse for their college, that I understand they went to the Legislature at Albany to secure some special legislation for it, there having been some wise provision, either in the constitution or statutes of the State, forbidding towns to appropriate money for such purposes. Perhaps the Methodists will claim that the Syracuse University is not to be sectarian,—by which, however, they will mean that it is to be open to students of all denominations on equal terms, not that its board of Trustees nor its faculty of Professors is to be thus open. When a denomination shows so much zeal in founding a college,—expects, at least, to keep the control of the college when founded; if not, the millennium is nearer at hand than I have been wont to think.

A new invention is coming into use for attaching the separate cars of a train together. Instead of the "loose coupling" that has been in vogue, the improved method holds the cars closely together, and, it is claimed, will prevent the jerk and jar now incident to starting and stopping a train, and very greatly diminish the chances of the horrible accident of "telescoping." It is evident that our ecclesiastical brethren need some improved method for "coupling" their resolutions together. Such "loose coupling" as that shown by the Methodists at Syracuse is ominous. If their train could be started at all under such conditions, one resolution would certainly "telescope" the other before they were far on their journey.

W. J. P.

WORDS AND WORDINESS.

I have spent some minutes in trying to think of a better term than "wordiness" for what I wish to describe; but "wordiness" will do, if it be understood to mean the empty and idle use of words, and not their redundancy merely. To employ more words than are necessary to convey one's meaning is a fault which is pardonable in speakers who have little to say and much time to say it in; but the idle, thoughtless employment of good words is a fault that neither the genius of language nor the genius of thought can forgive. A strict observance of the meaning of language would perhaps do as much as anything to correct errors of intelligence. We have no right to make language a refuge from thought; to palm off phrases in place of sense; to cheat ourselves and our neighbors with loose statements which we cannot justify to reason, and which a moment's thought would prevent our using. If teachers of religion, for example, would think what they mean when they speak such words as Savior, Redeemer, Lord, Master, how many would ever speak them? Unitarianism sins continually after this cuttle-fish fashion,—a fashion that has become so wide spread and inveterate that even the most honest men allow themselves to be betrayed into following it.

The latest example of this common failing, and the one that has provoked this comment, occurs in Dr. Clarke's sermon on Mr. Hepworth's remarkable performance in theological tergiversation. In this more than sufficient treatment of the slightest possible theme, the able man remarks: "Christ's influence is the motive power in human progress. Science, art, literature, are all elevated and vitalized by Christianity, and without it would droop and die." The sentiment is familiar; we have met with it many times before, and it has a fine sound. It seems to mean something too. The words, however, are all indefinite. If science be taken as meaning physical science or metaphysical, physiology or psychology, the results or tendencies of positive research in any direction, the statement is so far from the truth that it speaks the precise opposite of the truth. Christianity, the Christianity of nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand Christians, disavows all sympathy with science, is afraid of it, and does its best to check its advance.

What does Dr. Clarke mean by art? Painting and sculpture? Modern painting and sculpture hardly recognize the existence of Christianity. Here and there a solitary painter like Overbeck or Ittembach produces Madonnas and infant Christs; now and then an obscure sculptor models a head of Jesus; but the genre school of France, the historic and romantic schools of Germany, the landscape schools of England and America, are as unconscious of Christianity as they are of Buddhism, Mohanmedanism or the Fetishism of Ashantee. They take from it neither their subjects nor their motives, neither their ideals nor their aims. Naturalism pure and simple, and humanitarianism equally simple and pure, are the inspiration of modern art, in its æsthetic aspects. Of the useful arts or the decorative arts nothing need be said, for it will not be pretended that institutes of technology or schools of design, or cabinet and furniture warehouses, or wood-carving or ornamental paper-hanging, would drop out of existence with the current theology; that a change in the tone of piety would chill to death the inventive genius that gives birth to the rich designs of plastic beauty.

"Literature" is a term still more indefinite than "art." Certain kinds of literature would droop and die without the vitalizing influence of Christianity; dogmatical literature, for instance; polemical literature; parennetical or pulpit literature, a large department of sentimental literature, pious fictions, wishy-washy poems and hymns, books of languishing devotion. But most of this is not classed under the general name "literature" at all, but is set apart in a place by itself. If we descend to particulars, Dr. Clarke's assertion disappears in vagueness. Modern literature expresses the modern mind, and the live mind of to-day is not consciously and conscientiously "Christian." To specify would be tedious. We wish Dr. Clarke would specify the leading poets, historians, philosophers, essayists, biographers, narrators of travel, dramatists, song-writers, novelists, of any country, who go to Christianity for their ideas or their sentiments. Mr. Dickens' name will occur to him at once, but the bare mention of his name recalls the acrid controversy which raged round this very point. That a similar controversy has not raged round other names is simply due to the circumstance that the claim was never urged in their case. They never were supposed to draw their inspiration from Christianity.

But the Protean phrase, the veritable chameleon of a term, the prismatic, kaleidoscopic word of the sentence above quoted is "Christianity." Until somebody will inform us precisely what that means, we have no right to predicate anything of it. Say "Romanism," and we understand what is signified. Say "Anglicanism," and the sense is plain. Say "Calvinism," or "Lutheranism," or "Methodism," or "Socialianism," and a term is used that has a distinct meaning. But one might as well say "Europe," or "Middle Ages," or "Indo-Germanic Races," or "Antiquity," as say "Christianity." It is as vague as "Positivism," which all the eminent scientific men are defining themselves away from, but which a large-minded public cordially invites them all to accept. The term "Christianity" is grievously overworked by our "Liberal" friends, who find it a convenient cover for their intellectual vagaries. It is convenient; but convenience does not wholly excuse nonsensicalness.

O. B. F.

SOW THE SEED.

The "Impeachment of Christianity," published in the first number of the third volume of THE INDEX, has been electrotyped, and an edition of Ten Thousand Copies will be immediately printed in the form of a cheap tract for gratuitous distribution. It is intended to circulate One Hundred Thousand Copies during the current year. In order to accomplish this purpose, we must rely upon the co-operation of our active sympathizers. Packages of these tracts, containing any desired number of copies, will be mailed to any address on receipt of enough money to defray postage, and whatever additional sums, large or small, the generosity of distributors may prompt them to add. Of course, money will be needed to carry out our intentions; but we urge every one who believes that this tract will do good, and who is willing to distribute copies of it, to send in an order at once, even if unable to donate more than the simple postage and the time required for distribution. Do not hesitate because you cannot give more. We are convinced more than ever by the character and objects of the late Cincinnati convention that such plain speech as this tract contains is greatly needed at the present time. In the name of Christianity, a most dangerous attempt is now making to subvert the religious liberties of the American people; and the mighty magic of that name is still powerful over multitudes even of otherwise liberal minds. Let the world learn that the protest made against Christianity in this age is not made by hatred of goodness and of truth, but rather by a love for these that can no longer be satisfied with shams. He wofully misjudges that tract who thinks it has no higher aim than to "make a sensation." It was meant to tell needed truth so plainly that it must be heard. And it will be heard. All we ask is—give it a chance.

It is but just to acknowledge publicly our obligation to the "Young Men's Christian Association" for stamping and forwarding to THE INDEX Office, in two cases, letters that had been mailed by the senders unstamped. One of these letters contained a very large sum of money in bank bills, which would probably never have been heard from, if sent to the Dead Letter Office at Washington. If the Y. M. C. A. sought only to do good in this practical manner, it might be a great benefit to the world; and though we have not a particle of sympathy with its theological spirit or purposes, we are glad to express our hearty appreciation of all the practical good it does. It is needless to add that more than enough money was remitted to it from this Office to pay the postage on the letters thus forwarded.

We are very glad to print elsewhere a beautiful letter from Rev. Robert Collyer, of Chicago, who seems to have a perfect right to tell the story about the raspberries, when we are informed that, in the burning of his own home during that awful fire last autumn, he forgot to save his own manuscripts and books, but saved all his children's little playthings.

We listen very attentively to what such a man as that has to say about religion.

Profit pleases for an hour. But self-respect pleases forever.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

ANOTHER "STUDY OF CHRISTIANITY."

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

I would like to add one more study of Christianity to the three made by my friend and brother whose sermon you print on the first page of your paper in your number for Jan. 20th. It was so novel and so full of suggestion that I am sure you will be glad to print my account of it, if I can make it at all as interesting as the thing was I want to describe.

We had been drifting rather than travelling through Belgium and Germany last summer, with a little maid for whom we wanted to find the fountain of health. We did not find it; and so, when we got to Lucerne, we said—"going round will not answer; we will see what sitting still will do." Then we went to the "Schwan," the best hotel I ever found anywhere, and settled down. Wandering about the pretty old town, I came across a hand bill in English, setting forth the fact that on the next Sunday divine service would be held in the church of St. Mary, with a sermon by a Free Kirk minister. I made up my mind to go to that service the moment I read the notice; for St. Mary is a Romish church antique and pure, and to hear a sermon there by one of the household of John Knox must be one of the things which come once in a life-time.

I found one of our Chicago ministers at the hotel. A Baptist told him of my "great find," so we agreed to go together. The church, I suppose, may hold three thousand people; the congregation, including the sexton, counted up to nineteen. All the things the Church of Rome lies to were left as they had been the last time mass was celebrated in the building. The preacher's desk stood a little out of line with the altar, over which they had put a sort of cover; otherwise the nest the stout reformer would have barred, if he had been living, that he might get rid of the crows, was entirely as the "scarlet woman" would have had it for her "idolatry." There was a hymn to begin the service in which we all joined, a lesson, a prayer, another hymn, and then a sermon. Subject:—"The Example of Christ."

I expected, of course, to hear a discourse within the well-guarded lines of the Kirk—Presbyterian to the back bone and Scotch at that. I was sure there would be open or covert allusions to the one great enemy of evangelical truth the Scotch Church has fought for three hundred years as a certain quadruped fights the rattle snake. What I did hear was so broad, so inclusive, and so sweet of spirit, that, when the man was through with his service, I went up to him, and said:—"I think to-day I have seen one of the first gleams of the millennium. I have witnessed a Presbyterian service in a Roman Catholic church, and heard a sermon acceptable in every way to a Unitarian minister." On which he shook hands, and the preacher said—"I am very glad to hear it."

One point in particular I treasured of the sermon. The preacher came to speak of miracles. "Now," I said, "he will certainly put his foot in it." He proved that he knew his ground better than I did. "The age of miracles," he said, "some people claim is over this many a hundred years; believe me, dear hearers, that is a mistake. The age of miracles is yet with us, and there is no fading out of its wonders." If you suspect there is, go into the first infirmary for the eye you may light on, and watch what they are doing. There they are restoring sight to the blind, and of the ear they are opening the last path to the soul. They are still making the lame walk, casting out devils, and raising the dead; for not a soul is quickened into a new life in which you do not witness that marvel. And so through the whole tale of what this great example did; those who follow him are doing the same thing, and doing what he did in the spirit in which he wrought is to live a Christ-like life."

There was much more in the sermon of the same large pattern.

"How did you like it?" I said to the Baptist brother as we came away. "Very much indeed," he replied; "it was a capital sermon."

And so many a time since then I have thought of that unique sermon, and how indeed that day there was a new Catholic service in the old Catholic church; and what a grand thing it would be if this could be brought about everywhere. Only one little thing hurt me, and the preacher was not to blame for that. There was one little group rather to itself of more than ordinary devoutness. They also stopped at the "Schwan," and had the next room to ours. They were wonderful at prayer and reading the scriptures night and morning. Only, to hear their tones in both exercises, you would think they were just going to be hung. One day, at the table, there was one dish of raspberries. Our little sick maid watched them as they came round with eager eyes, and they held out wonderfully, for the guests knew these were all we should get that day, so large and fine. There were three or four still between us and the prize, when the raspberries got to our praying neighbors. They never got any further. The sister shut her eyes as if she would ask a new blessing, and took about a third of what was there. The brother took another third, and then dumped the rest into the plate of the young person they had with them. And then the mother of our little invalid drew a long breath, and said in a whisper: "Well, I declare!"

Somewhat after that I altered the membership of our holy Catholic Church. I had an idea that, if the great soul we had been hearing about had sat with us at meat, he would have seen a pair of wistful eyes about four places to his right, and passed the raspberries so far. I felt sure the brave little sermon had missed its mark. Christ was no ensample to what some of our Western people call "then praying members." Rather he was an incubus, a paralysis, an argument for their unchristian greed; and after that, when we heard the old outcries of unworthiness, and the claim to be counted dust, dross, worms, and so on, I said to myself—"I guess you are nearer right than you would like to believe, after all."

Yours,

ROBERT COLLYER.

SPIRITISM AND SPIRITUALISM.

BY REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE.

Mr. Charles Foster, the noted Test Medium, whom we visited a few years since with a good deal of satisfaction, said to us:—"You know all about the inside of Spiritualism, and can have anything out of heaven that you want; it is the outside only of Spiritualism which you need to examine."

That "outside of Spiritualism" we call by the more accurate name of SPiritism. It consists in dealing with spirits; the use of phenomenal manifestations; and cannot properly be called spiritual, because it takes the matter on its material side, by its strictly materialistic aspects. Veracious and legitimate it may be, taken just as it is, as a dealing with material signs and forms, believed to represent spirits, but it cannot fairly pretend to be spiritual. A strict Spiritualism must refer to non-material aspects of the matter,—to spirits not visible or tangible, and to a spirit world embracing this world with influences which are direct upon the inner man, without outer sign.

We have the fullest faith in strict Spiritualism, the nearness to us and influence upon us of a world of spirits, in a purely spiritual manner, by contact, without outward sign, with the inner man. We ascribe special providence and particular guidance, in both of which we have constant and profound faith, to spiritual agencies. But we do not believe that these agencies usually give, even to the mind influenced, any sure mental sign, much less any outward sign. On the contrary, our firm opinion is that looking for even inward signs, or even looking for and depending on the agencies themselves, is a hindrance far more than it is a help, and that those who most feel the guidance, and profit by the providence, of spirits, who never look that way, who always use as best they can their ordinary faculties, and who leave to unseen agencies to work as they will in unseen ways.

The gods hate prophets: in other words, unseen intelligences do not like to be observed in their coming, and to have their work announced to the curious ear or eye of the outward man; which, again, is but another way of saying that unseen influences work most efficiently on minds which have least of the curiosity of mere sense and flesh. It is thought which these influences can best co-operate with, the thinking mind, emancipated from the limitations of outward sense; using sense, but not restrained or held from free thought by it.

While, then, we believe fully in Spiritualism, along with millions who have a like spiritual faith, we do not at all believe in Spiritism, or dealing with spirits through material signs, but consider this about the lowest possible method of faith, just suited to the savage level of culture where we find it to have been universal, and to the production in our day of a very low and narrow sect, and of such monstrosities as Free Love and Mormonism.

The popular Spiritism of this country has a numerical strength of perhaps half a million. An English Spiritist who recently travelled through the country, and made a careful estimate, could count only 600,000. He doubtless included many who would refuse to confess a true Spiritist rule of faith. Judge Edmonds counts 10,000,000, and Mr. Owen 7,500,000. They of course enumerate all who are, in the non-spiritist sense, Spiritists; and very naturally Judge Edmonds thinks that he might well throw in 5,000,000 more, as unconscious or unavowed Spiritists. There is nothing veracious or legitimate in such a count as this. Of true Spiritists, persons who deal with manifestations, the number may be fairly estimated at about half a million in this country.

And no body of believers has a weaker or more uncertain organic life. Its ministry is cheap and vagrant, a sentimental and sensational petticoat affair in very great part, through female trance-speakers, or through men who suggest by look and labors distressing doubts as to the sex of their infirmities. The accredited head of the sect at this moment is a woman, diseased in body and mind almost to insanity, who just now offers herself as the apostle of the most offensive doctrine of Free Love which can be invented. The Mormon delusion, which authentic evidence proves to have had a Spiritist origin, and to be upheld now by Spiritist marvels, alone offers a parallel to the average degradation of organic Spiritism; though in this last, as even in Mormonism, are not yet conscious of the miserable delusion which phenomenal "Spiritualism" really is. Such persons in very great numbers have tried Spiritism and rejected it, becoming Spiritists but refusing to be Spiritists. The real Spiritist superstition is rapidly losing what hold it has had upon respectable minds, and will soon stand just where it belongs, by the side of the other forms of obscure and low human experience, excepting only the very curious and sometimes very useful examples of abnormal condition made to confer exceptional and almost preternatural service.

And this accords with all that history and science teach us of the place of dealing with spirits. Both medicine and mental philosophy advise us to desire a sound mind in a sound body. And the knowledge of savage man furnished by such a work as Tylor's "Primitive Culture," recently published in London, shows that at that low level of culture the Spiritist method has been universal. Disturbance of normal physical conditions is a condition of the Spiritist method. Decided disease commonly favors the method. Savage history attests the same fact, and shows us a vigor and prevalence of the method unknown in even the modern revival of it.

It cannot be, therefore, that Spiritism is to be the method of the future, or is to have any place among respectable methods, save in very exceptional instances. This opinion we give after reading Hon. Robert Dale Owen's new work, "The Debatable Land between This World and the Next," in which he argues for Spiritism as the last and best method of faith, and the perfection of Christian enlightenment. We took up the work with considerable expectation, and used as much pains as possible to find a good case, but to no purpose. An irrepressible disgust grew upon us as we read, and we laid down the volume with the determination never to make another effort to find good in Spiritism. All the good there is, is in the Spiritualism pure and simple which has no necessary connection with Spiritism, and to which Spiritism is far more likely to be a hindrance than a help.

A QUALIFICATION.

Boston, Jan. 19, 1872.

I notice that, in an article on "The Christian Conspiracy," in THE INDEX No. 108, you say:—"But their belief, which is the consistent application of Christian ideas to civil government, shows that Christianity itself is unconstitutional, and can never be adapted to democratic institutions."

I think it is only enforced Christianity that can be properly called unconstitutional.

Voluntary Christianity, as well as voluntary Buddhism or voluntary Atheism, is as constitutional as kicking football.

H. N. S.

[True. But a consistent Christian cannot help taking you for his football; which is unconstitutional.—Ed.]

KEEP ALL TRUTH.

ANN ARBOR, Mich., Jan. 17, 1872.

MR. ABBOT:—

Your ably-handled sheet is, I think, doing much good in opening the eyes of people to the dark side of much that is misnamed "Christianity." It is a strong illustration of what can be said in behalf of principles long considered dangerous and indefensible.

Anarchy in government, crime in society, and laxity in morals have ever been considered by the sects as the legitimate product of free religious ideas; vice and misery, irresponsibility and excess, as synonymous with the theories you hold. That men can dissent from the traditions of their fathers without imperilling society and religion in one common ruin, is now so evident that the most creed-bound might see it, if they would.

Still, while discovering and utilizing much profitable truth, are you not throwing away as worthless much that is still of service in shaping character? Still, while dealing sturdy blows at the cramping dogmas of the churches, the insane discussions of the theological schools, the superstitious prejudice against scientific developments, against educated intelligence, against philosophic research and free religious inquiry,—while proclaiming the utmost freedom of thought and religion, the sacredness of the individual conscience, and the brotherhood of the human race, are you not leaving out of view considerable that is essential not only to Christianity, but to any other system of ethics that aims to improve and perfect human nature? Is not the firm belief in immortality essential to a religion that would have an ever-present influence over the conduct of the vast mass of humanity? The fact that such a belief is embodied in all religions, proves much for its reality and necessity. The philosophers of Rome and the red man of the woods considered it invaluable to keep men straight in this world. The fact that society has numerous preventive and punitive institutions, and that government has numerous laws and regulations, proves that social order could not exist without them. The prospect of retribution, however unimportant, as a motive, it may be to a cultured few who love right for its own sake, is nevertheless a powerful stimulus to the moral sense of the great, unphilosophic majority. Now all must confess that too frequently crime prospers long, and dies in ease, while virtue grovels in misery, and is crushed out in contempt. If there is no future, does not God allow the grossest injustice? Aye, may we not well ask—Is there a God, is there anything! Truly, many actions receive a portion of their rewards or punishments here, while many we have no reason to believe receive a tithe. Will God, at death, annul the eternal laws of compensation, and put a period to influences just born?

D. C. BRANCH.

SUNDAY-SCHOOL SONGS.

The New York Sun chooses the following stanzas from a recent collection of that literature. "Imagine," says the critic, "the flabby souls and vulgar imaginations which children must have who are brought up on such Sunday-school slop as this:"

O boys! be strong in Jesus;
To toil for him is gain;
And Jesus wrought with Joseph
With chisel, saw and plane.

The lines below are for the comfort of cripples:—

The poor cripple has a chance for glory.
As good a chance as you or I;
Christ will listen to his story,
He will hear the cripple's cry.

He always pities poverty,
And scorns not those who have to beg;
His grace for every woe's sufficient—
One can go to Heaven with a wooden leg.

Of these the writer says: "This is indeed consoling, but we are afraid it is not orthodox. Paul says that flesh and blood cannot inherit the Kingdom of Heaven. How then can a wooden substitute for flesh and blood inherit it? We suspect that before the author of the above hymn can make his 'calling and election sure,' he will have to show that one can go to Heaven with a wooden head."—Amer. Newspaper Reporter.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—During Mr. Abbot's absence at the East, the Sunday meetings of the Society will be suspended. They will be resumed February 25.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending February 24.—W. M. Allen, $1; Julius Rosenthal, $2; J. M. Holmes, 20 cts.; W. G. Wilkinson, $7.50; L. C. Bailey, $2; D. E. Wray, $2; Miss A. M. Hale, $2; Chas. B. Miller, $2; W. S. Clark, $2; M. G. Allen, 10 cts.; D. B. Green, $1; H. W. Nichol, $2.25; Ernest Frausberg, $3; F. A. Seelye, $1; Chas. H. Donnell, 20 cts.; Simon King, 25 cts.; John E. Clark, $2; K. C. Miles, 20 cts.; H. L. Ryan, $2; L. L. Thaxter, $2; Asa Horv, $10; Marshall Pierce, $2; M. Livingston, 25 cts.; J. Doran, 10 cts.; Horatio Hyde, $4.50; Henry Lorber Fowler, $2; Horace White, $2; L. F. Osburn, $2; T. M. Lamb, $1; L. K. Lee, 10 cts.; W. Milligan, $2; J. McKachin, 50 cts.; Hugo Anderson, $1; A. S. Carpenter, $2; R. S. Brigham, 25 cts.; Alex. A. B. Bradford, $2; A. Bates, $2; K. Towle, $2; Benj. E. Hopkins, 50 cts.; J. E. Burton, $2.50; Wm. Gil, $1; Mary Shannon, $2; Mary C. Shannon, $2; Anson J. Shannon, $2; J. L. Fisher, $2; C. W. Hays, $1; D. T. Woodbury, $2; Jno. W. Stevenson, 25 cts.; Lyman Rice, $2; L. F. Gardner, 10 cts.; T. L. Harris, $2; J. D. Torrance, 25 cts.; L. Adams, $2; Geo. W. Schell, 25 cts.; W. F. Allen, $2; A. Krow, 50 cts.; T. M. Lamb, $1; Mrs. L. Waterbury, $2; P. P. Field, 50 cts.; R. E. Grimeshaw, $2; Jesse T. Williams, $2; Orin Phelps, $2; Adolph Phelps, $2; Edwin F. Bacon, 25 cts.; Leroy Davis, $1.50; B. Main, 25 cts.; Rev. Z. Masters, $2; Mrs. A. M. Kille, $2; Lewis H. Kahn, $1; James C. Fowbridge, 50 cts.; James S. Moore, $2; Mrs. A. H. Reid, 10 cts.; Geo. H. Stevens, $1; Mrs. H. F. Butterfield, 20 cts.; Moffat Lockman, 50 cts.; Franklin Hall, 10 cts.; Eugene Hutchinson, 10 cts.; J. L. Mansfield, $2; W. A. May, 25 cts.; Jno. F. Fraser, 25 cts.; Jno. C. Rooney, $2; P. Van derwood, $2.50; J. D. Zimmerman, $12.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

RECEIVED.

LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF RELIGION. With a Paper on Buddhist Nihilism, and a Translation of the Dhammapadam or "Path of Virtue." By MAX MUELLER, M. A., Fellow of All Saints College, Oxford, Correspondent of the Institut de France, Author of "Lectures on the Science of Language," "Chips from a German Workshop," etc. New York: CHARLES SCRIBNER AND COMPANY, 1872. 12mo. pp. 300.

MORE CRITICISMS ON DARWIN, AND ADMINISTRATIVE NIHILISM. By T. H. HUXLEY, LL.D., F.R.S., Author of "Lay Sermons," "Man's Place in Nature," "Origin of Species," etc. New York: D. APPLETON AND COMPANY, 549 and 551 Broadway. 1872. pp. 85.

A POSITIVIST PRIMER. Being a Series of Familiar Conversations on the Religion of Humanity. New York: DAVID WESLEY & Co., 7 Warren St., Room 27. 1871. 12mo. pp. 187.

JUNIOR UNMARKED; OR, THOMAS PAINE THE AUTHOR OF THE LETTERS OF JUNIOR, AND THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE. Washington, D. C.: JOHN GRAY & Co., Publishers. 1872. 12mo. pp. 322.

SENTIMENTAL RELIGION. A Sermon by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, preached at Lyric Hall, Jan. 14. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1872.

TWO FLORISS FOR A PEARL. A Novel. By MONTIMER COLLINS, Author of "Marquis and Merchant," etc. With Illustrations. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 549 and 551 Broadway. 1872.

THE RADICAL. Published Monthly. February, 1872. Boston: Office of Publication 25 Bromfield St. $5.00 a Year.

OLD AND NEW. February, 1872. Published Monthly. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 148 Washington St.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW. February, 1872. Rev. JOHN H. MORISON, D. D., Editor. Boston: LEONARD C. BOWLER, Proprietor. No. 8 Beacon St. $5.00 a Year.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. February, 1872. Mrs. M. COLE BLAND, Editor and Proprietor. Indianapolis, Indiana. $1.50 a Year.

MONTHLY SCIENTIST. January 15, 1872. LUCIFER A. SAWYER, Editor and Proprietor. $1.50 a Year.

MONTHLY REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR JANUARY, 1872. Washington: GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE. 1872.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debating character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the system of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution? Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR S. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbath-day superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to incorporate the Evangelical Christian Creed in to the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters, and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 10.—The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, and Answered from a Bible standpoint, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GARRIGUE, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE!

BOOK BUYERS who wish the LIVE BOOKS OF THE DAY can have their orders filled promptly by mail, post-paid, by sending the Publisher's price to

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Bookseller and Publisher,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE WORKS of Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Tyndall, Proctor, Frode, Emerson, Max Mueller, Lecky, M. D. Conway, John Wiles, James Freeman Clarke, Robert Collier, Robt. Dale Owen, and all of the POPULAR BOOKS OF THE DAY, constantly on hand.

PRICE LISTS AND CATALOGUES sent upon application. Correspondence and inquiries solicited.

ANY BOOK PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED STATES

Sent post-paid on receipt of Price. Address

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Bookseller, Toledo, O.

"A Success Every Time."

MERRY'S MUSEUM, FOR YOUNG PEOPLE!

The Gem of all Juvenile Magazines.

—Index, Waterbury, Conn.
Terms $1.50 a year with a fine Steel Engraving free to every subscriber.

This Magazine contains more good reading for the price than any other one of its class.

—Eagle, Union City, Ind.

A specimen number of "MERRY'S MUSEUM" with a full description of the premium engraving will be sent FREE to any address.

It is nicely illustrated and occupies a field truly its own. There is a sprightliness about it that is exceedingly charming.

—Jacksonville Independent.

Subscribe now for 1879 and get the November and December numbers of this year free.

Always welcome to the older members of the family as well as hailed with joy by the young ones.

—The Occident, San Francisco, Cal.

AGENTS WANTED! Great inducements! Send for terms.

HORACE B. FULLER, Publisher,
101-11125w
14 Broadfield Street, Boston.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

First Series, No. 1 to 20.

Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and needful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
24. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love: Mercy! God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others": showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicalists" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-ained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children; did God ever lose, can he lose, his children?
35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader: a method of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

EITHER SERIES 80 CENTS; BOTH 50 CENTS.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE
[89-117] 19 Pinckney St., Boston.

Lake Shore & Mich. Southern R. R. 1872.

ON and after Sunday, Jan. 14th, 1872, Passenger Trains will leave Toledo daily (Sundays excepted) as follows (Cleveland time):

CLEVELAND & TOLEDO DIVISION.

LEAVE TOLEDO.

8:00 A. M. Atlantic Express East, daily, arrives at Cleveland at 7:25 A. M.
6:50 A. M. Day Express will stop at Elmore, Fremont, Clyde, Bellevue, Monroeville, Norwalk, Townsend, Wakeman, Oberlin, Elyria and Berea, arrives at Cleveland at 10:50 A. M.
10:55 A. M. Cincinnati Express, stopping at all stations, reaches Cleveland at 3:45 P. M.
6:30 P. M. Special N. Y. Express, will stop at Fremont, Clyde, Monroeville, Norwalk and Elyria, arrives at Cleveland at 10:15 P. M. Sleeping cars to Buffalo and Rochester.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

10:40 and 10:55 A. M., and 7:40 and 11:00 P. M.

MICHIGAN SOUTHERN DIVISION.

TRAINS DEPART.

MAIN LINE—8:15 A. M., Mail; 11:15 A. M. Special Chicago Express; 3:45 P. M., Coldwater Accommodation; 8:00 P. M., Night Express.
AIR LINE—11:05 A. M., Accommodation; 11:30 P. M. Pacific Express.
DETROIT—6:00, 11:30 A. M., 8:30 and 8:00 P. M.
JACKSON—11:35 A. M., and 8:00 P. M.
KALAMAZOO AND GRAND RAPIDS—11:15 A. M., and 8:00 P. M.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

MAIN LINE—6:30 and 10:35 A. M., and 5:40 & 6:20 P. M.
AIR LINE—9:50 A. M., and 5:35 P. M.
DETROIT—10:40 and 12:01 A. M., and 6:08 and 9:00 P. M.
JACKSON—10:35 A. M., and 5:50 P. M.
COLDWATER ACCOMMODATION—10:35 A. M.

CHAS. F. HATCH, Gen'l Supr.

Cleveland, Ohio. [9017]
S. H. WARING, Ticket Agent, Toledo, O.

St. Louis, Quincy, Hannibal, Keokuk, Toledo, Wabash & Western R. R.

PULLMAN PALACE SLEEPING CARS!

THE Toledo, Wabash & Western Railway Co., having recently extended its line of Railway to the City of Saint Louis, will commence running all its regular passenger trains through to that city on and after the 14th day of May, 1871. The day trains will be equipped with new and elegant passenger coaches, and all night trains with the much celebrated and popular Pullman Palace Sleeping Coaches.

	Special Thro' Express.	Pacific Express.
Leave Toledo.....	11:30 A. M.	11:15 P. M.
Ar. Ft. Wayne.....	8:00 P. M.	8:30 A. M.
" Lafayette.....	7:40 "	8:30 "
" Danville.....	10:05 "	11:50 "
" Springfield.....	8:25 A. M.	4:10 P. M.
" Quincy.....	8:45 "	9:25 "
" Keokuk.....	9:50 "	10:45 "
" St. Louis.....	7:00 "	7:15 "

Trains arrive from the West at 2:15 A. M., 8:40 P. M., and 5:00 P. M.

GEO. H. BURNOWS,

Gen'l Superintendant.

JOHN U. PARSONS,
Gen'l Ticket Agent. [9017]

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO OFFICE NO. 90, ST. CLAIR ST.
NEW YORK OFFICE NO. 22, VESSEY ST.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause to represent to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 75 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

LOCAL AGENTS.

HENRY H. RICHARDSON & Co., 32 Vesey St., New York.
J. H. HALLWELL, 92 Federal St., Boston.
PARKER PILLSBURY, Salem, Ohio.

GENERAL AGENTS.

A. K. BUTTS, New York City.
H. L. GREEN, Syracuse, N. Y.

Any person, acting as an agent for THE INDEX, may forward the names of NEW SUBSCRIBERS and retain Twenty per cent. of their SUBSCRIPTIONS.

All Letters and Communications to be addressed to
THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, O.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MOORE, 25 Bromfield Street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Wiles, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Deaton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1866, 1869, and 1870 (at 35 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORKS OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (30 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's Essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (30 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER, Secretary.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly exponent of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 8) will be sent postpaid on receipt of fifty cents. These include "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham, and other equally valuable Tracts.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 17, 1872.

WHOLE NO. 112.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELDERWOOD ARNOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WRIGHTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOTREY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATEMAN, Business Agent.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio."

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES

FOR 1872.

POLITICAL ECONOMY A NECESSARY STUDY FOR THE MOST PERFECT REALIZATION OF MORAL WELFARE.

BY EDWARD ATKINSON.

[Fifth Lecture in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, February 4, 1872.]

Had the list of lectures of which this is one been seen by me before the invitation of the committee had been accepted, this lecture might not have been given; yet I do not regret my acceptance, as I think it would be far better if the functions of the men of affairs and the men of thought were not so widely separated as they are. I trust that what I have to say will not be marked by too glaring a contrast with what you are accustomed to hear in this hall. It is even an injury to a business man in the estimation of some of his fellows to attempt an exposition of principles, that is, to propound a theory; he is at once spoken of by so-called practical men as a theorist and therefore, to be distrusted, in his judgment. Yet, as has been well said by another, these practical men most abound in theories and have one ready to fit every contingency.

The true difference between them and those whom they stigmatize as pure theorists is that they are simply empirical, not basing their own theories upon any general principle or upon any wide observation of facts.

To propound a true theory in regard to the affairs of men is but to attempt to formulate the abstract or general principles upon which men should act, and to combine in a general statement or rule the result of accurate observation. There may, of course, be true and false theories; and false theories of political economy have been among the most potent causes of the ruin both of men and of nations.

The false theory of political economy which once controlled nearly all nations was that the precious metals constituted the only true wealth, and that in all commerce what one nation gained another must lose. It may seem to you who do not closely observe the habits of thought among business men, that these old errors were long since controverted, and have ceased to exert any influence, but you could not mingle for a single day, with the so-called practical men of our own city, without perceiving that while disclaiming any and all theories, and believing most earnestly that they act only from the dictates of experience and of absolute knowledge, they are, many of them, yet under the control of the most pernicious of all theories, in regard to the precious metals and to commerce, and only fail in producing disastrous results because the common sense of the mass of the people has gone beyond them, and checks their mischief before it has worked out its complete results. This gradual development of common sense cannot fail to be observed in all these economic questions; were it not for this, one might despair. We may hope that some of the fallacies in regard to trade, such as the dogma of protection, which now cause an unjust distribution of wealth, will some time disappear as the belief in witchcraft did, simply because they will become as absurd and will need no argument for their refutation.

It is generally assumed that these old errors entirely disappeared when Adam Smith refuted them and laid down the fundamental principles of a science, and this is so far true that it has been alleged that next to the Bible no book ever printed has exerted so beneficent an influence among men as Adam Smith's "Wealth of Nations."

It may not be said that political economy has yet been established and perfected as an exact science, and it is even now held that many of the problems which are treated under its name can never be brought within the domain of an exact science, it being claimed that these problems depend too much upon the varying influence of human passion and the human will. I cannot see why the same exception should not be taken to the science of jurisprudence, and I cannot doubt that hereafter certain general principles completely controlling the production and distribution of wealth, will be evolved and that political economy will reach the full authority of an inductive science based upon a sufficient observation of facts. While this may not yet be admitted as accomplished, it must be claimed that certain elements of a science have been discovered, and especially need attention and application to affairs in this country at this time.

In proof of this, it only needs to advert to a few of the events in recent history to prove how potent for evil have been errors in regard to the questions which lie within this domain—errors which are now being repeated by us. In our own history the causes of the revolution were, many of them, questions of taxation; a little later came the orders in council and the embargo; and yet later the question of the fisheries—all questions of political economy. At this time the Commune and the International, the labor question and the eight-hour law, are but problems in political economy, for the solution of which a general law must sooner or later be found, which, when found, will constitute a science and be accepted by all; and no rhetorical statements of the hardships of those who perform the drudgery of the world will in any manner hasten this solution, although they may hinder it.

Let us attempt to define the limits of this possible science. It relates to the production and distribution of wealth—of wealth, not in the limited sense in which this word is commonly used, as simply a name for the large accumulations of a few persons; but of wealth in the sense of subsistence and material comfort for the whole people—in the sense of the common weal, welfare or wealth of each and all.

If it shall be said that the department of thought which relates to such material and ignoble things as the daily supply of beef and bread, of clothing and shelter is but a "potato gospel" not worthy the attention of men of high purpose, our rejoinder is, that the potato gospel must precede the spiritual, and that it is of little use to preach to or to attempt much instruction either moral or intellectual for those who have not sufficient food or shelter, or who are arduously engaged the livelong day in the effort to gain them; and we also reply that the very thought itself of those who may regard our work with distaste; the very process of intellection carried on by one of the ganglia of their brains is but another material process—another movement of particles—another waste and supply of what we call matter. We claim that we who think cotton and cloth, food and fuel, are engaged in the same function as they whose thought is not so material, and that we are as needful as they to true harmony and the full realization of a higher life. Their thoughts are powers in the land and ideas may be the only reality, but unless some men give themselves up with all their force to building railroads, opening mines, constructing machinery and operating the very printing presses by which these potent ideas are made to take a visible form, these very thoughts might fall as dead and be as quickly lost as though they had been spoken in the stone age or among the Bushmen. The scholar who thinks in the crowd and is of it—the preacher who knows the affairs of daily life—these are the true men; not those who separate themselves and ignore or affect to despise the material interests of the world. Sometimes I think it would be wholesome if the laity could preach honestly and frankly to the clergy. We are members one of another, and while some of us are engaged in callings that partake of drudgery, and where the dollar influence is immediately before us and not simply one step removed, others must do the work of thinker, preacher and teacher; but we are both the fulcrum on which their lever rests and the power which they would move by it. By ~~us~~ I mean the mass of men engaged in the work of material production, and who constitute the great mass of humanity. Is there no law or science for our function? Are we only to be guided by chance or simple expediency with no sure principles by which to test our action?

That such is the common idea, comes, I think, from the false estimate of material wealth which pervades the preaching—I will not call it the religion, of the day. Is it not because the idea is so wide-spread that the pursuit of wealth cannot be the pursuit of welfare, that we hear so much depreciation of the things of this world and so much denunciation of money as the root of all evil? The want of money and of that which money can purchase is the root of far more evil than its possession, and the pursuit of that which money stands for is the most potent and beneficent motor of civilization. No preacher can ignore this truth without implanting precepts which the necessary practice of his hearers will lead them to neglect and hence will come,—aye, has come,—the marked separation between religion and life. If the daily pursuit of wealth in which all engage,—for wealth is but a comparative term,—is stigmatized as a special snare, inconsistent with true spiritual welfare, then men will be only more or less hypocrites, and, having engaged in a calling for which they are more or less obliged to excuse themselves on Sundays, they will never learn that through them also the great creator and controller works for good ends; and they will also never learn that self-interest need not be selfishness. Now, to each individual it imports much what insight he has into the nature of his function in the world. I think no true man can ever have become possessed of even a moderate competence without sometimes feeling almost a sense of humiliation because he is among those who have, when there are so many who have not; and many a one must have felt that he would be more of a man if he could divest himself of his wealth and wrestle unaided by it with the world, to make and maintain his own position in it. Hence it imports much to him that he should know, not guess, that it is more needful that capital should be accumulated than that aims should be given; that possession and ~~use~~ are far more effective in removing want than private giving or public bounty; that however large his fortune seems to be, he himself gets only his board and clothing out of it. All else that he accumulates is of necessity a part of the common stock, and is lost or wasted even to him unless so kept in motion as to do a service to others. I intend not to defend the purely selfish, yet all things work together for good, and even the crowded shelter of the worst tenement-house, built and leased by the most pernicious man of our city, may give cover and keep in life those who would once have died of misery and want even for need of that poor shelter. How to give better shelter and more food, not in charity or under the force of statute-law, but with just compensation to those who furnish both; how to compel even greed and grasping covetousness to work toward the supply,—not of miserable hovels and insufficient subsistence, but of ample homes and abundant food at low cost to the mass of the community; how to make short hours of labor the rule because more profitable to ~~both~~ laborer and capitalist; are problems which a right understanding of political economy shall surely solve, and therefore is its study a condition of moral welfare.

To accomplish these ends is but to work out the true law of distribution which, when discovered, will become a part of the common law needing no statute provision, so sure and obvious will be its fitness to human need. It will surely not make the rich richer and the poor poorer than either deserve to be, as some of our statutes now do. We all remember when chaffering was the rule in all small or retail buying, and every purchaser was more or less cheated, and every retailer failed occasionally. What was the one-price system but the establishment of a rule in political economy, by which each customer is well served and the retailers prosper and grow rich? This was one of the simple problems, but it took a long time to reach it. I suppose it was once a somewhat difficult problem to decide that two and two make four, and not five, but this was before Adam fell, in that Paradise which is preached about as if men must look backward and not forward for the ideal of life.

In the solution of the question between labor and capital which is assuming such portentous dimensions abroad, it will not suffice to defend the rich man because he gives freely of his abundance, or because his large expenditures yield much employment; neither will it suffice for the rich man to ignore the question as one raised by those who wish to enjoy leisure without themselves working for it; but possession in the abstract, of every kind of property including land, must be justified not only to the instinct but to the reason even of the unlearned and of those who have not. The man whose life is given only to vast accumulation must be justified and no effort made to interfere with his full liberty of choice in his pursuit, so that he does injustice to no one. This is one of the phases of our study. Another is, how to let the distribution of that same great estate effect itself, either through the wisdom or the folly of those who inherit it; without such undue interference by statutes as to cause the property which, in its accumulation, is a gain to the common stock to become an evil in its result. It is a question whether trustee settlements may not sometime be done away with, except for the physically or mentally incompetent, and whether liberty to dissipate wealth is not as necessary to the general welfare as liberty to accumulate and maintain it.

"The tools to those who can use them" is a true saying; and when the income of a great fortune is in the hands of one who misuses it in vice and luxury or who is a mere drone, but can not spend the principal because it is in trust, the tools are protected by statute in the hands of him who misuses them. That each man should work out his own salvation in fear and trembling may be as necessary in the material as in the spiritual world.

What constitutes the misuse rather than the use of land is another problem in our science which England must soon solve and which may sometime, though at a far distant day, press upon us. And, although we now ask for freedom from meddlesome statutes and deplore the constant attempts which are made to prescribe by statute the use which one may make of his time, his labor and his product, we by no means deny the right of legislation for the restraint of abuse, whether it be in regard to persons or things. And political economy may decide that it is an abuse of land to withhold it from cultivation for private enjoyment under any plea of ownership.

It is then fit that the laws which regulate the production and distribution of those material things that constitute wealth, without which existence and thought would be impossible, should be sought in the great harmony of the universe.

Suffering is ordained by him who created us for the training of our spiritual nature, but there is too great a tendency to confound with this necessary and fated trial of the spirit, that over arduous struggle for life, and for material subsistence, which is now the common rule, and to consider excessive efforts or labor as our necessary share of a primal curse; when we say our share we generally mean our neighbor's. We instinctively seek to avoid the struggle and to ward off our own share of the primal curse from our children, and as the world progresses we more and more succeed, yet no one seems to realize that the primal curse of digging and delving is being lifted by intelligence and invention, and not by conversion to any creed or in any large measure by statute provisions. I think the millennium of the political economist is as sure of fulfillment as any other, and it will come when through invention there is such sure abundance and such equitable distribution as to give all enough; and though this abundance does not in itself constitute moral welfare, it is safe to say that in its absence no general moral welfare can exist.

That the Creator of the universe can have placed men upon the earth to be swept away by war, pestilence and famine, for all time; that he has established a law for the increase of men at a rate more rapid than the possible increase of subsistence is to my mind an utterly atheistic and abhorrent doctrine on simple a priori grounds. Such a doctrine implies that he has ordained the permanent existence of pauperism and consequently of vice upon the earth, in which case the fatalistic philosophy of Islam would be far more reasonable than the belief in progress of the truly religious man. No! life shall not always be a mere struggle for existence to the man, as it is now.

If this alleged law, formulated by an eminently thoughtful and good man and now held in an unacknowledged manner by the mass of men, is not true, it follows that there must be a law relating to the production and distribution of wealth which shall cause war to cease; which shall abate the famines which even to-day devastate nations, and which shall remove from so-called civilized communities that pauperism which is the deadly poison and disgrace of our day, and from which even our own cities are not free. This law will be one under which men, constituted even as they are, shall of necessity conduct their affairs in such manner that while equal distribution shall be as distant as now, yet equity shall so prevail that all shall have enough and none, save the sick and the absolutely incompetent shall need aid in charity.

Can this be done by special association; by special statute; by special ordinance? Consider only how utterly any attempt to subsidize this one city would fail if the attempt were made to provide for all its needs by statute provisions and regulations. It needs no argument when we affirm that each individual can procure his own supply of food, fuel and clothing in a far better and surer manner than the town or city corporation could supply them all. No organization could provide by special rules for the daily distribution that goes on through our shops and warehouses, and in our markets; imperfect as our organization may even now seem to be in preventing waste, although our warehouses seem to be each year more costly and luxurious—our plate-glass windows more extravagant and middle men more numerous, yet each generation sees the cost of distribution lessened and a less proportion of the annual product absorbed in the movement of the remainder. The end to be sought is that production and consumption shall come nearer each other and that friction between them shall be eliminated. The competition of trade tends to narrow the gap between producer and consumer and our apparently extravagant methods are intended to and on the whole do abate friction. Merchants and middlemen are paid by the community for removing, not for creating obstacles. They are now paid in part for overcoming the artificial obstacles created by law under the name of custom houses and legal-tenders. If all this appears to be a mere repetition of truisms admitted by all, apply these ideas to the attempts made under usury laws still existing in most of the States, to protective tariffs and to laws limiting the right of the laborer and his employer to make contracts on their own terms, mutually agreed upon; and ask yourself if these are not attempts at statute regulation in the matter of production.

If the attempt of the city to regulate the supply of coal, salt, fish, potatoes, lumber and clothing, would so obviously fail, surely causing a few to have too much, and perhaps many to suffer want; how can the attempt of the larger corporation, called nation, to regulate and control the supply of the same things avoid failing even more utterly? Yet this is what is attempted in the forming of a tax law known as a tariff.

If the interference of a city would cause an inequitable distribution, giving some a surplus and causing others to suffer—making the rich richer and the poor poorer—may not the same result be expected even in a greater degree when the nation attempts it? If Massachusetts were a nation by itself and under the plea of caring for her own farmers and manufacturers, her legislature should attempt to dictate whose eggs the citizens of Boston should buy; what beef should be roasted on Sunday; what potatoes should be baked for breakfast, and that home-made pest should be burned instead of Pennsylvania anthracite. I think it does not need much sagacity to perceive that Boston would not thrive, yet this is what the intelligent and excellent people of Boston attempt to do through their Representatives in Congress, and it is not to be wondered at that those who support the attempt deny the existence of any science in regard to the production and distribution of wealth. The letters of the alphabet of wealth are eggs, fish, iron, wool, salt, beef and potatoes. This is a mere potato gospel that I preach.

If the attempt of a city to prescribe the method of subsistence of its people would surely lead to corruption and sap the very foundation of justice and morality, can any other result be looked for from similar attempts on the part of the nation? Can we wonder at corruption or at the speculation and frauds which mark our day? The responsibility for the disgrace of such investigations as that now going on in regard to the New York Custom House, is upon those who promote the enactment of the statutes which have made the frauds possible. And even the greater crimes of the day, the public purchase of judges, the theft of millions of corporate property and the career of such bad men as those whose names now fill our papers, can be traced directly to the continued use of base money which is not an honest or true standard of value. Long after every pretext of necessity for such use has ceased—when our standard of value is a lie—its use must surely lead to fraud. When the United States as a nation say they will pay dollars to the bearers of their promise and refuse to pay them, they set the example of fraud and falsehood to all their citizens. Is there no call for an attempt to establish a science when bad laws under which it is attempted to regulate the production and distribution of wealth are making sinners faster than the preachers can convert them into saints?

Some of these laws may cause a greater apparent accumulation of property, commonly called wealth. The census may show that we count more dollars; it may be said that we are richer; but is that the end? Surely not. The accumulation of capital fairly earned is necessary, just and right; but it is only a means. In common estimation a great exhibit of capital is considered sure evidence of prosperity; this is far from true. Every great invention destroys capital previously accumulated at great cost. When we learn how to burn water, only think how much property will be destroyed in mines and railroads.

I suppose the true end of all this work we do as diggers and delvers—as merchants and manufacturers—the true object of all this production and distribution of wealth is the accumulation, not of capital, but of manhood, and when men shall have obtained that sure control over the forces of nature as shall make each year's subsistence certain and ample, even the two or three years' product saved which now constitutes all our accumulated capital, will not be needed. Then there may be neither rich nor poor. Invention takes the place of capital and reduces its proportion to production. Invention implies intelligence and the substitution of brain for muscle. Intelligence implies manhood. The limit to the power of the tyrant capital which the communist and the labor-reformer so blindly seek to compass by force of law, shall surely come, but it shall come through freedom and intelligence, and by competition constantly forcing out of existence the costly processes for the use of which men pay the capitalist.

It appears to be the ordinance of the Creator and Controller that the Ego, the Will, the Spirit, the Soul, or by whatsoever imperfect name we attempt to define that immaterial essence which we know to be THE MAN, shall arrive at consciousness of itself and of its powers mainly through an effort to supply material wants and appetites. So far as I can comprehend the object of life in this world, this is its one purpose, the development of the individual, and all the customs and ordinances of society—all rules and all the provisions for the accumulation and protection of property—fall, in so far as they are not formed with a view to this end. In so far as statute provisions provide for the support of men by other means than their own skill and labor, they do harm to those whom they seem to aid. Protected infant manufactures always remain infant. The possession of property, commonly called wealth, and spoken of as the standard of a man's worth (thereby giving evidence of the corruption of our language), fails most ignobly unless it becomes the opportunity for broader and more effective work; and partly fails, even when made the means of alms-giving more than the means of removing causes of want. The accumulation of capital is necessary to the community exactly so far as its owners use it in such a manner as to increase general abundance; and as it can only secure an income by rendering some service to those who pay for its use, it is as important to those who have not as to those who have that capital should exist.

But as the prime motive for such accumulation is the self-interest of an individual the pursuit of wealth has become invested with a certain selfish aspect, as if what one gained and saved another must necessarily lose. This view of the subject has been the controlling one, especially in regard to the accumulation of wealth by different nations having dealings with each other. Hence there has been a prejudice against the study of political economy as being a selfish pursuit—a question of mere accumulation unworthy the attention of men capable of higher thought.

But it seems to me that since political economy claims to prove that the free and unrestricted pursuit of wealth, governed only by laws for the maintenance of justice and equity in our dealings, ensures to the benefit and welfare even of the poorest in the land, such a claim should challenge the attention even of those whose sole purpose is to promote moral welfare.

Until a very recent period it has been held by most of the legislators, of what are called civilized countries, that the material prosperity of one nation is inconsistent with that of another; and next to religious dogmas, this error has been the greatest cause of war and misery upon the earth. To you who are here it may seem a work of utter superfluity to make this statement at this time, and you may say it also is a mere commonplace truism. But let me tell you, there are more statutes upon our national law books to-day for the regulation of trade, based upon this pernicious error more than of any other kind; and public opinion is more controlled by it than by any other view of the matter if the acts of our members of Congress are to be taken as the exponents of the opinions of the people.

I have heard a Senator of Massachusetts (not Senator Sumner), gravely defend the repeal of the Reciprocity treaty with Canada, upon the ground that because Canada sold us some $4,000,000 worth of goods in a year more than she bought of us, she impoverished us to that extent, and his vote based upon such gross ignorance has since increased the cost of subsistence, and therefore the pauperism and vice in this city of Boston. His vote has deprived the poor of food and shelter. He tries to restore these needs by advocating an eight-hour law.

I have heard a Member of Congress from this city affirm that the value of the coined dollar was created by the stamp of the mint of the United States upon it; and his vote, as it may happen to fall, may give us again an honest and true measure of value, or maintain yet longer in use the thief, called the greenback, to pick the pockets of the poor, and cheat the laborer out of the fruits of his toil. His vote on that issue may be the remote and hidden cause of fraud and violence such as we have lately witnessed.

I have heard rich and honorable merchant cite the alleged increase of pauperism in Great Britain since our present tariff was passed as a proof of our increased prosperity under it; it matters not that he was wrong in his statement of facts as well as in his principles; by his influence and that of his coadjutors, I believe it can be proved that the poor of our own city have found it more difficult to clothe themselves in comfort during the last few years. And yet other most sincere and benevolent men, as honest as any there are among us, would frame all our trade laws upon the ground that Great Britain is our natural enemy. Can there be a more abhorrent doctrine than this? But this is not singular. The writer whose claim has been most widely asserted to be the only great political economist of our country,—whose opinions now control the policy of the state called the key-stone of our nation; I mean Henry C. Carey, has been led by the necessary logic of his system to affirm that a ten years' war with England would do more to promote the prosperity of this country than anything that could happen. When such a conclusion fails to challenge study, we may only rely upon common sense,—and thank God we can rely upon that,—to pronounce such a conclusion most pernicious and damnable; but it is at the same time dangerous to peace and welfare.

But these are mere acts of individuals,—let us consider a single historic instance of the injury done by an economic error and trace its effect to our own time—let us see if it is not to-day a cause of want in our city, and a possible cause of war to our country.

In the time of Cromwell, the Chief Justice of England and another were sent to Holland to promote a union of that country with England, but instead of being welcomed, they were mobbed in the streets of Amsterdam as regicides. The Chief Justice, incensed at this treatment, returned home and appealed to the prejudices of the English, alleging that the existence of Dutch commerce, then covering every sea, was inconsistent with the prosperity of England. By such arguments—he caused the first effective navigation act to be passed, whereby it was provided the commerce with England and her colonies should be conducted only in English ships. From this act grew directly two wars with Holland, and one with France, and I think it was during the latter that the debt of Great Britain first took a funded or permanent form. How much that debt has since been increased in the conduct of wars maintained simply from commercial jealousy, the student of history must decide, but I think the most limited study when undertaken as an investigation of causes, and not a mere memorizing of dry facts, will prove that matters lying within the domain of political economy have had more to do with modern wars than any others.

Now, can it be said that we have made much progress in intelligence or that our common school education is a great success when we tolerate upon our statute book, navigation acts modeled after those very acts passed in the time of Cromwell? With what effect? To say nothing of the malign effect upon the very commerce they are intended to foster and maintain, the existence of these acts and of others of like character constitute the barrier to the ratification by Canada of the late treaty between this country and Great Britain. And the existence of these acts and of a tariff on fish, coal, and potatoes are to-day possible reasons for preventing legislation to carry the provisions of that treaty into effect. The ratification of that treaty is one of the most essential measures for the moral welfare of the world, for it marks the first step in the substitution of arbitration for war. At the same time, the existence of these acts gives the opportunity for the unscrupulous demagogues of our own land to trade upon prejudice and ignorance in order to maintain themselves in place and power. Instead of abating useless taxes, the member for Essex Co. proposes to continue to deprive the people of New England of fish, and to prevent the legislation needed for the completion of the English treaty.

Like causes produce like effects. The navigation acts of Cromwell failed to build up the commerce of England; not until they were all repealed at a recent date did she become truly the mistress of the seas; while Dutch commerce, so long as it was free and untrammelled thrived apace. Our navigation acts live and our commerce dies,—and our highest fiscal officer asks you to add yet more to the onerous taxes which you now pay in order that it may be maintained by a bounty. It is not surprising that he is counted among those who do not believe there is any science of political economy.

When a few earnest men endeavor to call attention to these bad acts that mark our attachment to the semi-barbarous ignorance of our progenitors, they are denounced as the emissaries of our "natural enemy" Great Britain. What sort of Christianity is this, that proclaims aloud on the Sabbath day that God has made of one blood all the nations of the earth and on the Exchange maintains a cause of war, by denouncing our nearest kin as our natural enemies? If a Messiah were to come now I think he would surely turn such money-changers out of his temple. Is it anything but a sham that thus divorces religion and life, and fails to seek in the daily relations of men the great law of mutuality of service which is the divine harmony of God and the fundamental truth of political economy.

When we affirm that the present status is not right we are referred to the evidences of great accumulated property that lie all around us as if this was a complete justification. I do not intend to attempt to prove that there is any overwhelming amount of poverty among us, or that any man or woman in good health need to suffer if they choose to work,—but that it is not enough to prove genuine prosperity. It is as true now as in Goldsmith's day that "Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,

Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

Bad statutes may make men decay even if they inflict no actual privation. There is a certain aggregate annual product; a certain quantity of food, fuel, and of the materials which constitute subsistence and the addition to capital in each year. This quantity is not a matter of chance but is in exact proportion to the intelligence which may be given in that year to directing the forces of nature to the use of man. Of this aggregate it is believed that about nine-tenths are consumed in each year, and one-tenth constitutes the fund for the maintenance and increase of capital. This aggregate is measured by a statement in dollars, and if the milk, butter and cheese which we consume, constitutes one-sixteenth part of our subsistence, that is to say, if of the annual expenditures of food, fuel, clothing, and material which enter into the cost of our living and of our construction of houses, mills, railroads, and the like, one-sixteenth part consists of milk, butter and cheese, then the annual product is $8,000,000,000 a year in value. If it is a twelfth, our aggregate product is $9,600,000,000 in value, the annual product of milk, butter and cheese, being well established at about $500,000,000. The welfare of the community depends upon the just distribution of this vast aggregate and it is the distribution of it which constitutes commerce. Can this aggregate, not of money, but of consumable commodities be increased by legislation? The answer is obvious, it cannot be as it is only the result of the labor or effort of each person, directed to the movement of natural forces into a course which they would not have taken except for the action of the human will upon them. Can legislators direct this exertion of the human will which is not a process but a power more intelligently and by means of statutes whose only possible action is by force, than the individuals whose individuality as men, consists in the possession of this subtle essence called will; and whose manhood or development consists in learning to use it for themselves? The advocates of despotism and of slavery, have held that this was the function of Government, and they have been condemned. Those who demand liberty, ask that the law shall not restrict the individual will or action in its effort for subsistence, except in preventing injustice.

If then it cannot rightfully be attempted to control the human will in its effort to increase production and obtain abundance, what is the function of statutes in regard to distribution, or exchange, by means of which abundance is diffused, and each man renders service to his neighbor?

Its first function now fully admitted, is to establish the exact standard of length and weight, and to enact that any bargain made between individuals in pounds, yards or square feet, or in bushels, or quarts, shall mean the same thing to both; it says to each individual, you may or may not exchange a quantity of cloth for a quantity of wheat, at the option of any two of your number; but if you do the terms indicating surface and bulk, which you respectively use shall mean the same thing to both. But as time went on and direct barter became impracticable a new term became necessary, namely price, and the use of money also became necessary. Is not the same quality needed in money, as in weight or measure, viz. uniformity—this quality of uniformity of estimation or valuation was found in the so called precious metals, and they came into use as money. The sole function of Government is to stamp its mint mark upon equal quantities of gold and silver. It is as well decided as any principle in the physical sciences that to debase the coin, is to steal the results of labor,—to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. Thus far at least has the science of political economy become entitled to claim the authority of sufficient observation of facts for the establishment of rules. Is this principle regarded at this time in this country? Is our measure of value a just and honest one by which this enormous aggregate, possibly eight thousand millions in value, is exchanged? Is it uniform, or does it fluctuate from day to day? You all know. It matters not that the fluctuations are now small, the greatest fortunes are made on little margins—and the fortunes made on the fluctuations of the currency are made by those who have not earned them; are gained by the few at the loss of the many; not because the few have performed a service for the many which would justify their wealth. Our measure of value is a lie; a promise now allowed to stand with no intention to perform it. Distribution measured by a lie must be a cheat,—it cannot be honest, and it cannot fail to lead men to become false knaves. Under the necessity of war we did that which is equivalent to debasing the coin, only more hurtful. We enforced the use of a standard of value having no element of uniformity of estimation and with the necessary result. The rich grew richer, the poor grew poorer; it matters not that you may prove a great increase of wealth,—it matters not that you may prove that labor is in many cases even better paid than ever before; these things come from the immense improvements and inventions that have been made in the last ten years, in the processes of production and distribution; from the application of machinery to agriculture and from the extension of railroads, which ought to have made even man's subsistence easier to obtain.

In spite of this admitted gain, distribution is not just or equitable, because there is no just and equal standard by which it can be gauged. What is the necessary consequence? The workman perceiving that wealth rapidly accumulates in few hands, that extravagance, waste and luxury mark the time, while he must work as hard, and as many hours with nominally higher wages, and but little better subsistence than before, becomes discontented, slights his work, and seeks in strikes and eight-hour leagues the remedy for an evil the precise character of which he cannot define, and of the cause of which he is generally profoundly ignorant. When he seeks a remedy in legislation, he is met by capitalists equally ignorant, who oppose all statutes for regulating the hours of labor—not upon the true ground that such statutes restrict the liberty of the workman, and only give capital an opportunity to secure a larger proportionate share of a lesser annual product; but upon the general ground and false allegation that leisure and high wages however obtained by the workman, lead more to vice and waste, than to education and virtue. This farce is played over year after year before the committees of the legislature, and this evidence is repeated again and again by those very men who themselves have asked and obtained the force of a protective tariff to support them at the expense of the community in branches of industry for which they confess themselves incompetent when they ask the enactment of the law. It is not surprising that such men deny the science of political economy and call themselves "infants" in order that they may be put under legal guardianship and supported by a system of outside relief. The trades-union of the workman, is the complement of the trades union of the masters.

Why are such false ideas perpetuated? Is it not because we are all imbued with the idea that the accumulation of property is certain evidence of prosperity? In one aspect of the matter, as I have before said, there is more evidence of progress in the destruction of property than in its accumulation. A new machine may at any time be invented, costing much less than those previously in use, and utterly destroying their value;—and this is true progress, yet the capital in that business will not be counted as many dollars as before. When the railroad destroyed the turnpike and the canal, property was destroyed, when the steamer drove the clipper from the sea, capital was destroyed; yet each event marked progress because it removed friction and facilitated distribution.

It is not the number of dollars at which property is estimated but its power of production that constitutes its importance to the community—its power of yielding great results for little labor. Our statutes are mostly framed as if the accumulation and not the use of property were the main point, and prosperity is gauged more by the standard of what the few have saved than by what the many have to spend. And our laws for protection, technically so called, are framed, as if the labor was the end and not its fruits. Our statutes now tend to accumulate property on one set of shoulders and to accumulate labor upon another.

If evidence is demanded by a stranger of the prosperity of the country, he is first taken to the fine houses which adorn our city, and which are admirable in their way, where he will be most hospitably treated by honorable men who disbelieve in the science of political economy; he will next be taken to one of our great factory towns, and carried over acres of floor surface covered with looms and spindles; or in a neighboring city he will be treated with equal hospitality by rich, honest and honorable men, and from their houses carried to the mines and the iron works of Pennsylvania. In each case he will view property named in millions, and he will see many people apparently receiving good wages, and doing well, and fully protected in their right to labor. But let him look deeper and he will find that most of the owners of this immense concentrated wealth have sought the intervention of the force of law, to compel their neighbors to buy their goods at higher cost, at least while they are learning their business, than they could get them for elsewhere; he will next find that the employees in these factories are the only proletaires in the State—the only people whose children must be taken under the guardianship and custody of the state, lest they should be compelled to work the year through, and debarred even the common education of the common school. If he is carried to the mines of Pennsylvania, he sees in the village, that the guard house and not the school house is the prominent building, and that in no other part of the country are violence, lawlessness, intemperance and ignorance more rife. These mills, works and fine houses, swell our valuation, and would be evidence of true prosperity but they been the growth of free and unrestricted industry. If the stranger would seek true prosperity of the nation and the evidence of wealth in the welfare of the people he may find it scattered all over our broad land in towns and villages, whose entire property counts in dollars far less than one of the mills or iron works; where there is no great factory to be seen; where the largest buildings are the school house and the church; where none are rich and none are poor, but all are engaged in the true diversity of employment and actual co-operation which comes from liberty; where equitable distribution and abundant consumption give evidence of freedom from middlemen's statutes.

Now whether there is any connection of cause and effect between the violence and the strikes among mines and iron works, the overwork of children in factories, and the protective tariff, is a question of political economy, the solution of which is essential to the moral welfare of this community. Perhaps Daniel Webster was a pure theorist, when in 1820 he predicted the exact results which have ensued from the enactment of that system of law, called the American system, then so strongly resisted by New England as an unjust interference with her liberty. It may be true that by means of that enactment New England counts more dollars, more churches, more culture, more art, more gentlemen, more operatives. Does she count more men and women? That is the only question of any importance.

If rich men defend privileges which are not rights and maintain profitable abuses because they are legal; if banks stand in the way of specie payment; if factories make goods dear; if the maintenance of capital prevents the education of children; let those who bar reform remember that he who "soweth the wind, shall reap the whirlwind."

This is the thought which I would impress upon you at this time that while we defend wealth, we must make it synonymous with welfare. It may be true that great wealth is accumulating at this time; that even a large portion of the people are better off than ever before, and a larger proportion becoming possessed of their own houses; all this ought to be what we mean by saying that Catholicism is the purest and most completely developed form of Christianity (we say nothing of the Greek Church, of which little is known in this country.) It has never been a part of our theory to deny the Christian name to Protestants. On the contrary, we regard every one as entitled to that name who can honestly make the Christian confession that "Jesus of Nazareth is the Christ of God." But there are Christians of all degrees of consistency, and in all stages of development. In our opinion, the Catholic is the only consistent and completely developed Christian; but the Protestant, from the Episcopalian down to the Unitarian, is a Christian also, though crude and inconsistent, provided he can make the Christian confession in good faith. If he cannot do that, he is no Christian, though he may claim the name never so stoutly.

In strict harmony with these views, we hold that the "Christian Church" need not be "one consentient organization." We regard it as the totality of all organizations which avow themselves Christian; and the definition of Christianity we accept from the Christian Church in this sense, not from the Catholic Church exclusively. All Christian sects or denominations, of whatever name, unite in making the Christian confession. This, then, is the common platform of all self-designated Christian bodies; and for this reason we regard it as absolutely essential to Christianity. We deny point-blank the right of any individual to originate a new definition of Christianity which shall leave out the Christian confession, or in fact to originate any new definition of it at all. Christianity has always expressed itself in institutions; and by its institutions should it be judged. Whenever a self-styled Christian sect shall discard totally the Christian confession, emancipate itself wholly from all dependence on Jesus or "the Christ," and without equivocation proclaim its allegiance to freedom of thought in the scientific sense of those words, then we will admit that the word Christianity can perpetuate itself in history as synonymous with Free Religion. But not until then. The attempts of individual rationalists to use the word Christianity in some other than the historic sense above indicated we consider to be utterly whimsical, sporadic, and of no lasting importance whatever.

In fine, the "Liberal Christians" have very solid "ground for their definitions and statements," so long as they plant themselves on the Christian confession. But the Unitarians do not do this unequivocally. Their organized bodies profess faith in Christ and faith in Freedom in one breath. If they dropped either of these contradictory professions, we should respect their position. If they had dropped the former profession at Syracuse in 1866, we should probably still have been one of them, though we should not now resume connection with any Christian body. But the Unitarians as a sect halt between two masters, and are faithful to neither.

In fact, Unitarianism reminds us of the little boy we read about in a very amusing child's story-book many years ago. He had done something naughty, and been sent up stairs to his own chamber with strict orders "not to set foot outside the door." An hour later, his mother went up stairs, and discovered the little fellow fast asleep on the floor, his chamber-door wide open, his feet just across the threshold, and the rest of his body outside in the hall. It strikes us that Unitarianism obeys its "Lord" in the same equivocal fashion. Its head and heart are out in the wide world, and it clings to genuine Christianity only by its heels. It is the most penumbral of all nominally Christian sects.

MORE PETITIONS.

The following lists of signatures to the Conner Petition have been received since our last issue.

Mr. John W. Tuttle forty-five names from Vincent, Ohio; Mrs. Sarah Colt sends fifty-two from Suspension Bridge, New York; Dr. J. V. Spencer sends one hundred and seventy-five names from Battle Creek, Michigan; Mr. Lyman Cross sends sixteen names from Washington Township, Lucas Co., Ohio; Mr. S. W. Haws sends twenty-one from Paris, Ill.; Mr. G. D. Sessions sends seventy-six from Mattawan, Mich.; Mr. Benj. R. Tucker sends seventy-six from New Bedford, Mass.; Mr. D. K. Boutelle sends two hundred and twenty from Long Lake, Minn.; Mr. S. T. Pomeroy sends one hundred and fifty from New York City; Mr. Milo A. Townsend sends Twenty-one from Beaver Falls, Pa.; Mr. C. B. Lynn sends twenty-one from Sturgis, Mich. (obtained at a lecture by Mrs. Mary A. Livermore); Mr. Phillip Baer sends one hundred and fifty-one from Sauk City, Wis.; Mr. C. E. Chapman sends one hundred and fifty-three from Syracuse, New York; Mrs. A. H. Whipple sends sixty-five from Clyde, Ohio; Mr. Jacob Sprinkel sends eighty-nine from St. Joseph, Missouri; Mr. Wm. Jones sends eight from Yorktown, New York; Mr. Samuel Lydard sends ninety-two from Medina, Minn.; Mr. Austin Kent sends nine from Stockbridge, New York; Mr. Wm. Chestnut sends thirty-one from Osawatimie, Kansas; Mr. Chas. Leigh sends forty from Duquoin, Ill.; Mr. A. S. Carpenter sends twenty-three from Keene, New Hampshire; Mr. Erastus S. Pier sends fifty-three from Corning, New York; Mr. W. H. Crowell sends two hundred and twelve from Ashtabula, Ohio; Mr. Geo. W. Wood sends twelve from Washington, D. C.; Mr. O. K. Crosby sends fifty-seven from Athens, Penna.; Mr. A. P. Tilden sends twenty from Chardon, Ohio; Mr. H. G. Spencer sends one hundred from Evansville, Wisconsin; K. N. sends twenty-five from Havana, Ohio; Mr. J. Sternberger sends seventy-five from Bangor, Wisconsin; Mr. Jas. W. Sullot, sends thirty-five from Salem, Ohio; Dr. J. M. Blakesley sends sixty-one from Anita, Iowa; Mr. C. Wakefield sends thirty from Bloomington, Illinois; Mr. Dyer D. Lum sends seventy-seven from Portland, Maine; Mr. J. M. Holmes sends twenty-three from Harrison Co., Ohio; Mr. W. H. Downes sends eight from Birmingham, Connecticut; Mr. Ira Smith sends twenty-eight from Colebrook, Connecticut; Mr. B. F. Horton sends seventy from Dexter, Maine; Mr. C. D. Martin sends seven from Dakota Co., Nebraska; Mr. Joseph Frazee sends one hundred and twenty-eight from Defiance, Ohio; Mr. D. Sandman sends forty from Barre Mills, Wisconsin; Mr. J. H. Palmer sends ten from Cortland, New York; Mr. Wm. Hilles sends thirty from Mt. Union, Ohio; Mr. John Chappellsmith, sends two hundred and twenty-four from New Harmony, Indiana; Mr. Geo. Chamberlin sends two hundred and twenty-eight from Depere, Wisconsin; Mr. John Abbot sends one hundred and five from Naples, Illinois; Mr. Jonas Hilton sends fifty-seven from Norridgewock, Maine; Mr. D. F. Sweetland sends one hundred and eight from Hornellsville, New York.

IS IT FAIR?

Mr. Emerson says "to be great is to be misunderstood." With as much justice it may be said that to be honest is to be misunderstood; that to be sincere and truthful is to be misunderstood; that to be straightforward and veracious is to be misunderstood. The presumption is that men are cunning, sly, disingenuous and self-seeking. The spirit of partisanship has so seized hold on religious as well as political parties that nobody gets credit for frankness. It is the one quality that is continually laid claim to and never displayed. THE INDEX tries hard to be fair to every body; but it seems to be the only religious paper that does. The Christian Register, one of the most equitable sheets in Christendom, cannot be fair to Mr. Potter, but strains its ingenuity to convict his plain statement of some disingenuousness. To be fair would involve a concession and concessions are fatal to the claim of infallibility, and a paper, religious or secular, that did not assume to be infallible would forfeit its claim to denominational and to party confidence. A Unitarian who should be fair to a believer in Free Religion would be a wonder.

Radicals are not fair to radicals. One must be radical all over, or he is allowed to be radical nowhere. If a radical tries to tell the exact truth, and in so doing departs from the general track which the body pursues, suspicion of essential unsoundness falls upon him, and the name apostate is whispered. Both radical and conservative claim all they can and are anything but fair in the claims they make; the radical catching at every chance expression of the conservative in order to show that really he belongs to the other side, and the conservative catching at every random word of the radical to prove that he is marching under false colors,—as if one could not be honest without being dishonest, could not be fair without being foul!

No task is so discouraging as that of the teller of the truth. A radical preacher recently spoke what he thought a true and merited word about Jesus. He prefaced it by remarking that each prophet has his word of might; with this one, it was renunciation, with that, purity, with the other, justice, or moderation, or law, or harmony, or reason. Jesus' word, he said, was Love; and then he proceeded to illustrate his meaning by a few specifications of the use Jesus made of this fine word. Least, however, what he said should be mistaken for unqualified eulogy, he interwove the declaration that in some respects, other teachers were greater than he; that the strong of will preferred Socrates; the aspiring, Buddha; the reasonable, Confucius; the heroic, Moses; that Jesus was for the burdened, the lonely, the sad, not for the resolute, the proud, the high-minded. And he closed his brief statement by intimating that, in the conduct of human affairs and the exigency of human society, justice was more than love, and was even necessary to preserve the moral order which love threatened to undermine.

There was a slight, perhaps, but sincere effort to place Jesus where he belongs in the rank of the world's teachers. Now what does a contemporary religious journal do but cull out the complimentary phrases, omitting all the rest, and print them as Mr. So-and-so's glowing tribute to Jesus! giving to all its readers the impression that the most radical of the radicals agreed with the most conservative of the conservatives in paying the highest honors to the "Master," and sustaining him on the throne he has so long occupied in Christendom. Is this fair? The writer meant to do nothing of the kind. He meant to say what he thought was due, no less and no more, quite indifferent to the effect it might have on the security of the "Saviour's" place on his mythological throne. The journal in question had no purpose to be unjust. It probably intended to be particularly kind and generous, to do the handsome thing by an antagonist, and propitiate public sentiment towards him, while at the same time it drew from him a confession in its own favor. But this especial kindness is no more fair than an especial curtness and crabbedness would have been. We want the truth by truthful means. Let us have that if we can get it! The sentimentalism of charity may sin against the truth as fatally as the bitter exaggeration of intolerance. Better than the zeal of partisanship, better than the tenderness that would soften and cover it over, is the truth that knows no partisanship and asks no glozing.

O. B. F.

FOUNDATIONS OF FAITH IN DEMOCRACY.

In the last century Jean Jacques Rousseau promulgated his renowned "Social Compact." His scheme is based upon a "state of nature" in which instinct is a rule of conduct and physical impulses with the law of appetite are controlling influences.

His natural men are brutes; and to secure "natural liberty" he instituted a brutish contract which he called his "Contract Social."

The divine element of human nature is no part of his natural men; so far as I can see, a skunk or any other offensive animal has the same inalienable rights that these imaginary men have, and to preserve which this shallow thinker, but brilliant sophist, sought to establish a social compact.

How something was to proceed from nothing he did not attempt to demonstrate, but with one leap he cleared the chasm between his "state of nature" and a "state of society," and being safely on his feet, discovered himself located in the realm of morals. Here he found that instinct is subordinate to reason, and the voice of duty succeeds the dictates of passion. Why he did not take another leap is not easy to understand. Had he done so he would have saved M. Comte much labor, for he must have landed in a state of social despotism, developed and advocated at a later day by that very positive philosopher. But Rousseau did not take it; on the contrary he proceeded at once to reconstruct society with special reference to the natural liberty of the natural man that he had brought with him. His theory of government is founded upon the selfish principle—it is pure self-interest. A given number of men voluntarily assume an obligation to protect each other against each other. The purpose of each is to promote his own personal welfare, and as in this effort conflict may arise, a defensive and protective alliance, called the State, is established. Society is a collective body and its sole function is that of a ubiquitous watch-dog ever on the alert to keep off intruders.

Rousseau found many readers and some disciples. Our own Jefferson, Adams and Hancock were familiar with his political and social theories; each one of them places his own value upon the new philosophy. None of them adopted it and all of them practically repudiated it.

There is, however, in the present day, a class of thinkers who claim that the immortal Preamble to our Declaration of Independence, is an epitome of Rousseau's "Contrat Social;" and they are demanding the full development and rigid application of his principles in the administration of our government.

One notable representative of this class, in speech so plain as to leave no room for doubt, demands the repeal of all marriage laws and clamors for legal sanction of prostitution and debauch. A second class of political philosophers, composed of men who have lost faith in democratic principles, endorse this new construction of the famous Preamble, and say that the logic of the social anarchists is irresistible. They point in terror to Free Love or Free Lust, and cry out,—“Behold the consummate flower of your democracy! The tree has been growing these one hundred years, and, lo! it was the poisonous Upas our fathers planted! In the name of all that is good and true and pure and clean, destroy it root and branch.”

But there is yet another class of thinkers, who repudiate démocratie, but believe in American democracy, and justify their faith by an appeal to our Magna Charta. Their interpretation of it is based upon a conception of the “natural man” and of his social relations, radically different from, and opposed to, that of Rousseau. They begin by supplying Rousseau's fatal omission; they build upon the divine character of humanity. Man is fashioned in the image of the Creator. Born in a stable or in a palace—nurtured in a den of vice or trained in the school of virtue—God is ever in the man; and upon this primal truth the self-evident equality of all men is founded. On this principle society is not a mere compact for the common protection of a selfish individualism. With his first breath, the relations of the child to society begin; and only when he has drawn his last breath does the man under these relations. The individual has duties as well as rights, and society has rights as well as duties; and a recognition of this fact is essential to social welfare.

The rights, duties and obligations of the individual involve himself, his immediate neighbor, and so society. The term “rights” is relative; it implies the existence of other human beings, and it has no meaning except as it refers to social relations. Men come into the world with instinct, passion, intellect, will, conscience; and only by contact with humanity are rights evolved. “Inalienable rights,” therefore, as well as all others, imply social duties and obligations. The right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, inherent in man, so far from proceeding from his animal nature, is based upon the great fact of his humanity; it is natural and inalienable because he is the natural child of God, and the fact of his parentage can never be annihilated. Existence, motion or action, obedience to impulse, when illumined by the light which “lighteth every man that cometh into the world,” become natural life, natural liberty, natural pursuit of happiness. The right to these is inalienable; and this is the right proclaimed in 1776; this is the corner-stone of American Democracy. It is a play upon words to argue that the grand declaration, “all men are created equal,” is not true, because one man has one talent, and another ten talents; it is an imputation upon the intelligence of the people, to scout at “inalienable rights,” because sometimes men are deprived of life, and their liberty is restrained by law. The men who wrote and signed the Declaration of Independence, and the “people” who adopted it as their own, were as cognizant of these facts as we are. They acted on the assumption that society is composed of human beings and not of beasts, and they believed, as they were entitled to believe, that the import of their words was so well understood as to render definition superfluous.

The declaration itself was a protest, not of individuals, but of a Congress of States against the tyranny of a distant government; the war that followed, developed great inequalities among men, and involved the sacrifice of life and the restraint of individuals; yet no one for a moment thought of charging the United Colonies with recreancy to their own principles. From the beginning, the interpretation of their Bill of Rights, by the people, has included a repudiation of the animal liberty of Rousseau and has indicated that the rights for which they have contended and which they will preserve, imply in intelligence, virtue, conscience, law. In 1787, with the declaration in their hands, and the words, liberty and equality upon their lips, they launched the constitution. Without hinting at a “contract,” but broadly recognizing the reciprocal rights, duties, and responsibilities of society and the individual, they ordained and established the constitution “in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defence, promote the general welfare and secure the blessings of liberty.”

There is indeed, not a scrap of evidence in the Declaration of Independence to sustain the theory that the function of government is simply to maintain inviolate a contract made between individuals; there is not a hint at individual absolution from social obligations, the broad democratic principle, reiterated by Abraham Lincoln in his memorable words, “of the people, by the people, for the people,” is unfolded, and with it the right of the people “to institute a new government, laying its foundations on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.” The preamble to the constitution interprets and confirms the preamble to the declaration, and in it we find a wise combination of regard for the general welfare and for personal liberty.

Recognition of individual rights common to humanity must be the basis of all forms of just government; and the best form is that which secures the largest individual liberty consistent with social integrity. That is the rational interpretation of these two articles of faith in the American political creed; and it is the interpretation that will be sustained by the clear-sighted common sense of the people.

R. P. H.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

A RUSSIAN JOURNEY (James R. Osgood & Co., Boston) is a graphic sketch, by Miss Edna Dean Proctor, of incidents of travel in the empire of the Czars,—or rather a series of short, bright essays on various points of interest in that vast domain. Each is prefaced with a little poem. The book is not profound; and it is not tiresome. One may read its pages as he looks through the stereoscope, not tarrying very long to reflect, but yet all the while hanging up on the walls of his “chambers of imagery” a series of pleasant pictures that will afterwards make any allusion to Russia and the Russians fresh and suggestive. A glimpse of St. Petersburg, Moscow and the Kremlin, the Fair of Nijni, the Kalmucks, the Cossacks, the Czar himself,—and, with a grateful “thank you!” to the fair artist, we turn to

THE REVISED PRAYER BOOK, a compilation by the Rev. Charles Voysey for the use of his congregation at St. George's Hall, London, where the clear, bold discourses are preached, two of which our readers have already found in THE INDEX. It will be difficult for those not used to the Episcopal church-service to do full justice to this book. Mr. Voysey has undertaken a very arduous task, and, we think, performed it with a fair degree of success. The best portions of the old Book of Common Prayer are retained with but little alteration; and we doubt if any fixed form of worship will ever again be framed comparable with these for simplicity, dignity, and spiritual vitality. The two new services added by Mr. Voysey, one “respecting our duty” and the other “of praise and thanksgiving,” are simple, beautiful, and elevated both in tone and expression; and it is high praise to say that they really harmonize with the retained parts of the older book.

To those, however, who feel themselves drawn into sympathy with modern religious thought, the difficulty is an increasing one, how to reconcile it with any verbal expression of the religious sentiment,—above all, with a fixed expression of it. The deepest worship of the age more and more clothes itself with reserve; and it is a problem which time only can solve, whether public worship of any sort will be perpetuated. To be frank (and we write with no purpose but to be frank), it appears probable that religion in its highest form will diffuse itself more and more over the entire life, and less and less concentrate itself into momentary utterance. Such utterance, at least, will be increasingly private—increasingly indisposed to take the form of definite language, above all in public assemblies. And yet, if (as we anticipate) the time shall ever come when the harsh, jarring of present religious convictions, caused by the open feud between science and all instituted religion, shall pass into the harmony of new religious convictions, based on a deepened, ripened, and universalized science,—if thus the conditions of a sincere public worship shall be once more realized in a new unity of intelligent yet spiritual faith throughout the community at large,—then we see no reason why the spirit of worship should not find social as well as solitary utterance. It is the mixed and discordant beliefs of liberal assemblies to-day that destroy the finer sympathies on which all sincere social worship must rest.

The long period of transition, therefore, which must intervene between the past ages of ecclesiastical faith and the far-off ages of scientific faith is especially unfavorable to social worship; and the tendency is very marked towards at least a temporary total discontinuance of it. “English Theists,” wrote Prof. Newman in a letter recently received, “do not know what to do with public prayer.” The perplexity is not confined to England. It is universal among all modern religious thinkers. Modern religion demands absolute freedom of thought; this renders atheism at least possible, and in many cases actual. Here is the root of the difficulty. How can the religious sentiment be socially gratified in the unsympathetic presence of those who do not respect it? It cannot well be. Yet, sooner than withhold cordial fellowship even from the most pronounced atheist, modern religion will waive the luxury of social worship, and content itself with the secret and profounder worship which takes no counsel and asks no sympathy of man. Worship is a delight, but brotherhood is a duty; and the deepest religion hesitates not long between the two. For these reasons we believe that public prayer will wholly fall into desuetude in liberal assemblies, until the wiser science of the future shall have re-created a universal faith in God, not on the basis of authority, but rather on that of the better instructed intelligence of man. To many this expectation seems chimerical, if not absurd. So be it. Our conviction needs no companionship. It is strong enough to stand alone.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

SPIRITUALISM AND SCIENCE IN ENGLAND.

LONDON, January 18, 1873.

There is a connection between the head and hand of a nation which our theologians are beginning to find out. The London Times recently declared, in an editorial article, that there are more people in London uninterested in any kind of Christianity than all the denominations put together can pretend to have converted among the heathen. Yet when a man of science gives a lecture on Sunday, it is hard to find a hall large enough to contain the people who attend, though they have to pay; whilst the churches which they attend freely are comparatively empty. The fact is, the working classes have abandoned Christianity, in more or less sympathy with the alienation of the great thinkers from it. The blow given to the prevailing religion by the simple announcement that Grote had left a bequest to endow a professorship in University College on condition that no preacher of any denomination whatever should ever be chosen to that chair was exceedingly heavy. The churches and chapels writhed under it, while in a score of so-called “infidel meetings” it was made the subject of demonstrative congratulations. Not long ago I was walking along the street on a Sunday afternoon when I perceived a group gathered around a street preacher. The man was much more vigorous and shrewd than his kind generally are; he was a Scotchman, and, like most Scotch preachers, had developed an especial ability for the falsification of facts. He seemed to be directing his remarks particularly against a number of infidels, who had been urging their objections to Christianity before my arrival. “Ah!” said the preacher scornfully, “you do not find these Christian evidences sufficient? You don’t? They were enough for such intellects as Locke and Newton, but not for you!” Presently one of the “infidels” replied: “The preacher has gone back just two hundred years to find great men who believed in Christianity. But something has been learned in two hundred years. Let him give us the names of great men—the successors of Newton and Locke—who believe in it now.” The Scotch preacher prudently discovered at that moment it was his tea time, and, excusing himself, disappeared.

I was reminded of this by seeing the faces of many of that same group of “infidels” at St. George's Hall, last Sunday afternoon, on the occasion of one of those Sunday lectures on secular subjects which have now become an institution in London. Every Sunday now we have two such lectures and a concert in a beautiful hall. The infidels have found a nest for themselves and their children—after a long struggle with the Sabbatarians—and their meetings on common and under railway arches on Sundays will become only the voluntary enjoyments of the summer. The subject of last Sunday's lecture was “Epidemic Delusions, with special reference to Spiritualistic Manifestations.” The lecturer was Dr. W. B. Carpenter. There were circumstances which gave great interest to the occasion. There is no doubt that Spiritualism has recently been brought under the consideration of the scientific world in a way in which dealing with it cannot be avoided. One man of respectable posial-

x-er-cy at ar
he n.
to s, n er re id
e g
re le o
d r
r.
-
s
e l,
l, l
re il
e
e t r s e t b
-
-
-
r
l
l
l
r f t

M. D. C.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 5, 1872.

Geo. W. Wood.

DETROIT, Mich., Jan. 29, 1873.

These few must suffice, although many equally significant could be given. Not by the sneer that shows a false pride or a sceptical and unreasoning

Truly yours,
G. B. STEBBINS

SALEM, O., Feb. 1, 1872.

Yours truly,

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—During Mr. Abbot's absence at the East, the Sunday meetings of the Society will be suspended. They will be resumed February 25.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending February 19th—
 F. M. Holland, $1; Fred G. Allen, $2; Wm. K. Taylor, $2;
 R. Thorne, $2; J. R. Thompson, $2; Edward Maule, $3; A. G. Pearce, $2;
 Wm. H. Foulke, 50 cts.; A. B. Morse, 10 cts.; Joseph M.
 80 cts.; Miss C. H. Tilden, $2; John Austin, $2; L. Daniel, $2;
 J. C. Allen, $2.50; E. V. Lapham, $2; L. H. Holloway, $2;
 Mrs. V. L. Owen, 30 cts.; Mr. Chas. Frankenhoff, $1; M. thew Niebl, $2.55; Mrs. R. Wallace, 20 cts.; R. Sleeper, cts.; E. G. Burnett, $2; A. B. Spinn, $1; L. L. Green,
 A. A. Smith, $2; C. L. Loring, 10 cts.; Samuel Long-low, 50 cts.; C. H. Green, $3; C. W. Wilcox, $3.75; Luf-
 Nickerson, 50 cts.; Wm. Wright, 50 cts.; Geo. He, 10 cts.;
 Harriet Brothers, $2; E. C. Sly, $2; Hiram Vannest, $3;
 K. Edgerston, 10 cts.; Thomas Martin, 50 cts.; J. C. Allen,
 $1.45; Mrs. M. J. Wilcox, 50 cts.; Thos. Hughes, $2; Cy-
 Williams, 10 cts.; E. F. Hill, $2; A. J. Sargent, 50 cts.;
 M. H. Hill, 50 cts.; J. W. Wilcox, 50 cts.; W. Buckley, cts.; Zind Eager, $2; R. A. Gurley, 10 cts.; Ch. Ellis, James Mackenzie, $1; H. A. Mills, $20; C. R. Woodward, cts.; Jno. W. Griffin, 50 cts.; Julius Rosenthal, 50 cts.;
 Huff, 50 cts.; W. C. O. $2; A. G. Boynton, $2.25; W.
 Thurston, $2; Gilbert Billings, 10 cts.; G. N. Smith, $2;
 Butler, 30 cts.; Rev. J. May, 10 cts.; Geo. Pugsley, 50 cts.;
 L. A. Ford, 10 cts.; Wm. Wright, 10 cts.; Robt. H. Pattee,
 15 cts.; Paul Lewis, $2; Wm. W. Frothingham, $2; C. H. Jo-kins, 50 cts.; Ellen H. Flint, $2; A. Anderson, 50 cts.; J.
 Briggs, $3; Jno. C. Myers, 50 cts.; Alex. Reed, $2; Edw.
 Davis, $1; Toledo Printing Co., $20; Jesse Mann, 15 cts.;
 A. Almon, $3.10; F. L. Hoemer, $2; Larkin T. Tufts, $1; R.
 Cella Burell, $2; Fred. Rhinehart, $2; Geo. Pugsley, $2;
 Jno. M. Ramsey, $2.25; R. A. Skues, $2;
 Mrs. A. Hays, $2; P. B. Haisson, 50 cts.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE IND which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, OR REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles," gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution—the list of its most prominent supporters—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single copies, Five Cents; Twelve copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE!

BOOK BUYERS who wish the LIVE BOOKS OF THE DAY can have their orders filled promptly by mail, post-paid, by sending the Publisher's price to

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Bookseller and Publisher,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE WORKS of Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Tyndall, Proctor, Froude, Emerson, Max Mueller, Locky, M. D. Conway, John Weiss, James Freeman Clarke, Robert Collyer, Robt. Dale Owen, and all of the POPULAR BOOKS OF THE DAY, constantly on hand.

☞ PRICE LISTS AND CATALOGUES sent upon application. Correspondence and inquiries solicited.

ANY BOOK PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED STATES

Sent post-paid on receipt of Price. Address

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Bookseller, Toledo, O.

THEODORE PARKER'S WRITINGS.

NEW EDITION.

A DISCOURSE OF MATTERS PERTAINING TO RELIGION. Fourth Edition. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth. $1.50.

SERMONS OF THEISM, ATHEISM, AND THE POPULAR THEOLOGY. 1 vol. 12mo, cloth. $1.50.

ADDITIONAL SPEECHES, ADDRESSES, AND OCCASIONAL SERMONS. 2 vols. 12mo, cloth. $3.00.

SPEECHES, ADDRESSES, AND OCCASIONAL SERMONS. 3 vols. 12mo, cloth. $4.50.

HISTORIC AMERICANS.—Franklin, Washington, Adams, and Jefferson. With an Introduction by Rev. O. B. Frothingham. 1 vol. 8vo. $1.50.

THE TRIAL OF THEODORE PARKER for the Misdemeanor of a Speech in Faneuil Hall against Kidnaping, with the Defense. 1 vol. 8vo, cloth. $1.50.

THE TWO CHRISTMAS CELEBRATIONS.—A. D. I. and MODERNITY. A Christmas Story. Square 16m, cloth. 50 cts.

A SERMON OF IMMORTAL LIFE. Pamphlet, 15 cts.

Sold by Booksellers, or mailed postpaid, on receipt of price, by

HORACE B. FULLER, Publisher,
14 Bromfield Street, Boston.

109-41115W.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice.
P. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ASA K. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN CONE, " "
EDWARD HINSELF, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo, O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	" "	Fifteen "	1,500
C. CONE,	" "	" "	1,500
EDWARD HINSELF,	" "	" "	1,500
F. E. ABBOT,	" "	Forty "	4,000
H. L. HALLOWELL,	" "	Ten "	1,000
GUIDO MARK,	" "	" "	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	" "	" "	1,000
R. P. HALLOWELL,	" "	" "	1,000
H. E. HOWE,	" "	Three "	300
W. C. FISK,	" "	" "	300
J. M. RITCHIE,	" "	" "	300
V. KERN,	" "	" "	300
ALANSON WOOD,	" "	" "	300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	" "	Five "	500
J. G. HOLSWORTH,	" "	One "	100
JOS. E. MARK,	" "	" "	100
C. ACHARD,	" "	" "	100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York, N. Y.,	Thirty "	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport, R. I.,	Two "	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin, Pa.,	Five "	500
GEO. HOADLY,	Cincinnati, O.,	Two "	200
MISS A. HALL,	Defiance, Ohio,	One "	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Northampton, Mass.,	" "	100
J. SEDGEWICK,	Tonica, Ill.,	" "	100
CARL POST,	Palmer, N. Y.,	Three "	300
HENRY MILLER,	Monroe, Mich.,	Five "	500
L. R. SUNDRELAND,	Sacramento, Cal.,	One "	100
J. L. WATKINS,	Quincy, Mass.,	One "	100
LOUIS BARNETT,	Boston, N. H.,	" "	100
J. E. SUTTON,	Croydon, Kan.,	" "	100
S. I. DUBREK,	Olahe, Kan.,	" "	100
J. M. HADLEY,	" "	" "	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence, Mass.,	Ten "	1,000
W. B. SPENCER,	Haverhill, Mass.,	Two "	200
JON. F. BARNETT,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	300
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange, Ind.,	" "	300
FRANK PRATHER,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
E. F. DUNSMORE,	Wellsville, Kan.,	One "	100
J. T. DICKINSON,	New York, N. Y.,	Two "	200
W. J. POTTER,	Middlefield, Ct.,	Fourteen "	1,400
G. C. GLATTE,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
W. C. GANNETT,	Kendallville, Ind.,	80p "	80
MISS M. C. PARKINS,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	300
MRS. S. EMERSON,	Dover, N. H.,	One "	100
W. H. DOWNER,	Birmingham, Ct.,	" "	100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing, Mich.,	" "	100
R. H. SMITH,	Warren, Pa.,	" "	100
W. O. HUBBELL,	Ithaca, N. Y.,	" "	100
W. M. CLARKE,	Toledo, O.,	Three "	300
C. L. SMITH,	" "	One "	100
J. N. LYMAN,	Cincinnati, O.,	Twenty "	2,000
L. G. FELCH,	Monroe Centre, Pa.,	One "	100
A. FOLSON,	Boston, Mass.,	Three "	300
L. O. BASS,	Colebrook, Conn.,	One "	100
S. E. SEWALL,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
EDWARD WRIGHT,	" "	" "	300
E. B. WARD,	Detroit, Mich.,	Twenty "	2,000
A. D. WILT,	Dayton, O.,	One "	100
S. S. BOKER,	Keokuk, Iowa,	" "	100
WM. JONES,	Peekskill, N. Y.,	" "	100
S. H. DAME,	Oakaloosa, N. H.,	" "	100
J. H. YORE,	Dover, N. H.,	" "	100
JOS. HAYES,	" "	" "	100
G. P. FOLSON,	" "	" "	100
"A FRIEND,"	" "	" "	100
MRS. H. E. PARKINS,	" "	Two "	200
O. B. FROTHINGHAM,	Boston, Mass.,	One "	100
WILLIAM GREEN,	Orange, N. J.,	" "	100
"A FRIEND,"	Lowell, Mass.,	" "	100
D. H. FREEMAN,	Brattleboro, Vt.,	" "	100
MRS. F. W. CHRISTIAN,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	100
C. W. FARMER,	Kelley's Island, O.,	Two "	200
EDW. M. DAVIS,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	One "	100
MRS. LUCRETIA MOTT,	" "	" "	100
MISS M. A. WRIGHT,	Jersey City, N. J.,	" "	100
A. S. BROWN,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
EDWIN BROWN,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
R. P. HALLOWELL,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
BERT. RODMAN,	" "	" "	300
H. B. CLARKE,	" "	Six "	600
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo, O.,	Ten "	1,000
M. L. HOLBROOK,	Houlton, Me.,	One "	100
W. H. BOUGHTON,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	" "	" "	100
E. G. BURNETT,	Webster, Mass.,	Two "	200
J. E. FOLLETT,	Winona, Minn.,	One "	100
JOS. WALKER,	Newton, N. J.,	" "	100
T. M. LAMB,	Franklin, Pa.,	" "	100
W. H. DIX,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
W. H. SPALDING,	Paris du Chien Wis., Minn.,	" "	100
LOUIS BARNETT,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	Two "	200
LEWIS KERRY,	Augusta, Kan.,	One "	100
SAM'L WARRNER,	La Fayette, N. J.,	" "	100
W. L. RATHKE,	Amesbury, Mass.,	" "	100
W. EMERSON,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	100
C. H. HOBBS,	Dover, N. H.,	Two "	200
MRS. L. THOMSON,	" "	One "	100
BENJ. HALLOWELL,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	" "	100
MRS. M. R. VAN RENSSELAER,	N. Y. City,	" "	300
R. B. STONE,	Aberdeen, Miss.,	" "	100
WM. KOTCH,	Fall River, Mass.,	Two "	200
MRS. M. JONES,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Five "	500
J. WHITKILL,	Kerhonkson, N. Y.,	One "	100
S. H. ROPER,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	Two "	200
MRS. E. D. FRANKY,	New York, N. Y.,	One "	100
CHAS. BONALL,	Salem, O.,	" "	100
G. H. BRIGGS,	Amesbury, Mass.,	Two "	200
J. T. CLARKSON,	" "	" "	300
C. W. NEWTON,	Castleton, Ill.,	One "	100
HENRY KERRY,	Toledo, O.,	" "	300
OTTO KLEMM,	" "	One "	100
H. G. NEUBERT,	" "	One "	100
A. BUNKE,	" "	Two "	200
TOLEDO PRINTING CO.,	Detroit, Mich.,	Thirty "	3,000
T. K. PECK,	Westminster, Ct.,	Thirty "	3,000

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO OFFICE NO. 90, ST. CLAIR ST.
NEW YORK OFFICE NO. 22, VESSEY ST.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause it represents to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $4.50 and 75 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

LOCAL AGENTS.

HENRY H. RICHARDSON & Co., 22 Vessey St., New York.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, 98 Federal St., Boston.
PARKER PILLSBURY, Salem, Ohio.

GENERAL AGENTS.

A. E. BUTTS, New York City.
H. L. OREEN, Syracuse, N. Y.

Any person, acting as an agent for THE INDEX, may forward the names of NEW SUBSCRIBERS and retain Twenty per cent. of their SUBSCRIPTIONS.

All Letters and Communications to be addressed to
THE INDEX,
DRAWER 38, TOLEDO, O.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denison, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 35 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORTH OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (30 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's Essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (50 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER, Secretary.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vessey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM E. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best paper or exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly exponent of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word;") "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 8.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, FEBRUARY 24, 1872.

WHOLE No. 113.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WESTWORTH HOOKER, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLGREN,
J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY,
REV. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MORDECAI D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

(Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.
Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio.")

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1872.

THE GOD OF SCIENCE.

BY F. E. ABBOT.

(Sixth Lecture in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, February 11, 1872.)

A year ago I had the honor to read in this Course a lecture on "The Intuitionist and Scientific Schools of Free Religion." Its main purpose was to point out the failure of what might be described as the intuitionist philosophy of religion, and to show that modern religion must, so far as its intellectual method is concerned, frankly plant itself on the basis of modern science. It would have been going out of my path to criticize the principles of intuitionism in their metaphysical or rather psychological aspect, which could not have been done without discussing at great length questions usually considered to be of a very arid and tedious nature. I was obliged to limit myself to a more practical treatment of the subject, and to deal with issues less abstract. But that the problems of God and Immortality have received no accepted solution by the method of intuition, and that they still await solution by the method of science, were points that I endeavored to make especially prominent and clear. The present lecture is in some sort a continuation of the former one; and it will be my object to contribute something towards an answer of the question—"What does science teach about God?"

"SCIENCE HAS NO GOD."

The first thought, perhaps, that may occur to you in connection with this question may be that science teaches nothing whatever about God. Scores of scientific men and hundreds of dabbles in science will vehemently assert this. Multitudes of Christian clergymen will echo the assertion, and add that the Divine light shines only from the sacred pages of the Bible. I do not at all dispute the truth of these assertions, taken in the sense in which they are made. If there is no God but that preached in the majority of Christian pulpits even at the present day, I admit unreservedly at the outset that science knows nothing, and will know nothing, of any such God as that. Thousands affirm him, believing themselves to be theists. Other thousands deny him, believing themselves to be atheists. But in all ages and lands there have been men whose ideas of God have been as high above the popular ideas of him as the Alps are high above the fife of France. Socrates, you remember, was arraigned before the Athenian dikasts for atheism, but he replied:—"Should I by my entreaties persuade or force you to break your oath of impartiality, I should teach you to believe there are no gods, and, even while making my defence, should accuse myself of not believing in the gods. But this is far from the truth, for I believe, O Athenians, as none of my accusers believes." Philosophy has long cherished thoughts about the Divine by the side of which the teachings of Christian theology stand no higher than the barbarian notions of which Sir John Lubbock gives an account:—"When Burton spoke to the Eastern Negroes about the Deity, they eagerly asked where he was to be found, in order that they might kill him; for they said, 'Who but he lays waste our homes, and kills our wives and cattle?'"

An old woman, belonging to that Arab tribe [Eesa,] having a toothache, offered up the following prayer: 'Oh, Allah, may thy teeth ache like mine! Oh, Allah, may thy gums be as sore as mine!'" [The Origin of Civilization, p. 131.]

When, therefore, narrow-minded people blame me for using the word God in a higher than the popular sense, and attribute it to an unworthy desire of evading the reproach of atheism, I reply that I judge it right to let the great philosophical believers of all ages define it for me, rather than the little clerical believers of the day,—just as I let the great savans define the meaning of the word sun, rather than the ignorant people who know nothing of the revelations of science concerning its true physical nature. If the word God represented to my thought nothing that is really existent, I would discard it; and if the word sun represented nothing that is really existent, I would discard it also. But so long as both words stand for what I believe to be great and glorious realities, I must retain them both, and not permit the ignorance of the many to extinguish the knowledge of the few.

Scientific men, it is true, are very shy of the word God, and usually turn it over to the Church as exclusively ecclesiastical property. The Church has so long claimed a monopoly of religious ideas, and made such a bad use of them too, that scientific men have hitherto been nearly unanimous in declaring that they find no place in science. When, therefore, I speak of "the God of science," I would be understood distinctly as not meaning "the God of scientific men." Each of these must speak for himself, or, if he prefers, keep silence for himself. I intend only to draw forth from the great treasury of scientific truth a few gold coins which have been strangely mistaken for copper—to show, if I can, that science itself has already made discoveries which possess an unadmitted religious value, and to point out that the present tendencies of science are in the direction, not of atheism, but of an enlightened theism.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SCIENCE.

In that singular compound of pompous pedantry, whimsical and erratic speculation, and genuine philosophical genius, the "Primary Synopsis of Universology" by Stephen Pearl Andrews, which claims to have discovered the universal philosophy of science, Prof. Agassiz is quoted as using the following language:—

"I believe in the existence, in the nature of things, of just such a science as you claim to have discovered; and in this I differ from most scientific men, who seem as yet to have no conception of Unity of Law, and who would therefore regard your whole pretension as Utopian. Farther than this, I believe that we are, just in this age, on the verge of making the discovery; and that somebody will make it. Whether you have it or not, I am of course unable to say. The presumption is strongly against any individual claimant. . . . Indeed, I doubt whether, if you have all you claim, the scientific men, so-called, will be the first to appreciate it. We are, he added, all intense specialists; and when the Unity Science comes in the world, it will be something so entirely aside from our fixed habits of thought, that I think it will find its first appreciators, probably, among men of enlarged and general culture, rather than among specialists in science."

There is, I believe, in these words of Prof. Agassiz, the true spirit of prophecy. Out of science itself must be developed the philosophy of the future; and not only do I agree with him in thinking that its first appreciators will be found outside of the circle of scientific specialists, but I also think that its authors will be also found outside that circle. No thorough specialist fits himself for taking comprehensive and genuinely philosophical views of science. But the world for half a century has been groping blindly to find this greatly needed Philosophy of Science. Auguste Comte believed that he had found it. Herbert Spencer believes that he has found it. Stephen Pearl Andrews (last and least) believes that he has found it. All are mistaken. That philosophy has not yet come. But when it comes, as come it must and will, it will embrace the totality of all known facts in the unity of an intelligible system, doing exact justice to each and ignoring none, organizing the sciences as one harmonious whole, and including under a single yet complex method all departments of human thought. When it comes, it will create sooner or later throughout the civilized world a unity of intellectual convictions which has never yet been paralleled, even in the boasted "Ages of Faith,"—not, of course, a unity of all opinions, but a unity of fundamental principles and methods of thinking. And when it comes,—a Philosophy of Science whose basis shall be solid truth and whose law shall be unfettered reason,—then, I most profoundly believe, will the enlightened idea of God be so firmly fixed in the human mind that Christianity and atheism shall become alike mere traditions of the past. By this I mean that, if I misread not the signs of the times, and above all the signs of science itself, the Christian religion, all other special historic religions, and the various forms of atheism which these have polarized into existence, will be all educated by ever advancing and enlarging science into an interpretation of NATURE which shall do it equal justice both in its spiritual and its physical aspects.

THE METHOD OF SCIENCE.

But this philosophy, based on all known truth and vital enough to assimilate all truth that shall from time to time be discovered, must be dominated by a single method. What is wanted is not the discovery of a new method, but the expansion and universal acceptance of the method already crowned with such magnificent and triumphant laurels—the method of science itself. Observation and experiment, induction and deduction,—the recognition of all facts, inward and outward, and the application of every mental faculty to interpret them and discover all their bearings,—this is the method, already organized and of unquestioned authority in physical investigations, which is destined to become supreme also in every province of human thinking. The conquest of one dogmatic system by another is of trivial consequence; the pathway of philosophy is white with the bleaching bones of such systems. But the establishment of a new method is of vast moment, for it means the determination of a new road for the human mind.

We are now in the midst of a great conflict of methods. The "transitional period" of which we hear so much vague and vaporous talk (nobody seems to know from what or to what we are passing) is in fact the period of struggle between the old method of Christianity and the new method of science. Dogmatic authority, the Divine revelation of truth which must be accepted without doubt or question as the Divinely authorized basis of belief,—that is the old method once supreme throughout Christendom in the "Ages of Faith;" and it still holds away to a greater or less extent throughout the entire Christian Church. On the other hand is the new scientific method, only two or three centuries old, which submits every fact and every theory to the severest tests, first objectively by experience, and then subjectively by reason; and this new method is daily gaining ground upon the other. Nearly every great conflict of ideas in modern times, I care not how disguised by superficial issues, can be shown by thorough analysis to be the same eternal conflict of these two principles,—Authority or the Christian method, and Reason or the scientific method. The substitution of the latter for the former is the great reform now going on, and not to be completed until the last trace of dogmatism is wiped out from the human mind.

THE HALF-WAY HOUSE OF INTUITIONISM.

The intuitionist philosophy, which assumes God as a given fact, an original datum, a first principle from which all religion is a deduction, marks the border-land between these two conflicting methods. It is the last refuge of dogmatism. Granted its one premise, intuitionism obeys in all else the scientific method, or professes to. But this premise must not be questioned. If this is overthrown, it sees no escape from atheism. The being of God must be guaranteed to it by an immediate revelation, differing in kind not at all from the revelation claimed by the Church. The only difference is that this one, fundamental revelation is interior, made to the private soul by a transcendent or supernatural experience, rather than exterior, made to the whole world by a supernatural revealer. Thus the intuitionist philosophy retains the Christian method in establishing its one great premise, and adopts the scientific method in all other respects. It is thus "a house divided against itself," and it must fall. That I am not unfair in this criticism, will be apparent to any one who reads carefully the remarkable article on "Theism—Disaster in the Theistic Argument," contained in the British Quarterly Review for July last. I will quote some passages from this article, which I regard as the ablest and most philosophical defence of the intuitionist philosophy that I have ever read:—

"Finally, there is the argument which, when philosophically unfolded, is the only unassailable stronghold of the-

ism, its impregnable fortress, that of intuition. . . . It is simply the utterance or attestation of the soul in the presence of the Object which it does not so much discover by searching, as apprehend in the act of revealing itself. . . . It is not an argument, an inference, a conclusion. It is an attestation, the glimpse of a reality which is apprehended by the instinct of the worshipper, and through the poet's vision as much as by the gaze of the speculative reason. . . . The object of which we are in search is not a blank, colorless abstraction, or necessary entity. Suppose that a supreme existence were demonstrable, that bare entity is not the God of theism, the infinite intelligence and personality, of whose existence the human spirit desires some assurance, if it can be had. . . . It [the condemned theological argument] can never assure us [that those traces of intuition to which it invites our study proceeded from a constructive mind detached from the universe. [In this expression the old Christian idea of a God, outside of or above Nature is clearly assumed, without which, indeed, there could be no idea of intuiting him as an isolated "object."] . . . For the theist merely to proclaim, as an ultimate fact, that the human soul has an intuition of God, that we are endowed with a faculty of apprehension of which the correlative object is divine, will carry no conviction to the atheist. Suppose that he replies, "This intuition may be valid evidence for you, but I cannot see such irreproachable testimony, or evidence of innate ideas in the soul, or of a substance underneath the phenomena of Nature of which we can have any adequate knowledge." . . . We may close the argument by simple re-assertion, and vindicate our procedure on the ground that in the region of first principles there can be no further proof. . . . The very existence of the intuition of which we speak is itself a revelation, because pointing to a Revealer within or behind itself. . . . This, then, is the main characteristic of the theistic intuition. It proclaims a supreme Existence without and beyond the mind, which it apprehends in the act of revealing itself. . . . The intuitionist, on the other hand, perceives that a revelation has been made to him, descending as through an opened cloud, which closed again. . . . His knowledge is due not to the penetration of his own finite spirit, but to the condescension of the infinite. But we admit that this intuition is not naturally luminous. . . . When not lit up by light strictly supra-natural—because emanating from the object it discerns, all is dull and lustreless. . . . It will be found that all who deny the validity of our intuition either limit us to the knowledge of phenomena, or, while admitting that we have a certain knowledge of finite substance, adopt the cold theory of necience. [This is untrue, and shows a total ignorance of the grounds of scientific theism.] The assertion, therefore, that Nature, of which the physical sciences are the interpretation, does not reveal God by its phenomena, is as strongly asserted by the (intuitionist) theist as by the positivist. The God of (intuitionist) theism is no inference from phenomena, but, if we may so speak, a postulate of intuition.

On these passages, I wish only to say here that I object chiefly to the method they illustrate, as entirely irreconcilable with the method of science. The writer has no conception of scientific theism. For one, I frankly admit that I have no such intuition as he (or she) describes, as the subjective revelation of a supernatural object; yet I should be loth to possess a feeblish religious sentiment. The difference, I think, lies in the intellectual analysis and interpretation of experiences by no means monopolized by intuitionists, who usually express great respect for science, yet seem to feel that it would be a degradation to rest their belief in God on a scientific basis. They disparage "observation," forgetting that intuition is itself, only another name for "observation," and that, if they have an intuition of God, they must "observe" him. But a God that can be "observed," or (if the word is preferred) intuitively, as an "object," must be an object of sense,—the internal sense, it is true, but none the less of sense. In what respect is the internal sense, or the supposed intuitive faculty, superior in dignity to the external senses or common perceptive faculties? If God is an "object" of intuition, he is by that very fact an object of sense. The special intuitive faculty, admitting it to exist, is of a lower grade than the rational faculty by which scientific theism believes itself to know God. To me it seems a mere species of idolatry to worship a God that can be the "object" of any directly perceptive or sensuous faculty, whether dignified by the name of "intuition" or disparaged by the name of "observation"—both names really signifying the same thing. The understanding is derided by intuitionism as lower than the reason: but intuitionism reduces the reason to the level of a passively receptive faculty, a mere capacity of receiving sensuous impressions, and thus puts it far beneath the understanding, which is the active faculty of intellectual comprehension, the manifestation of mental vitality, the power of pure thought. I regard it as a nobler thing to comprehend than simply to behold,—a higher act to exercise the pure intellect than to receive impressions by any intuitive faculty, whether of outward or inward sense.

Is it possible that intuitionism suffers itself to fall into the perilous vanity which seems always to accompany the conceit of special private revelations? Not always, at least. But there is danger of it. The method is bad, radically bad; and it marks the confusion which now prevails between the Christian and the scientific method. Revelation has not yet given place to reason, but in intuitionism it has concluded a temporary compromise. In the end, however, this half-way house between the Christian method of supernatural revelation, and the scientific method of natural reason will be deserted, and stand only as a monument of half-developed thought. I feel more and more convinced that modern religion must, with a courageous faith, throw itself into the arms of science. In fact, science itself is meeting religion half way, by the confession of some of its most distinguished promoters. For instance, Mr. Alfred R. Wallace, referring to certain organic characteristics which he holds could not have been produced by natural selection, and which he thinks point to "the action of mind" among the forces which have produced them, says:—"I would further remark that this inquiry is as thoroughly scientific and legitimate as that into the origin of species itself. It is an attempt to solve the inverse problem, to deduce the existence of a new power of a definite character, in order to account for facts which according to the theory of natural selection ought not to happen. Such problems are well known to science, and the search after their solution has often led to the most brilliant results. In the case of man there are facts of the nature above alluded to; and, in calling attention to them and in inferring a cause for them, I believe that I am as strictly within the bounds of scientific investigation as I have been in any other portion of my work." [Contributions to the Theory of Natural Selection, p. 335. Compare preface, p. viii.]

Without expressing an opinion on the particular cases referred to, I fully believe that Mr. Wallace rightly includes such problems within the legitimate domain of scientific inquiry; and I rejoice in the fact. So also Prof. Huxley, in his admirable little work just reprinted by Appleton & Co. with the title "More Criticisms on Darwin and Administrative Nihilism," says:—"By science, I understand all knowledge which rests upon evidence and reasoning of a like character to that which claims our assent to ordinary scientific propositions. And if any one is able to make good the assertion that his theology rests upon valid evidence and sound reasoning, then it appears to me that such theology will take its place as a part of science." [p. 25.] If faith in God is good for anything,—if it is based on truth,—I fear no harm to it from the broad daylight of science. But if, like the owl, it is a night-bird, and can thrive only in the gloom of a mystery that science cannot penetrate, then I want none of it. "The prayer of Ajax was for light." I know no better prayer.

NATURE AND SUPERNATURE.

Inquiring, then, what is the first great result of the scientific method as applied to the idea of God, I think we shall find that the old distinction between the natural and the supernatural, between Nature and Supernature (if I may use the word), which has been ploughed so deeply into Christian thought, is fading into indistinctness, and will ultimately disappear. The old abhorrence of matter which once made men even ashamed of having bodies, and created so profound a contempt for the whole material universe that it was counted blasphemy to attribute to God any immediate control of it, was the true root out of which this distinction grew. Nature was held to be matter, and matter was held to be undivine,—or, as the phrases were "inert," "brute," and "dead." This debased conception of matter, though pushed to extravagant lengths by Christian theology, is not confined to it. Even Plato, the "greatest of the Greeks," made it part of his philosophy:—"Those, therefore, who say that Plato thought that 'Evil was inherent in matter,' though expressing themselves loosely, express themselves on the whole correctly. Matter was the great Necessity which Intelligence fashioned. Because it was Necessity and unintelligent, it was Evil, for Intelligence alone can be good." [Lewes' History of Philosophy, I, 262.] So also Plutarch:—"Matter is that first being which is substrate for generation, corruption, and all other alterations." [Plutarch's Morals, III, 122.] But the dynamical theory of matter, which reduces all material properties (extension alone excepted) to manifestations of force, dissipates the crude notion that matter is "inert" or "brute" or "dead." Difficult as it is to arrive at any exact definition of matter, the belief that it is the source of all evil holds no place in modern thinking; and the decay of this superstition is the decay of the ancient distinction between Nature and Supernature. The tendency of science is wholly in the direction of that conception of Nature which identifies it with all that is real; and if God is real, he can no longer be regarded as a reality outside of or above Nature. This I believe to be the necessary, though not as yet universally accepted, conclusion to which the growth of science is leading the human mind. I have been especially struck with this fact in reading Prof. Haeckel's recent and most masterly work, the "Natürliche Schöpfungsgeschichte." In this the protest is strong and pronounced against the idea of a "personal" (i. e. a supernatural) Creator or God; yet I find little or nothing really in conflict with the idea of God to which I believe science is tending. Haeckel believes in the identity of all substance, advocates the doctrine of Monism, and declares himself willing to share the reproach of "pantheism" with Bruno and Spinoza, Lessing and Goethe. He even advocates the idea of a "spiritualization of matter" [die Besetzung der Materie]; and his work is a striking illustration of the modern reaction against all forms of supernaturalism.

The best thought of to-day regards Nature as the All. There is nothing out side of or above it, any more than there can be something outside of or above infinite Space. To insist that God is supernatural is to doom the idea of all Divine Being to a slow but inevitable extinction. Such appears to me to be the irrepressible decree of modern science. I accept the total abolition of the old dualism of Nature and Supernature as the first step in the advance of mankind from the theological to the scientific idea of God. This radical revolution or "change of base" in religious thinking is demanded by the substitution of the scientific for the Christian method. Its consequences must be indeed profound. But if any one declares that it is a suicidal step for religion to take,—that the abandonment of the distinction between Nature and Supernature is the death warrant of all high faith in God,—I reply that it is a step from lower to higher thought, an advance from superstitious to educated faith. Not to take this step is to ensure the triumph of atheism in the not distant future. Such, at least, is my firm conviction. But even if I am mistaken in welcoming this step, I see no help for it. The educated world is actually taking it, and coming more and more to regard Nature as all in all—as containing within itself the totality of all being. Whether I am able or not to perceive the ultimate results of this passage from the Christian to the Scientific standpoint, the passage is inevitable; and without taking counsel of fear whether the increase of human intelligence may not bring old truths into perpetual eclipse, I address myself to the nobler task of learning what new truths I can by this added light.

THE TWO GREAT DISCOVERIES.

The present age has witnessed the establishment of two great principles in scientific investigation,—the principle that, whenever force disappears in one form, its reappearance must be looked for in some other form,—and the principle that, no matter what changes, or events, or developments take place in the universe, their causes must be sought within Nature, and not outside of or above it.

The first of these principles is implied in the great discovery of the "conservation and correlation of forces," or, as Herbert Spencer more aptly names it the "persistence of force." Through the labors of Rumford, Grove, Joule, Mayer, Helmholtz, Tyndall, Carpenter, and the other powerful minds whose combined genius has brought to light this grandest of all known laws of Nature, the great truth that the universe is a unit, long held by philosophy as a speculation, has been inductively established by science as a fact. Various as may be its manifestations, there is but one Power in Nature, uncreateable and indestructible, omnipresent, infinite, and eternal. Incapable of augmentation or diminution, appearing and disappearing and re appearing, it is the One in the Many, the Permanent in the Transient. Thus the old dream of a "creation" either vanishes altogether or merges into the modern conception of endless metamorphosis of the uncreated; and the birth of Nature, celebrated in all cosmogonies as a momentary supernatural event, becomes in modern thought an eternal natural process. If thus the miraculous "beginning of all things," so much relied on as a pet proof of the Deity, slips from the fingers of theology forever, none the less is the history of all things rescued from the contempt heaped upon it by those who see nothing divine in the common. Rash and eager theologians, like James Martineau [Essays, Philosophical and Theological, "Nature and God," 1866] and the writer in the Quarterly Review already quoted, have leaped to the conclusion that this one Energy pervading the universe is reducible to Will. But science disallows such hasty reduction. The analogies of the human will, like arrows shot at the sun, fall back without reaching the mark. Nature refuses to lend herself to such anthropomorphic interpretations, and insists that the debris of the old supernaturalism shall not be emptied into her domain as into a vacant city-lot. Nevertheless, in this magnificent truth that the universe is a unit,—that Nature is the eternal self-expression of infinite and omnipresent Power,—I cannot but discern the first grand element of that idea of God of which science shall yet be the architect.

The other great principle I referred to is implied by the law of Evolution—more particularly the law of genealogical descent which Mr. Darwin has shown to include, not only individuals, but also species. The nebular hypothesis of Laplace and the uniformitarian theory of Hutton were incomplete till supplemented by the Darwinian theory in biology. Sociology, history, ethics, philosophy, religion, all illustrate the same great law of evolution, as treated by all the best and latest writers; but the origin of species was the stronghold of supernaturalism until Darwin and Wallace had scientifically formulated the law of Natural Selection. The luminous vindication of the unity and universality of natural law which science owes to their labors in a region previously haunted by the nocturnal depredators privileged to prey on the common sense of mankind, has been the heaviest blow struck of late years at the effete theology of the past. The philosophical and religious value of the Darwinian theory lies in this fact, that it throws the light of reason into a corner of science itself whither the bats and owls had betaken themselves, fancying it sacred to darkness forever. A brave flapping of wings and ruffling of plumage and blinding of eyes has there been, since the daylight streamed unexpectedly into that nook! Henceforth science shall shine there also, and the surprised marauders shall stand as stuffed specimens in some museum of extinct superstitions. And no one shall mourn save those who believe that light is irreligious, and taxidermy a sacrilege.

The law of evolution brings into harmony the facts which had been disrupted by the belief of miraculous interventions in the course of Nature. The creation of the universe, the cataclysmal epochs of the earth's history, the birth of new species, had been the strongholds of supernaturalism. Now they are all razed to the ground. Not only is unity of Power a fixed fact hereafter, but also unity of Law. In the favorite phrase of Alexander von Humboldt, universal Nature is "ein lebendiges Ganze"—"a living Whole." That conception is the glory of science. It marks the triumph of intellect over its environment. It gives to human life a sublime ideal, and converts the Stoic's grand aspiration of "living according to Nature" into the highest law of civilized man. To bring human society and the human soul into unity with the great Whole of which these are parts becomes thus the chief end of the religion based on science; and when Bryant concludes his "Forest Hymn" with these elevated lines—

"Be it ours to meditate,
In these calm shades, thy milder majesty,
And to the beautiful order of thy works
Learn to conform the order of our lives," he expresses with great dignity and beauty the innermost spirit of the faith which, under the influence of science, is silently shaping itself in the heart of the modern world.

THE FADING POLYTHEISM OF SCIENCE.

From these two great discoveries, namely, the unity of all natural forces as varying manifestations of one infinite, omnipresent, and eternal Force, and the unity of all natural events as parts of a universal process of cosmical evolution, two great truths are deducible which must powerfully affect the development of the philosophical science of the future. The first of these truths is that science is gradually passing out of the polytheistic into the monotheistic stage.

The main thesis of Materialism is that all phenomena whatsoever, whether in outward Nature or in the human consciousness, are explicable by the ultimate "properties of matter." These properties are eternal and undervived; they exist in and by themselves as inseparable from the various forms of matter; they constitute all that we know of matter, and must be accepted as ultimate facts, explaining everything else, but remaining themselves unexplained. "Nitrogen, carbon, hydrogen, oxygen, sulphur, and phosphorus," says Moleschott, "possess their inherent qualities from eternity." "Matter," says Dubois-Reymond, "is not a coach, to which you could fasten or from which you could remove forces as if they were horses. A particle of iron is, and remains, the same, whether it crosses the horizon in the meteoric stone, rushes along in the wheel of the locomotive, or circulates in the blood-globule through the temples of the poet. These qualities are eternal, inalienable, and untransferable." So Prof. Haeckel, of Jena, explains all phenomena as "the necessary consequence of active causes which inhere in the chemical combinations of matter itself and in its physical properties." In a very remarkable lecture [translated in THE INDEX, Nos. 42 and 43], Prof. Hering, of Vienna, includes memory among the inherent properties of organized matter, and refers to it the wonderful phenomena of the reproduction of parental forms; which, considering that memory is a purely intellectual function and cannot be classed among physical properties at all, is a strange begging of the question. His theory reminds me of the Svabhāvika school of Buddhists, one of whose opinions, according to Abel-Rémusat, is that "matter is eternal as well as its properties, which possess not only activity but intelligence." [Mélanges Posthumes, p. 156.] This conception of matter as the only substance, and all natural forces as the mere properties or qualities of it, is the essence of Materialism in all its thorough-going forms.

Nor is this conception of ultimate properties of matter confined to consistent adherents of the materialistic school. A semi-materialistic philosophy is indicated in what has been until recently the prevalent opinion among English scientific men, namely, that the "Creator" imparted to matter at the "creation" all its present properties by means of which all natural phenomena are to be explained. Dr. Buckland, for instance, speaks of "the properties adopted by the elements at the moment of their creation;" and the author of "Vestiges of the Natural History of the Creation" says:—"The Eternal Sovereign arranges a solar or an astral system by dispositions imparted primordially to matter." [p. 104 and 103, eleventh edition.]

Now this reference of all events in Nature to the properties of matter as ultimate causes constitutes what I might call the polytheism of science. It splits up primal Being into a multitude of independent, though unintelligent, powers, and attributes to their blind, hap-hazard conjunctions or collisions the production of the universe as it is. Between these various properties no relationship can be detected, because each is conceived to be an ultimate fact, isolated and unrelated. That carbon happens to have one set of properties, chlorine another, and so forth, cannot be explained on this materialistic hypothesis; but by the properties as they exist must all facts be explained. The only fundamental difference I can discern between this theory of the universe and that, for instance, of the Greek mythology, is that the latter makes the world ruled by a group of semi-intelligent powers, while the former makes the world ruled by a group of wholly unintelligent powers. The contrast seems to be in favor of the Greek mythology. Against materialists as such I have no prejudice whatsoever; and against philosophical materialism itself I have no objections on moral grounds. But against materialism as a philosophy of Nature I have the strongest objections, since it appears to me not to be a philosophy at all, but rather a degeneration of mythological religion. It is neither more nor less than polytheism in the only form possible in modern times. It renders impossible any high conception of the unity of the universe, any true appreciation of Humboldt's "living Whole," any deep insight into the real drift and tendency of modern scientific thought. I expect to be bitterly assailed for saying this, and absurdly charged with all manner of assaults on materialists as men, although I respect them according to their individual character, and have found them as noble as any other class; but none the less it is true that materialism, attributing all phenomena to disconnected properties of matter as ultimate causes, and making these the only gods it recognizes, is neither philosophy nor science, but rather a system of polytheism in which the deities have sunk into mere metaphysical entities or abstractions. I object to it only on intellectual grounds, as failing to satisfy the philosophical demand for unity. Instead of recognizing the One in the Many, it sees the Many alone, and therefore contents itself with purely superficial explanations.

THE NASCENT MONOTHEISM OF SCIENCE.

Out of this bewildering and baffling confusion of independent, unrelated, and ultimate properties of matter, which for long seemed the only alternative to Mosaic cosmogonies and arbitrary supernaturalisms, the great discovery of the persistence of force opened a door of escape. The properties of matter were metamorphosed into affections of matter, or "different modes of Motion," as Grove called them in 1842. All forces were resolved into one Force. A new view of matter itself was involved in this great change, which has been thus expressed by Alfred R. Wallace:—"It is surely a great step in advance to get rid of the notion that matter is a thing of itself . . . that force or the forces of Nature are another thing, given or added to matter, or else its necessary properties . . . and to be able to substitute . . . the far simpler and more consistent belief that matter, as an entity distinct from force, does not exist." [Natural Selection, p. 389. I omit some parts of this passage which may admit of more doubt.] In the great principle of the conservation or persistence of force, and the consequent metamorphosis of the old-fashioned "properties of matter" into "modes of motion," I believe that modern science has laid the foundation for a natural idea of God. No longer will it be necessary to seek him outside of Nature, or above it; science itself, in this overpowering sublime conception of a unitary Power commensurate with time and space, is becoming our guide to him. Henceforth the study of Nature in its entirety must be that "searching of the scriptures" from which so much has been hitherto hoped in vain. A principle of unity has been discovered that links the pebble at your feet to the remotest nebula of the galaxy, and the beating of the human heart to the twinklings of the stars. I am very far from saying that the simple unity of force throughout the universe is enough to constitute the idea of God. But this I do say, that the discovery of this unity has first made possible the development of a monotheism based exclusively on scientific grounds. I cannot follow even so cautious a thinker as Dr. Carpenter when he says that the "sense of effort" is the "form of Force which may be taken as the type of all the rest;" for I hesitate to push human analogies too confidently. It is easy to frame plausible theories, but harder to discover truth. I can only say now that the great discovery of the unity of all forces as modes of one Force sweeps away the foundation of materialistic polytheism, and points the deeper scientific thought of the age in the direction of monotheism.

THE INTELLIGIBILITY OF NATURE.

From the second great discovery of modern science to which I referred, that of the law of evolution, it appears that, at least so far as it lies open to human eyes, the history of the universe is a connected whole. The course of events is not an endless repetition, the tiresome and everlasting spinning of a top about its own axis. Studied by intelligence, Nature becomes intelligible. From the fiery chaos of the limitless nebulousity, beyond which science cannot penetrate, to the cosmos of universal beauty and use which surrounds us, there has been an orderly and gradual progression. It is as if there had been in the whole process a regular march of thought—the development of a universal idea, I say as if; for it would be unbecoming to say more, however strong may be my own assurance that the appearance is a reality. Supposing that Mind had forecast the history of Nature with the intent to bring about the present order of things, it is impossible to conceive a more magnificently successful execution of the plan. It may be impossible to demonstrate this; but he would be as rash a man as king Alphonso of Castile who should fancy that he could have designed a grander or more admirable fulfilment of the purpose to evolve a universe. I think it to be in harmony with a rigidly scientific method to attribute the existent result to the only cause that will really explain it—namely, the ever-present activity of Mind. How the one Force of the universe should have pursued the pathway of evolution through the lapse of millions of ages, leaving traces so legible by intelligence to-day, unless from beginning to end the whole process had been dominated by Intelligence itself, it passes my ingenuity even to conjecture. To say that it must have been as it has been, is to evade, not answer, the question. The question may be indeed unanswerable; yet when an answer lies ready to our hand, an answer which, if accepted, would illuminate so much that is dark,—it deserves at least the most respectful consideration from science itself. I ask no concession to sentiment, which should follow, not lead; for every mind of virile power must acquiesce in the treatment of purely intellectual problems by purely intellectual methods. But viewing the universe as the result of a process of evolution stretching back into eternity, and finding this process grow daily more and more intelligible, I believe that science will sooner or later recognize the fact that, in the nature of things, no better proof of the intelligence of the cause could be conceived than the intelligibility of the effect. The more law science discovers in Nature, and the more clearly it perceives the tendency of all natural law to ultimate in a higher evolution of the universe, so much the stronger must this proof become. Every new adaptation that is brought to light strengthens the argument; and when the last seeming anomaly shall have been resolved into harmony with the great whole, the argument will have become demonstration.

Moreover, so sure has modern science become that the system of Nature as a whole is thoroughly intelligible that conspicuous instances can be cited in which pure a priori deduction has led to the discovery of facts previously unobserved. When, for instance, from the general analogies of the mammalian skeleton, Goethe inferred that the intermaxillary bone must exist in man as well as in the brutes, and found his anticipations verified by the fact; or when, from the law of gravitation and the perturbations of Uranus, Leverrier inferred the existence of an undiscovered planet, and directed the telescope of Galle towards the very spot in the heavens where it was found; or when Sir William R. Hamilton, from the mathematical consequences of the undulatory theory of light, inferred the existence, at four points, of luminous conical envelopes whenever light is transmitted through crystals having two optic axes, and thus led Dr. Lloyd to the discovery of conical refraction,—in all these cases the intelligibility of Nature was assumed and experimentally proved. That is, admitting that genuine facts are taken for premises, it is to be anticipated that the deductions of pure reason will be borne out by experience, even in hitherto unexplored regions of natural phenomena. Science will not always be blind to the enormous theistic value of such a principle as this. It shows that the laws of thought are also laws of being,—that Nature is intelligible because it is itself intelligence,—that man can comprehend the universe because both he and it are equally permeated by immanent mind. The moment that science fairly fronts the great problems of religious thought, which will never be solved again to human belief until science solves them, the unspeakable importance of such cases as I have cited will be duly recognized.

TELEOLOGY.

If what I have been saying is of real value, it will appear that the two great discoveries of modern science, the conservation of force and the law of evolution, must eventually give to it a vast impulse in the direction of religious inquiry. The one establishes the unity of the universe in respect to Force; the other establishes the unity of the universe in respect to Law. One Force rules throughout Space; one Law rules throughout Time; and the Force and the Law are themselves explicable as one only as mind. To this conclusion I believe that modern science is cautiously but surely approaching.

But I shall be met at once with the rebuff that these two discoveries, and especially the evolutionary theory as applied to biology, have forever disposed of the old argument from design. Prof. Huxley, in his "Lay Sermons" [pp. 301—304] argues that "teleology, as commonly understood, had received its death-blow at Mr. Darwin's hands." I admit it; for the argument from design is usually limited to the special adaptations of organ to function, for which a non-teleological cause is found in the law of natural selection. But the adaptation of the universal environment to the evolution of universal organic life admits of no such explanation. No cause has ever been assigned why the net result of all events taken as a whole should be what it is,—why all influences should so wonderfully conspire to develop a cosmos out of chaos and a magnificent fauna and flora out of proto-plasmic sameness,—why the system of Nature should work thus undeviatingly in one continuous direction. If it is said that this must have been, and could not have been otherwise, I reply that this must is the very thing to be explained. Nature might have been forever, for aught we know, a huge seething cauldron of warring elements, tending to no peace and productive of no result. Why must it have been what it is rather than that? Scientific men cheat themselves if they swallow that must as an antidote to the discomfort of puzzling queries. The queries cannot thus be quieted. There is a large teleology, not mousing about in petty details nor aiming to prove God piece-meal, but sweeping over the whole field of thought, which finds an answer to those queries in the idea of Infinite Mind. In a later paper quoted by St. George Mivart [Genesis of Species, p. 273], Prof. Huxley himself says:—"It is necessary to remark that there is a wider teleology which is not touched by the law of evolution, but is actually based upon the fundamental proposition of evolution."

The teleological and the mechanical views of Nature are not necessarily mutually exclusive; on the contrary, the more purely a mechanist the speculator is, the more firmly does he assume a primordial molecular arrangement, of which all the phenomena of the universe are the consequence; and the more completely is he at the mercy of the teleologist, who can always defy him to disprove that this primordial molecular arrangement was not intended to evolve the phenomena of the universe." The larger teleology, however, in which I believe, has nothing to do with "primordial arrangements of matter," and rests on dynamical rather than on mechanical conceptions. If the mechanist assumes "primordial arrangements," he occupies what the Germans call a "conquered stand-point." The teleology I would urge is the unity of plan which must result from unity of force and unity of law, if these two are made one in mind; and this unity of plan I hold to be a far truer explanation of the evolution of an orderly universe out of chaotic nebula than the arbitrary must of the pure mechanist.

NOT LESS BUT MORE THAN PERSON.

The question may be put in your thought—"Is this God of science, admitting that science is indeed tending towards the recognition of God, to be regarded as Person, or otherwise?"

A difficult question. Yet the difficulty is chiefly one of language. I find the word person so differently used that it involves one in misapprehension either to affirm or deny that God is personal. For this reason I hesitate to use the word at all with reference to him. In a strictly philosophical use of it, or at least in my own use of it, I should answer organization. This is the working basis of all Evangelical churches in both hemispheres; it is the ancient fixed platform of Protestant Christianity; and it is the authoritative, contemporaneous utterance of the "modern" Church. Read it carefully, and then judge for yourself, whether we are unjust to "modern" Christianity in identifying it with the great system which from the beginning has been known as "orthodox." And, in reading it, do not forget that this is the Christianity that now begins to claim the right to rule this country in virtue of radical changes to be wrought in the United States Constitution. Shall that claim be allowed?

1. The divine inspiration, authority and sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures.
2. The right and duty of private judgment in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures.
3. The Unity of the Godhead and the Trinity of the Persons therein.
4. The utter depravity of human nature in consequence of the fall.
5. The incarnation of the Son of God, his work of atonement for the sins of mankind, and his mediatorial intercession and reign.
6. The justification of the sinner by faith alone.
7. The work of the Holy Spirit in the justification and sanctification of the sinner.
8. The immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, the judgment of the world by our Lord Jesus Christ, with the eternal blessedness of the righteous and the eternal punishment of the wicked.
9. The Divine institution of the Christian ministry, the obligation and perpetuity of the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

"FOR CHRIST'S SAKE."

A writer in the London Sunday Teachers' Treasury tells of his success in winning the love of rough or insubordinate boys, whom others have counted hopeless; and adds, as to his peculiar "way with children," that has proved so effective for good:

"If I have 'a way,' it is a way the Lord has given me in answer to prayer—a way to work with, a way of intensely respecting every human soul and every little child Christ lets me help, for his blessed sake. 'You take as much pains for such an one,' I am told, 'as you would for the richest man in England.' Aye, verily, when the indications of Providence are that, in the Sunday school or elsewhere, a soul which Christ has died for is given to me for the time to help and take care of for him, immediately that soul is invested with sacredness. I cannot feel vexed with faults. I cannot jest with other teachers about amusing mistakes. I cannot stop short of feeling the utmost respect and consideration for the angel within them that is to be developed. I seem to hear the whispered command, 'Do this for me.' As those whom Christ loves and desires me to help for him, my scholars are clothed with a wonderful interest to me. I respect them. Human nature likes respect. It is quick to perceive it. It appeals through some subtle sense to the best capabilities within. By 'respect' I mean neither indulgence nor flattery; but gentle earnestness of treatment, with the most delicate consideration for each personal right. It wins. It develops self respect and leads to right action. Try it."

I know not how it is with others, but it fills me with a strange mingling of sympathy and repulsion to read such a statement as this above. It is like reading some reverie of a Roman Catholic or Mohomedan or Buddhist saint,—some Francis de Sales or Rabia or Ananda,—where the sublimest thoughts yet rest on some basis of theology so strange, that one shakes his head while admiring. It is like looking at the leaning tower of Pisa,—the strange angle at which it is set increases the wonder, but destroys the pleasure.

Nothing can be finer apparently than this man's dealing with children and with the ignorant. It reminds me of one Christmas Day when I heard Octavius Frothingham tell to the children of his congregation, in his own graphic words, the story of the "Luck of Roaring Camp." But the strange motive of it, in this good man's mind! To serve your fellow-men, not for their own sakes, but for the sake of some one whom he believes to have been more than man! To devote yourself to a poor and ignorant boy, not because he is your fellow creature and your heart goes out to him,—but because Christ desires you to help him! How is it possible to feel the same interest, when moved by this indirect appeal, as by a direct one? If I see opportunity to save a drowning man from the water, or from the worse destruction of crime and despair I certainly am not moved to do it for Christ's sake. God forbid that I should require so indirect a stimulus. It is done for the man's own.

Hue and Gabet, the Jesuit missionaries, travelling in Thibet found a kindly and affectionate population, always ready to help them, and always using the maxim "Are we not all brethren?" Cannot a Christian do as much, and for the same reason? Apparently not, according to this witness. "As those whom Christ loves and desires me to help for him, my scholars are clothed with a wonderful interest to me!" Aye, and is this all? "No more, but so?" But truly noble souls, whatever their professed faith, find the most degraded man "clothed with a wonderful interest," not so much because Christ loved him as because they love him for themselves. When Wilberforce bade Clarkson think of his soul, he answered that he had no time,—that he could think only of the slaves in the West Indies. Those who would help mankind must do it from direct sympathy; if their hearts are warm, they have no time to send their sympathies round by the way of Christ. I don't believe that even this good man waits for that—except when he writes for the Sunday Teachers' Treasury.

T. W. H.

THE HIGHER LAW.

In a recent number of THE INDEX I gave it as my opinion that individual liberty is impossible unless there is an individual integrity behind it. To this statement I now add another. Integrity is the basis of all genuine liberty, whether personal or social, and therefore it is the true basis of a free government.

Let us imagine a community of profligate men and abandoned women, of thieves, incendiaries, and murderers. In such a community, authority sustained by force may preserve order, but it cannot secure liberty. On the other hand imagine a society composed exclusively of virtuous, intelligent, and wise men and women. In this Utopia both individual and social despotism are impossible; here, necessary officials will assume public responsibilities, the authority of a free people is vested in them and they will perform such public duties as are essential to social welfare, without the assistance of force, or, to speak more accurately, without resort to coercion.

Leaving our imaginary communities, let us now look at society in its actual conditions. Society is composed of good, indifferent and bad; intelligent and stupid; educated and ignorant; wise and foolish people; and, again, the good are not always intelligent, the bad are not always stupid, the educated are frequently both foolish and vicious, the ignorant or uneducated are often virtuous and sometimes wise. Notwithstanding this conglomeration of character, in regard to some matters, society is practically a unit; it is safe to assert with Mr. Mill that "some things are so assured as to be sufficient for the purpose of human life." In ordinary phraseology, they are called self-evident truths; but beyond these we encounter almost as many opinions as there are members of a community. Men differ honestly and widely in their judgment and convictions. For example, every one admits that unjustifiable homicide is murder, and that murder is a crime; but a homicide that is excusable in my judgment, is condemned by my neighbor, while the ultra non-resistant denounces all homicide.

Conflict of opinion and conviction, produce conflict of action; and if every individual attempts to enforce his own views regardless of those of others, and is not restrained, the effort will result in anarchy; if society, through government, undertakes to suppress individual liberty by deciding in every case what is best for each individual, the effort, if successful, must end in despotism. To avoid our Scylla and Charybdis, to preserve personal liberty, and to promote social welfare, is the function of government.

At present the simple statement of this proposition must suffice; for I desire primarily to call attention to the question inevitably suggested by it,—What is the duty of the individual where his convictions lead him into a conflict with society? Shall he yield to the demands of law, or shall he obey his convictions and suffer the consequences? There can be but one rational answer to such a question. Every man owes it to society no less than to himself, to be faithful to his own conscience; not that his convictions are necessarily right, but what the Quakers call the "light within," what the abolitionists designated the "higher law," is nearer to infallibility than any other guide that man has. However imperfectly it may assert itself, it is nevertheless, to each man, the central point of his character, and whether he shall be divinely human or a human brute, depends upon whether he builds upon it or buries it.

The Abolitionists saved this nation when they repudiated the government, refused to obey the fugitive slave law, and denounced slavery as a crime. Men who stultify themselves in obedience to law, not only sacrifice personal liberty, but undermine social freedom and invite social despotism. Had Daniel Webster succeeded in persuading us to "conquer our prejudices," we should have become a nation of slaves. The most dangerous class in the community is that of the indifferents; men who haven't time to give to town meetings, who refuse to act upon school committees, who absent themselves from the polls, who obey the law without question. They may seek to escape personal responsibility by a disbursement of "charities;" their names, unless they are too penurious, can be seen on any popular subscription paper; yet they put out "the light within," stifle the "still, small voice" and are the victims of their own selfish impulses. If this class should be compelled to construct a government, they would instinctively adopt Rousseau's "Contrat Social." And after hiring officials to run the machine, to see to the enforcement of the contract, would drop into the old ruts, glad enough to resume their selfish, occupations.

I am entirely aware that conceptions of duty often lead men into strange paths; into paths where thorns grow, and fortunately always will grow. I know that, as Mr. Frothingham has wittily said, "perspiration is mistaken for inspiration." Theological convictions in particular being based mainly upon superstition, lead to intolerance and bigotry, and, where the fangs have not been drawn, to persecution. The effort now in progress, to Christianize our government, is a case in point. But for all this, our personal and social salvation depend upon our faith in and recognition of the "Higher Law." A man with a wrong sense of duty is a far better member of society than one who is void of all sense of duty. The consciousness of personal rectitude is the best guarantee of good citizenship.

Force or coercion will always be an element of government, for we cannot hope to subdue all selfishness or to attain to an interpretation of the Divine Law, so enlightened and rational as to secure entire harmony of interest and unity of purpose; but the government based upon force is a despotism, while a free society is secure in its freedom only so long as it realizes the prevalence of personal integrity and constructs its government upon it.

If any readers of THE INDEX are inclined to charge me with dealing in platitudes, I ask them to look about them; and they cannot fail to perceive on the one hand a marked inclination toward social despotism, arising from a decreasing faith in the divine character of human nature; on the other hand there is a strong tendency toward social anarchy, from the mistaken notion that individual liberty means personal irresponsibility. At such a time we cannot do better than to re-assert our faith in the possibilities of humanity, and in the absolute necessity of fidelity to conscience. And with our re-assertion we do well to suggest in pronounced terms, the correlative obligations resting upon society and every individual member of it.

R. P. H.

FALSE TENDERNESS.

MR. EDITOR:—

You are not generally found fault with on that side, but I must say there seemed to me a touch of popular sentimentality to your commendation of Robert Collyer, a very pardonable, but not, it seems to me, wise or praiseworthy act of saving his children's playthings from the fire in preference to his own manuscripts or books. It seems to me an instance of a very common want of presence of mind in estimating the real value of things at a critical moment. Had it been necessary clothing for the children, or portraits, or the family photograph book, it would have had either the importance of great and pressing need or that of a treasure which could not be replaced. But of how much more value to those very children would hereafter be the books their father had studied and loved, or his manuscripts, than "the playthings of an hour."

As showing the natural tenderness of the good man, the story is pertinent to his beautiful "Study of Christianity," but otherwise is it not a little tainted with that superstitious worship of children, which I sometimes think is going to supplant all other forms of devotion, and destroy all our natural enjoyment in these little buds of human life?

E. D. C.

We advise those of our readers who contemplate ordering books by mail to notice the advertisement of Mr. Stebbins on our last page. Our own experience convinces us that they cannot do better, or find anywhere a more enterprising and obliging dealer.

LONDON TOPICS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

Sir,—Since I wrote last all the world of thinkers and Free thinkers has been thrown into a state of cheerful excitement by the appearance of a book entitled "Christian Theology and Modern Scepticism," (published by Bain, Haymarket, London.) The book is charmingly simple and straightforward, giving with singular accuracy the conclusions of New Testament criticism which have been arrived at by trustworthy students up the present time.

To many readers there is hardly anything new in the book, except its pleasant freshness of style and its quiet but determined endeavor to make the advocates of Christianity see what has been so long under their very eyes and noses.

The excitement, however, is chiefly if not entirely due to the fact that this book is written by a Duke. The Duke of Somerset has not only written it for the edification of his contemporaries, but has published it with his name in full. Such a stretch of condescension cannot be appreciated on your side of the Atlantic. That a Duke could be found to give Theology not merely a passing thought, but many hours of careful reading and careful writing is a wonder which Mrs. Grundy will not soon understand; but that he should absolutely draw public attention to his own heresies in a manner so certain to be successful is a shock to that old lady's nerves quite terrible to contemplate.

In England of course we like Dukes very much indeed; we have our private reasons for the estimation in which their titles and estates are held; but we are never so proud of them as when they throw a good share of their influence into a cause which has been hitherto struggling to survive the oppressive indifference of the upper classes of society. It has been almost a fashion here for some time to past to taboo the very names of Theology and Religion. Loungers at clubs affect the utmost unconcern for these matters as being only of interest to clergy and the shopkeepers. Of course this indifference is sometimes genuine, but more often it is only assumed as a cloak to hide real sentiments which any hint at being interested might betray one into exposing.

The Duke of Somerset—unless he be left to stand alone—will change all this. He will, by his irresistible arguments, force the present perfectly rotten condition Christianity upon the notice of his peers and all who aspire to be their friends. It is true he was not by any means unsupported in the House of Lords when he spoke in favor of the abolition of University Tests, but many of us set that down to a common weariness of theological disputes in connection with Education. By the way, our Education bill is such a miserable failure, so far. We want some sturdy Gallio to drive all the ministers of religion from the judgment-seat—to say to them: "Legislation will have nothing to do with any of you. You have have all the Sunday schools, what would you have more? We won't have you thrusting yourselves, your Bibles, and your Catechisms into the week-day schools while our children are being taught arithmetic and social science." But governments do not get stronger, I find. They are daily growing weaker and exist more than ever on concessions and petty compromises. Gladstone's team could never draw such a weight up such a hill as the really needed measure of Education would be in the teeth of theological rivalry.

I promised myself that I would say something this mail about our new movement in London. You will see by the enlarged circular which I enclose how many fresh adherents we have had since last October. It is significant too, that more money has been subscribed in four months for the purpose of establishing me in a Church in London than was collected in two years for my Defence fund. You will see also many new names of clergymen, which is a hopeful sign, though I have still the support of only two Bishops. Men of scientific eminence also openly express their sympathy, but neither Huxley nor Tyndall are religious enough to care about the movement at all. Sir Charles Lyell and Charles Darwin, per contra are a host in themselves.

More gratifying in one respect than anything else is the support I receive from the Jews. Nearly all Jews of any culture are much more Theists than strict believers in, and followers of, Moses; and my eyes glisten again to see them coming to join in our worship, and with the courtesy of their race conforming to our customs of uncovering the head and of kneeling in prayer. But then they have such a genius for worship, such an exalted taste in all matters of ritual and liturgy. Nothing can be more grand than their service at the Synagogue in Berkeley street.

It is quite possible that we may be able to organize a kind of league to remove or alleviate all preventible sufferings. A sermon of mine in which this subject was introduced caused such an amount of enthusiastic interest that the Eastern Post printed it verbatim, and 30,000 copies have been issued by the "Voysey Establishment" Committee. I send you one for reproduction in THE INDEX should you desire it. On the following Sunday I entered into the details of the scheme which seemed to give general satisfaction.

Our service is, with rare exceptions, greatly admired. There is just enough of the old 'Church' element in it to smooth the way for its acceptance with the Church people, and yet it is so free from Christology and other forms of orthodox traditionism, that it is enjoyed by many who have not attended any place of worship for years.

All we want is the modest sum of $20,000, though a quarter of that would be a good start, to make our foundation sure. We only meet in a hall which is used for various purposes, and English people do like to have their services conducted in a place by itself—set apart for that purpose alone. Considering the strength of this feeling, it is a wonder that we get the congregations which assemble at St. George's Hall every week.

The attention of the public is now being summoned to the question of the State Church; and it is remarkable how opinions are divided amongst those who never thought of anything else but "Dis-establishment." But I will defer this subject till my next letter.

Very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E., }
January 27, 1872. }

MORE PETITIONS.

The following lists of signatures to the Counter-Petition have been received since our last issue:

Mr. W. W. Moore sends one hundred and forty-three names from Milan, Ohio; Mr. C. R. Purdy sends fifteen from Poughkeepsie, N. Y.; Mr. Edw. G. Windegger sends eighteen from St. Louis, Missouri; Mr. A. G. Willey sends forty-six from Spencer Township, Medina Co., Ohio; Mr. W. H. Prentice sends sixty from Sheboygan Falls, Wisconsin; Mr. J. P. Robinson sends one hundred and twenty-seven from De Soto, Kansas; Mr. J. V. R. Wert sends nine from Groveland, Illinois; Mr. P. Thompson sends twenty-two from Saratoga Springs, New York; Mr. S. J. Sprague sends forty-six, but does not mention from what place; Mr. G. W. Clary sends seventy-five from Birmingham, Ohio; Mr. T. K. Peck sends forty-nine from Canterbury, Conn.; Mr. H. Denecke sends sixty-three from Maumee City, Ohio; Mr. John Flint sends one hundred and two from Webster, Mass.; Mr. John W. Griffin sends two hundred and seven from Dunreith, Indiana; Mr. Edwin Hedderly sends thirty-one from Minnetonka, Minnesota; Mr. John Hechtman sends one hundred and eighteen from Osseo, Minnesota; Mr. Edwin Farquhar sends fifteen from Aukenytown, Ohio; Mr. E. Holmes sends twenty names from Port Crescent, Michigan; Mr. John O. Skinner sends twenty-one from Warren, Michigan; Mr. James Forbes sends sixty-six from Dudley, Mass.; Mr. Allen Colburn sends forty-six from Boston, Mass.; Mr. W. P. Wilson sends eighty-seven from Battle Creek, Michigan; Mr. C. D. Miller sends nine from Marathon, Michigan; Mr. W. J. Tillotson sends eleven from Oneida, New York; Mr. D. C. Thayer sends one hundred and forty-four from Linesville, Penna.; Mr. William Barnsdall sends forty-three from Titusville, Penna.; Mr. Morris Einstein sends two hundred and thirty from Titusville, Penna.; from Holland, Ohio, thirty-six names; Mr. J. M. Cathcart sends forty-five from Bristol, Indiana; Mr. Geo. B. Berry sends sixteen from Stafford Corner, New Hampshire; Mr. J. Ulrich, Editor Nord Stern, sends seventy-seven from La Crosse, Wisconsin; Mr. C. R. Woodward sends fifty-five from Cairo, Illinois; Mr. Wm. W. Lobdell sends three hundred and eleven from Calhoun Co., Michigan; Mr. B. B. Smith sends sixty-six from Lansing, Michigan; Mr. Geo. Lamb sends twenty-three from New Cambridge, Maryland; Mr. A. Oberndorf, Jr., sends four hundred and seventeen names from Baltimore, Maryland, thirty-five of which were procured by Mr. V. Scheer, eighty-six by Mr. W. A. Danskin, thirty-one by Mr. Levi Weber, thirty-five by R. Miles Le Poer, thirteen by Mr. Theo. B. Fox, fifty-eight by Mr. Henry Scheib, twenty-four by Mr. H. Morris; Mr. N. L. Holstein sends eighty-four from Akron, Ohio; Mr. Jere. Brockway sends one hundred and thirty-one from Jamestown, Penna.; Mr. G. W. Pofinbarger sends thirty-two from Madison Co., Iowa; Mr. M. P. Hanchett sends twenty-five from Pompey, New York; Mrs. H. T. Campbell sends twenty-one from Jersey City, New Jersey; Mr. Geo. Thorndell, ninety-two from Syracuse, New York; Mr. R. J. Sanford sends one hundred and forty-four from Plymouth, Wisconsin; Mr. L. T. Womachs sends thirty-eight from Des Moines, Iowa; Mr. J. Merritt sends fifty from Spencer, Iowa; Mr. Edw. M. Mac Graw sends fifty-five from Plymouth, Wisconsin.

Sir John Herschel says ("Familiar Lectures on Scientific Subjects," p. 109) that the Comet of 1680, when in perihelion, flew round the sun with a speed of 1,200,000 miles an hour. But that is nothing to the speed with which some of our opponents fly round the main point at issue.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICE.

INSECTS AT HOME (Charles Scribner & Co.) is a fine octavo of nearly six hundred pages, devoted to the Entomology of Great Britain. The author is the Rev. J. G. Wood, F. L. S., who will very soon inoculate the intensest hater of bugs and beetles with a new curiosity to know more about them. He pays more attention to the habits of insects than to their comparative anatomy; but excellent chart-drawings and clear, simple descriptions in the text will give abundant instruction to those who feel tempted by so fine an opportunity to begin an independent study of insect-life. Scattered through the book are twenty full-page and finely executed plates, and seventy-nine carefully drawn wood-cuts, the latter including numerous figures and magnified representations of the separate organs.

Although a thoroughly scientific treatise, its subject-matter is such as to be exceedingly interesting even to those who have no special ambition to be entomologists. The strange fascination which life per se, even in its lowest forms, exercises over all but the superficial, and which renders an aquarium or even a globe of gold-fish one of the most difficult objects to pass by, invests the existence of these less imposing organisms with an interest quite as real as that which draws crowds to behold the monsters of the menagerie or the Zoological garden.

Who has never stood watching a spider in its web? Life is the magnet which attracts the living. What matters it whether it be in a Napoleon devastating a continent, or in a Brosena cephalotes darting on its humbler prey? In the speculator amassing a fortune for his heirs to squander, or in the Necrophorus humator burying a dead bird in the ground for its own larvæ to devour? In the American missionary pushing his impudent way into the heart of Chinese society, or in the Blatta Orientalis (domestic cockroach) invading the western world in ways no more unceremonious? In the poor shop-girl driven into a life of shame by her villainous employer, or in the poor Atalanta Butterfly caught by the Hornet in the foliage of the elm,—beheaded, shorn of its wings, and borne off to be devoured? In the rampant revivalist thrusting his hateful creed into your mind, or in the Tabanus bovinus (gad-fly) charging with loud, fierce hum, and sticking his lancets into your skin! Is it not all life, and is not all life the same eternal, mystery? There is many a wholesome sermon preached by the moths and flies, the wasps and fleas; and we know no better report of their discourses than this delightful book.—Price, $3.00; for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

The Independent of January 18 has an admirable and just rebuke of the spleen manifested by the Liberal Christian at the departure of Mr. Hepworth from Unitarianism to Orthodoxy. We are inclined to show no mercy to the inconsistencies, contradictions, and follies of the mongrel theology he has abandoned, and we think that, if he must be a Christian, he has made a change for the better. But, low as is our estimate of Unitarianism, we should be thoroughly ashamed if we had ever written one word against any Unitarian that could be compared for a moment to the venomous assault which the Liberal Christian makes on Mr. Hepworth. The faults it now bitterly condemns it helped to eulogize so long as he remained in the Unitarian fold. "Behold, how these Christians love one another!"

The following sapient reflections catch our eye in an old number of the Liberal Christian:—

"To-day men see truth in the New Testament which a thousand years ago nobody dreamed of finding there. It was all put there at first, of course, but spiritual things are spiritually discerned, and we cannot see what is too far removed from our present stage of advancement."

"It was all put there at first, of course!" What naïveté!

Unitarianism is as oracular as the famous Jack Bunaby, but the world is no admiring Captain Cuttle.

"Happiness is not the reward of virtue, but virtue itself; nor do we delight in it because we bridle our lusts, but rather are we enabled to bridle our lusts because we delight in it." This is the forty-second or concluding Proposition of the fifth Part of that miracle of intellectual construction, the "Ethica" of Spinoza. Is it true?

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

HOW TO REACH THE IMBUTED.

The difficulty of answering the objection so commonly urged by the opponents of Free Religion, that it is, as a system, ill-adapted to the needs of the ignorant and degraded, is sometimes felt and honestly admitted by those who are at heart its friends.

Some weeks since I sent a few copies of THE INDEX to a personal friend who is laboring as a missionary in a half-civilized community on our South-western border. Acknowledging their receipt, he writes as follows:—

"Of all absurd things that the imagination of man could conceive, the most absurd would be the expectation of getting any hold upon darkened, heathen minds by the pretty teachings of this new school of religious thinkers. To preach to these people of the Godlike powers and capacities of humanity, to set before them a pure life as its own exceeding great reward, would be just as sensible as to talk to them in Sanskrit. Your God spelled with two 'o's,' and your devil without a 'd,' may do very well for the cultured classes; but these must have something more salient. They must be told of a Deity whom they have fearfully angered, of a terrible judgment in store for them, and of one who can deliver them from it. Please say how you would bring your glittering generalities to bear upon the half-imbruted minds we have to deal with."

This is a fair specimen of the opposer's argument; and many a good radical, listening to it, is half ready to concede that, in first "breaking ground" with the very wicked, it may be excusable, if not absolutely necessary, to frighten them—even by the preaching of doctrines which the preacher himself only "constructively" believes.

How shall we answer this good brother? Shall we say that Free Religion does not claim as its most prominent direct object the conversion of out-breaking sinners, but the diffusion of truth and light among all classes, believing that education is better than conversion? That it believes that, for the very poor and degraded, soap, soap, and spelling-books are better moral agencies than tracts and sermons? That it believes, if a man has actually sunk so low that moral motives cannot avail with him, he is also out of reach of any truly religious ones, though he may be indoctrinated with a cruel superstition under the name of piety? That Free Religion seeks to multiply, and make more effective, plans for reducing the amount of poverty, ignorance and misery which drive so many to crime, and would make its halls of teaching and "preaching" so attractive that the haunts of vice should lose their allurements? This is the way it looks to a disciple; but if there be a better answer to such honest objectors as the one quoted above, will not some one "skilled in doctrine" please give it through THE INDEX.

H. L. B. B.

[This is a very important subject. We cannot at present do more than publish the above admirable suggestions concerning it.—Ed.]

ORTHODOXY STILL PREACHED.

SUSPENSION BRIDGE, N. Y., Jan. 2, 1872.

INDEX ASSOCIATION, TOLEDO, O.:—

Inclosed find $24.10 twenty dollars to be applied in payment of the ten per cent. assessment on two shares of the Index Association, one for Hiram Colt, the other for Samuel Colt.

Though reared by parents both members of the Presbyterian Church, yet my religious belief has been for many years entirely contrary to that so assiduously taught me in early youth. Notwithstanding, for years I had contributed to the support of that church from fifty to one hundred dollars per year, in the belief that there were many who needed the terrors of hell preached up to them to restrain them from evil ways, and the bonds of the church to hold them to a life of reformation, as a drunkard needs a temperance pledge to hold him to a life of sobriety, or as a Mason needs to belong to the fraternity to enable him to do those acts of charity which, without the obligation he thus places himself under, he would not do. But less than a year ago I heard it announced from the pulpit, while in my accustomed seat in the church, that, were a man to lead a good life, fulfil all his obligations as a good citizen and neighbor, do as he would be done by, yet not do it for Christ's sake, God would feel insulted, and condemn him because he hadn't done it for Christ's sake and in accordance with his plan of redemption. Somehow I had not before thought that the teachings of Christ would justify the utterance of such a monstrous idea. To sit and hear the good God villified was more than I could bear. It was even putting the case in too strong a light for those that I thought needed a little damnation preached to them. At all events, it proved too much for my digestion, for I haven't since put myself in a position to receive a repetition of the dose.

I was deeply interested in reading the letter of Mr. Washburn in last week's INDEX. If Mr. Wash-burn's letter interested me, the reply as deeply impressed me. His views were very ably and courteously set forth, but I could not but be reminded, in reading his letter, of a traveller who is approaching a city on an eminence with every avenue of approach clearly in view, yet will not advance a step till he has consulted a guide-book, a book which he cannot but see is full of contradictions and causes the utmost confusion among those who attempt to follow its directions. He insists that, because this book gives the views of one who was supposed to know more than any one else as to the modes of approach, we have no right to turn to any other source for information, and on this one point must throw ourselves back into the dead centuries. You, on the contrary, refuse to be guided by a book giving a hundred absurd and contradictory statements to one plain direction. Mr. Washburn leans upon another for strength to believe there is a God. You know there is, by the manifestations of his works. Mr. Washburn wants some one to point out the way to the higher life. You find the way by following God's laws. Yours is the highest faith. You are satisfied with what you see and know. Mr. Washburn is not, unless it tallies with what some one else has taught.

I thank you for the forcible manner in which you have stated the Free Religion faith.

Sincerely yours,

SAMUEL COLT.

[Mr. Washburn has sent a second letter in rejoinder, which shall be printed as soon as its great length will permit.—Ed.]

[FOR THE INDEX.]
A WEEK OF BLASPHEMY.

BY REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE.

One of the signs of general orthodox decay is the increase of contrivances of organization, designed to remedy the failure of individual action by an imposing show of united action. Instead of apostles preaching faith in God, we have a national convention to get God into the constitution, as one would get an invalid pauper into a hospital. Instead of abundant labors in the spread and improvement of Unitarian, or Universalist, or Congregational faith, showing great individual energy in many quarters, we have grand schemes of ecclesiastical organization, concentrating deficient energies upon a single inconsistent and useless demonstration. Methodism was once concerned with saving the world; it is now concerned far more with saving itself. Unitarianism used to stand for the diffusion of light; it has become anxious and fretful about the danger that its own light will be blown out. Universalism had for some time a career of noble contention for great convictions; it is now devoted to ecclesiastical fortification, and uses the spade instead of the bayonet. Congregationalism meant an aggressive host once; it means now one, and that one has nothing in particular to say, except to prudently intimate that in former days godly men sufficiently confessed the faith that was in them. So at least we must interpret the recent National Council formed at Oberlin, a body which frankly confesses that it is nobody, and which proves it by avoiding a confession of faith.

The great days when mighty orthodox voices were heard are past. Where the great Boston Council of Congregationalists was in session, a few years since, and the debate was upon affirming Calvinism, we saw Mr. Beecher and Prof. Park looking down upon the struggle from the pulpit. The former smiled genially on the war of words, and the latter threw in the weight of his official and salaried dogmatism in the form of a grim joke. He said, and with decisive influence at the moment, "A man who has studied theology and has read the Bible in the original languages, and is not a Calvinist, is not a respectable man." Spoken in simple seriousness these words would have been a lie in his mouth. They seemed to be taken as serious, but evidently there was meant to be fun in them, the form of falsehood gravely used for solemn fun. We looked directly down upon this memorable scene, where we could watch every countenance, and we saw distinctly in the manner, as well as in the words, of Prof. Park, that Calvinism had become a joke, if not an offence, in the house of its friends. No wonder the Oberlin Council had nothing to say for itself.

The worst instance of the appeal of an enfeebled faith to unwieldy and uncertain union is in the scheme for what is called a WEEK OF PRAYER—an entire week set apart, in which, with specified subjects of special petition for each day, orthodox Christians all over the world—such is the plan—attempt to unitedly exercise the power of prayer upon the mind of God. There is no proposal of a set preparation for this united tackling of the Deity. Forty days of penitence, reformation, restitution, and the like, to close with one vigil of humble petition, one solemn watch-night of penitent souls crying aloud to God, would be to some purpose. But this is not the plan. The rally is of all hands just as they are, to turn aside into the meeting house at certain hours of each day, during one week, to make one rousing effort to give God a big start, precisely like so many heathen seizing a rope to drag a monstrous idol-car. The idea of it is the brazen and blasphemous assumption that by all taking hold together God can be specially moved. And this is not the worst of it. We speak from actual observation of several meetings of the recent "Week of Prayer" and from extreme familiarity with orthodox methods. Ignorant and conceited enthusiasts have been allowed to force upon sober ministers and decent congregations methods of special religious exercise whose chief result is to work people into a fever of conceit and snuff, in which they grow far more in pious pretence, than in grace and truth. We saw, for example, a meeting conducted by Mr. C., in Mr. B.'s church. Mr. B. is a sober minister. Before us is a letter which says "Mr. B. told H. last Sabbath that by the world, Mr. C. would be called a rascal. Mr. C. preached, his first Sabbath, on Holiness, and said he should fight it out on that line if it took all summer, till the church were right,—then they could go round the city with trumpets, and the walls would fall down. Such a cry, loud and long, about Holiness [Methodist], and such a practice!" When we heard Mr. C. he related a scene commencing,—"When I was a wicked man in Milwaukee four years ago." Now Mr. B. not only had this carnal, brassy demagogue to assist him, but fell into his methods. Brethren and sisters were encouraged to make little speeches of mere spiritual titillation, to propound personal requests, and in every way to work one another into a condition of excited feeling. The most common sentiment was one of self-congratulation upon their good meeting. All took exactly the same tone, old reprobates of hypocrisy as much as the purest saints, and these last just as sentimental and superficial as the first,—every one grovelling in mere emotion, without other than the commonest thought, no prayer and no remark at all calculated to improve, only to excite and puff up, as if there was some great thing being done by them. Finally Mr. C. led the meeting in a closing, united prayer, the bold and brassy tone of which made one clear that there is some impersonal devil about at least. Even Mr. B. was so befuddled as to give notice that "probable no meeting will be held Saturday afternoon,—if God should come with great power a meeting will be held—but probably the Friday afternoon meeting will be the last." We never before refrained from bowing our head during the benediction, but on this occasion we did decline the Rev. C. "Rascal's" blessing.

"Our Christian people, and especially our Christian ladies say, 'Our object is to do good, and there can be no harm in a lottery for benevolent purposes.'" This reminds us of a little story in Lippincott's. A doctor was called in to see patient whose native land was Ireland, and whose native drink was whiskey. Water was prescribed as the only cure. Pat said it was out of the question, he could never drink it. Then milk was proposed, and Pat agreed to get well on milk. The doctor was soon summoned again. Near the bed on which the sick man lay was a table, and on the table a large bowl and in the bowl was milk, but strongly flavored with whiskey. "What have you here?" said the doctor. "Milk, doctor, just what you ordered." "But there's whiskey in it; I smell it." "Well, doctor," sighed the patient, "there may be whiskey in it; but milk's my object."—Christian Union.

A HIGH MORAL EXAMPLE.—Religious journals should note the high-toned and sensitive desire to do right, which even in far-off Texas leads a publisher to reject an advertisement which has the smallest scent of unrighteousness. We sent a Galveston paper the advertisement of F. J. Sage, "How to make vinegar." This is the courteous but firm reply which has come to hand: "We can't insert it on account of our agreement not to advertise anything that pertains to intemperance. This is not left optional with us."—American Newspaper Reporter.

The way to speak and write what shall not go out of fashion is to speak and write sincerely.—Emerson.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the ODEON, in the new EXPRESS BUILDING on St. Clair Street, opposite the WHEELER OPERA HOUSE, on Sunday mornings, at 10 1/4 o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending February 17th.—Louis Bristol, 10 cts.; S. Corner, 25 cts.; Vic. Burnham, 50 cts.; Joseph Singer, $1; Henry G. Pollock, 15 cts.; Adolph Werner, $3; W. P. Gardner, $3; H. L. Green, $1; A. H. Spencer, $2; Joseph Frazer, $5; W. B. Hearn, $3; Wm. Green, $1; S. F. Woodard, $30; W. E. Lukens, $1.10; R. R. Price, 25 cts.; Augustus Brenham, $5.34; Sam. T. L. Robinson, 25 cts.; J. Q. Robinson, 25 cts.; Lucius A. Harbaugh, $1; R. A. Skues, 75 cts.; Geo. Haynes, $2; L. T. Womach, $2; Wm. Wise-well, $2; H. Thomas, 20 cts.; Jeremiah Brockway, $1.25; L. A. Foster, 25 cts.; W. C. Wyman, 10 cts.; Wm. T. Harris, 25 cts.; C. M. Plumb, 30 cts.; E. E. Curtis, $2; Abner Forber, $1; Matthew Anderson, $2; E. S. Miller, 25 cts.; M. B. Dias, 25 cts.; J. L. Bagg, 25 cts.; Rev. Avery, $2; C. Polson, $1; more, $2; J. L. Bagg, 25 cts.; Jno. Casson, $2; Wm. T. Stowe, 10 cts.; Rev. Clarke, $2; H. A. Mills, $1.10; J. D. Zimmerman, $2; Chas. W. Cuyler, 20 cts.; Jno. B. Thomas, 10 cts.; Sophia E. Carter, 25 cts.; B. W. Keyes, 20 cts.; C. R. Purdy, 25 cts.; Miss S. E. Dunn, $2; O. W. Cook, $2; Jno. Gray & Co., $5; Will H. Dennis, 10 cts.; Isaac S. Kaicham, $2; J. S. Lambough, 10 cts.; Cyrus Wicks, 10 cts.; Lyman Clark, $2; Geo. F. Hoar, $2; Mrs. Matthew Starbuck, $2; Chas. A. Miller, $1.50; Elijah $2; Wm. A. Alphonso Vorster, $1; L. A. Gashoe, $2.10; E. Walker, 20 cts.; Susan M. Hollowell, $2; Jas. M. Walton, 20 cts.; J. O. Martin, $2; A. Bruce, $1; W. R. Moses, 5 cts.; Milo A. Townsend, 25 cts.; Michael Neal, $4.25; Morris E. Steinale, $5; Geo. W. Douthill, 10 cts.; Jno. Flint, 20 cts.; Jno. W. Griffin, 25 cts.; H. Heberling, 10 cts.; E. W. Brown, $2.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, on Representative Papers from THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the system of Foreign Missions. Fall of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Explanations. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six Copies Fifty Cents; Twelve Copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—"The Present Heaven," by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—"The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single Copies, Five Cents; Twelve Copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Stated and Answered from a Bible Standpoint, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE!

BOOK BUYERS who wish the LIVE BOOKS OF THE DAY can have their orders filled promptly by mail, post-paid, by sending the Publisher's price to

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Bookseller and Publisher,
TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE WORKS of Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Tyndall, Proctor, Frode, Emerson, Max Mueller, Lecky, M. D. Conway, John Walshe, James Freeman Clarke, Robert Collyer, Robt. Dale Owen, and all of the POPULAR BOOKS OF THE DAY, constantly on hand.

PRICE LISTS AND CATALOGUES sent upon application. Correspondence and inquiries solicited.

ANY BOOK PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED STATES

Sent post-paid on receipt of Price. Address

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Bookseller, Toledo, O.

Robert Collyer's Works!

I.
NATURE AND LIFE.
TENTH EDITION.

Price $1.50. Fine edition, bevelled boards, gilt edges, with facsimile of Mr. Collyer's Autograph stamped in Gold, and a View of his early Home. Price $2.00. Sent by mail on receipt of price.

II.
THE LIFE THAT NOW IS.

With an excellent Steel Portrait of the Author, engraved by Perkins. Price, $1.50.

Fine edition, bevelled boards, gilt edges, price $2.00.

A new volume, by Robert Collyer, of Chicago, is announced by Horace B. Fuller, of Boston. That it will be a treasury of wisdom and wit of the most delicate insight, the most humane of sympathy, the most poetic imagination, all who have heard the eloquent preacher, or read his delightful "Nature and Life," will be sure.—GOSWOLD WILLIAM CURTIS, in Harper's Weekly.

HORACE B. FULLER, Publisher,
108alt15w 14 Bromfield St., Boston.

St. Louis, Quincy, Hannibal, Keokuk, Toledo, Wabash & Western R. R.

PULLMAN PALACE SLEEPING CARS!

THE Toledo, Wabash & Western Railway Co., having recently extended its line of Railway to the City of Saint Louis, will commence running all its regular passenger trains through to that city on and after the 14th day of May, 1871. The day trains will be equipped with new and elegant passenger coaches, and all night trains with the much celebrated and popular Pullman Palace Sleeping Coaches.

	Special Thro' Express.	Pacific Express.
Leave Toledo.....	11:10 A. M.	11:15 P. M.
Ar. Ft. Wayne.....	3:00 P. M.	8:30 A. M.
" Lafayette.....	7:40 "	8:30 "
" Danville.....	10:05 "	11:50 "
" Springfield.....	2:35 A. M.	4:10 P. M.
" Quincy.....	8:25 "	8:25 "
" Keokuk.....	9:50 "	10:45 "
" St. Louis.....	7:00 "	7:15 "

Trains arrive from the West at 2:15 A. M., 8:40 P. M., and 8:00 P. M.

GEO. H. BURROWS,
Gen'l Superintendent.

JOHN U. PARSONS,
Gen'l Ticket Agent.

[904]

Lake Shore & Mich. Southern R. R.
1872.

ON and after Sunday, Jan. 14th, 1872, Passenger Trains will leave Toledo daily (Sundays excepted) as follows (Cleveland time):

CLEVELAND & TOLEDO DIVISION.

LEAVE TOLEDO.

8:00 A. M. Atlantic Express East, daily, arrives at Cleveland at 7:30 A. M.
6:30 A. M. Day Express will stop at Kilmore, Fremont, Clyde, Bellevue, Monroeville, Norwalk, Townsend, Wakeman, Oberlin, Elyria and Berea, arrives at Cleveland at 10:50 A. M.
10:55 A. M. Cincinnati Express, stopping at all stations, reaches Cleveland at 8:45 P. M.
6:30 P. M. Special N. Y. Express, will stop at Fremont, Clyde, Monroeville, Norwalk and Elyria, arrives at Cleveland 10:15 P. M. Sleeping cars to Buffalo and Rochester.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

10:40 and 10:35 A. M., and 7:40 and 11:00 P. M.

MICHIGAN SOUTHERN DIVISION.

TRAINS DEPART.

MAIN LINE—8:15 A. M. Mail; 11:15 A. M. Special Chicago Express; 5:45 P. M., Coldwater Accommodation; 8:00 P. M., Night Express.
AIR LINE—11:05 A. M., Accommodation; 11:30 P. M. Pacific Express.
DETROIT—6:00, 11:30 A. M., 5:30 and 8:00 P. M.
JACKSON—11:15 A. M., and 8:00 P. M.
KALAMAZOO AND GRAND RAPIDS—11:15 A. M., and 8:00 P. M.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

MAIN LINE—6:30 and 10:35 A. M., and 5:40 & 8:00 P. M.
AIR LINE—2:30 A. M., and 5:35 P. M.
DETROIT—10:40 and 12:01 A. M., and 6:05 and 9:00 P. M.
JACKSON—10:35 A. M., and 5:35 P. M.
COLDWATER ACCOMMODATION—10:35 A. M.

CHAS. F. HATCH, Gen'l Supt.

S. H. WARING, Ticket Agent, Toledo, O. [904]

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

First Series, No. 1 to 20.

Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and useful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
24. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love vs. Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others": showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelical" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children: did God ever lose, can he lose, His children?
35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader: method of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

EITHER SERIES 30 CENTS; BOTH 50 CENTS.

Address CHAS. E. WHIPPLE,
19 Flackney St., Boston.

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper Devoted to

FREE RELIGION.

Published by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

TOLEDO OFFICE NO. 90, ST. CLAIR ST.
NEW YORK OFFICE NO. 22, VESSEY ST.

THE INDEX was established in November, 1869. We ask the friends of the cause to represent to make active efforts to increase its circulation and usefulness. There is quite a large number of persons in almost every community, both in the church and out of it, who would subscribe for such a paper, if they were urged a little to do so by a neighbor.

N. B. The subscription price of THE INDEX is Two Dollars a year in each and every case, invariably in advance.

Complete files of THE INDEX for 1871, neatly bound with black morocco backs and marbled covers, will be mailed to any address on receipt of $2.50 and 72 cents postage, or sent by express if the postage is not prepaid by the purchaser. Only a limited number can be furnished.

LOCAL AGENTS.

HENRY H. RICHARDSON & Co., 22 Vessey St., New York.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, 98 Federal St., Boston.
PARKER PILLSBURY, Salem, Ohio.

GENERAL AGENTS.

A. K. BUTTS, New York City.
H. L. GREEN, Syracuse, N. Y.

Any person, acting as an agent for THE INDEX, may forward the names of NEW SUBSCRIBERS and retain Twenty per cent. of their SUBSCRIPTIONS.

All Letters and Communications to be addressed to

THE INDEX,
DRAWER 88, TOLEDO, O.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents.
Vols. I and II, bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $3.00.
Vol. III, Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,
Box 2398, St. Louis, Mo.

110—1616w.

JUNIOR UNMASKED; or, THOMAS PAINE, the author of the "Letters of Junius" and the "Declaration of Independence." A DEMONSTRATION. Royal 16mo. pp. 322. Price, $1.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.
Address JOHN GRAY & CO.,
P. O. Box 889, Washington, D. C.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vessey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.
Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent post-paid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word.") "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, MARCH 2, 1872.

WHOLE No. 114.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
COTYATU BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS HARTWORTH HENNINGSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CUNNEY, REV. CHARLES VORSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MORCUM D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian, of Congress, at Washington.]

Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these Lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio."

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1872.

THE RELIGIOUS IDEA IN HISTORY.

BY DR. M. LILIENTHAL.

[Seventh Lecture in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, February 18, 1872.]

We are living in an age of religious convulsions. Everywhere is heard the cry of either "forward" or "backward." The contest between the various opinions, churches and denominations is in a fair way of preparation. And the denominational peace we are nevertheless enjoying is not the result of the spirit which pervades the Church, but is caused by the will and power of the modern State, which keeps the assailants at bay.

Every steamer which arrives from Europe at our shores brings us news of the approaching storm. Rome has challenged modern civilization with all its progress and institutions. By the Syllabus and Encyclical letter she has anathematized the spirit of the nineteenth century. By the new dogma of Papal Infallibility she has thrown down the gauntlet in the face of all European States and Empires. "Back into the middle age!" is the command given to and by this powerful organization.

Enlightened and good men, from her own ranks, oppose this retrogressive and dangerous movement. The Old Catholics, as they style themselves, are making headway everywhere. Mutual excommunication is the order of the day, and the old spirit of bigotry and fanaticism is fairly revived. It is but a few weeks ago that the Mayor of one of the towns of Styria, a man who favored the Anti-Infallibility movement, was stabbed by a devout peasant in broad daylight, and in consequence of this foul assassination petitions have been presented by many cities to the Austrian government, demanding that the agitation of the clergy be stopped, and its members be subrogated to all the penalties of the civil law.

At the same time Bismarck, the Chancellor of the German Empire, during a discussion on a bill on Education, with his usual emphasis and energy has declared that the patience of the Imperial government is exhausted, and that active measures will be taken to repress the arrogance of the hierarchy. In Switzerland the Federal Council has forbidden the Jesuits either to teach in the schools or to preach in the churches of the various Cantons. And so the antagonistic forces are everywhere marshalling themselves in battle array, and nobody can foretell the results and consequences of the impending struggle.

And if we look to the other side, at the Protestant Church, we perceive another kind of uneasiness and restlessness. One part of the clergy, advocating ritualism, either consciously or unconsciously steers the ship toward Rome. Others again shift from one denomination to another, finding peace and ease nowhere; and from the enthusiastic Methodist up to the cold and thoughtful Unitarian, we find all shades of opinion, doubt and criticism represented. Hence international conferences are organized and convened in order to span the abyss and heal the widening breach. The right and majesty of the Church is in danger and must be vindicated; and, overreaching themselves and capping the climax, we have even in our free country the ludicrous but suggestive example of a National Religious Convention, lately held in Cincinnati, to which came two hundred delegates resolved upon abrogating the proud title of our land as the "home of the brave and the free;" upon selling the birthright of American liberty and equality; and by Christianizing our country to make it a sectarian one, in the sense of the Church.

Now people dislike religious agitation and theological controversies. "The facts of experience are not sufficiently in harmony with the theories of different religious bodies, to allow any sect or set of believers to appeal to them with unbounded confidence." Therefore people wish to live in peace and harmony together, untrammelled by the difference of their creeds, and, according to the saying of Frederick the Great, they assert,—"Let every one enter the gates of heaven according to the dictates of his conscience and conviction."

"Besides, the complications of modern society and the immense variety of interests into which it is divided have done much to distract the intellect and to prevent it from dwelling upon subjects which a less occupied people would deem of paramount importance." The people in general have more true religion than the Church, are more liberal than their creed, and more tolerant than their clergy. And if let alone they would soon establish that peace and mutual affection which is only disturbed by the dissensions of the clergy.

Thus we are on the eve of a religious crisis, and everywhere we meet with the most clashing phenomena and ever-fleeting opinions. While the unthinking masses in blind faith abide by the behests of the Church, some of the educated and thinking classes try to reconcile the contradiction between their creed and their better knowledge by asserting:—"God is Love; he will set all things right; let them take their natural course, and do not mix up religious affairs with the business of life or the discoveries of science;" others submit to the dictates of fashion and interest, and become downright hypocrites; and still others of a sterner turn of mind do not wish to play and barter with truth, but demand the abolishment of all religious institutions as the one and only drawback on the peace, progress and reconciliation of mankind. Some find uneasiness, uncertainty, restlessness, everywhere, and we look and search for the remedy which shall ease us in the present, avert all threatening disturbances and secure the peace of the future.

Now will it do to abolish all religion? Will that be the remedy we are looking for? Never! Never! History, ancient and modern, tells us that man will never get along without a God and some kind of worship. When the French Revolution of the last century had declared God to be dethroned and reason to be enthroned in his place, after a very short time our own Thomas Paine was the first who re-introduced some kind of worship into Paris; and Thomas Paine was neither a hypocrite nor a coward, but he had found out the decree of the National Assembly was in clashing conflict with man's nature and would not stand the final test.

For let us examine human nature and we shall find that every one of our faculties compels us to the acknowledgment of that infinite mind and power which man calls God. Pure intellect, yearning for and searching after the final cause of every phenomenon, in spite of all efforts and advance, sees everything expanding itself before the mental eye, like time and space, never to be reached, without bounds and without limits, and finds no rest till it appears before the ineffable, unfathomable mystery which no one can either analyze or understand.

Our affections, embracing as they do not only our family, our State, our country, but the whole human race, are never satisfied; we always long for something higher and better, and never feel this craving appeased, but when resting on the bosom of that universal love which comprises the whole universe.

Our free will—that faculty which puzzles all philosophers and theologians; that sphynx which still awaits the solution of its riddle—is curbed and restrained by the omnipresent eternal laws, which penetrate the material world as well as the moral world of human life and society; "which insist on being obeyed in all our actions and concerns; which we cannot alter, cannot modify; which will go with us and assist and befriend us, if we recognize and comply with them, and which inexorably make themselves felt in failure and disaster if we neglect or attempt to thwart them." Humbled we submit to their wisdom and power, and acknowledge that we are not the independent lords of our action, but are, as Lavater remarked, just as free as a bird in a cage.

Of course we try all means to unravel the mystery of the infinite. The human mind, craving after positive knowledge, knocks at every possible door to gain admission; but the finite mind cannot fathom the infinite, and there stands still to-day the old thorn-bush, ever burning and never consumed, and to all our questions—"What is thy name?" to all our entreaties,—"Let us know thy essence!" we receive no other answer but the one given in Exodus: "I am what I am." Whether Kant calls it the "thing in itself," or Fichte names it the "Being," and Schelling and Hegel 'the Absolute'; all these terms applied by the various schools of metaphysicians only testify to their inability of defining the problem, and Goethe was right when he said in his matchless Faust:

"Who dare express Him
And who profess Him,
Saying: I believe in Him?
Who, feeling, seeing,
Deny His being,
Saying: I believe Him not!
The All-enfolding,
Folds and upholds he not
Thee, me, Himself?
Vast as it is, fill with that force thy heart,
And when thou in the feeling blessed art,
Call it then what thou wilt;
Call it Bliss, Heart, Love, God,
I have no name to give it."

For

"Thou art like the spirit thou comprehendest—not me."

Hence all atheistic schemes will fail. They are against human nature itself. Man will always demand some sort of recognition of the infinite and some kind of worship. Atheism will not assuage the religious convulsions from which our age is suffering, and not establish that peace and harmony for which we are longing.

Hence we must look for another remedy; and in order to find the proper and specific one, we must first discover the root of the evil which is at the bottom of all religious strife and discord. And in trying to make a correct diagnosis, we ask,—what is the element that causes all this estrangement which sets creed against creed, which perverts the meaning of all history, and which nurses all bigotry and religious persecution? It is, in a few words, the supreme doctrine of the Church, that there is no salvation outside of her domain, and that all and every one who preceded her or do not follow her are lost in eternal damnation.

This fatal dogma, with all its obsolete paraphernalia of the fall of man, hereditary sin and vicarious atonement, is the final cause of all religious dislike and animosity—of all religious bloodshed and persecution. It was the mother of the Inquisition, with her sarcastic motto: "Burn the body, and save the soul." And under new forms, but with the same intent, it is still eating away at the vitals of society, disturbing its peace and preventing its reconciliation.

But the human intellect begins to revolt against this doctrine. We are no longer willing to abide by a dogma which teaches that all human efforts, all human excellence, all human virtue, love and charity is worthless and wanton if not endorsed by the Church. We do not look any longer at the various religious systems which preceded or follow Christianity as the work of the Devil, originated by the first sin and fall of Adam. We no longer look at the Eastern races as lost without salvation and redemption, and no longer regard them as having lived for thousands of years without morals and without virtue.

The time to look at the stage of human history either through the spy-glass of the Church or through that of her allies, the kings and aristocrats, has passed away. We now look at it in the interest of progressive humanity; we begin to discern the providential plan laid out for the education of mankind, and attempt to understand its meaning and to decipher its continuous development.

It is not long since we began to batter this breach on the solid and massive structure of the Church and her theology. It required the whole armament of modern science and research to attempt this gigantic task. The deciphering of the hieroglyphics—the study of the Asiatic languages with their immense sacred literature—comparative philology and comparative theology, all yet in their infancy, had to contribute their mite. And instead of the pity or contempt which formerly animated us for all that was not Christian, we discern everywhere the might and wisdom of a mind which watches over the human child from its infancy up to the time of present manhood; we perceive man's gradual development and education; we give him credit for every step he has made in this slow process of evolution, and become inspired with that brotherly love which forestalls the peace and the final reconciliation of the human race.

Instead, as of old, of condemning the non-Christian world as nations and sects without any moral worth or merit, we have found out, as Froude, the great English historian, says, "that the moral laws have been apprehended among the higher races early and readily, long before Christianity taught its doctrines. They have perceived that if they would be men and not beasts, they must control their animal passions, prefer truth to falsehood, courage to cowardice, justice to violence, and compassion to cruelty."

"There is nothing to be found in this world," says Buckle, "which has undergone so little change as those great dogmas of which moral systems are composed. To do good to others; to sacrifice for their benefit your own wishes; to love your neighbor as yourself; to forgive your enemies; to restrain your passions; to honor your parents; to respect those who are set over you; these and a few others are the essentials of morals, and not one jot or tittle has been added to them by all the sermons, homilies and textbooks which moralists and theologians have been able to produce."

Sir James Mackintosh says:—"Morality admits no discoveries. More than three thousand years have elapsed since the composition of the Pentateuch, and let one, if he is able, tell me in what important respect the rule of life has been changed since that distant period. Let the Institutes of Menu be explored, and we shall arrive at the same conclusion."

I shall give but a few quotations. Confucius and Mencius, the great teachers of China, were the first to proclaim that all men were equal in political rights, and they were the first to announce that the object of the government was the welfare of the governed, and not the advantage of the ruler. For that reason the throne of China has never been hereditary.

Confucius gave nine rules for good government:—Self culture; love for parents and relatives; respect for chief functionaries; good relations with subordinate officials; fatherly love for the people; encouragement of science and art; welcome to strangers; friendship for servants; and "chou" or reciprocity. And when asked the meaning of the word "chou," Confucius replied:—"That one word is enough to guide the human life. The meaning is, what we wish should not be done to us let us not do to others." This golden rule of the Chinese was uttered 2,800 years ago.

The laws of Menu, concerning more the Brahmin caste of Hindustan than her lower classes, insist on speaking the truth, shunning agreeable falsehood, and are remarkable for the relation they recognized to exist between a sound mind and a sound body—"mens sana in corpore sano"—and the compassion they taught for lower animals.

The failure of Brahmanism to attend to the everyday life of the common people was the main cause of the appearance of Buddhism. It devoted its work to man, and spoke of eight degrees, that lead to perfection: Right belief; right judgment; right utterance or truth in all we say or do; right motives; right occupation; right obedience to duty; right recollection of past conduct and right meditation. And the five commandments of its creed were: Do not kill; do not steal; do not commit adultery; do not lie; and do not be drunken.

Buddhism has become for a vast proportion of the human race the gospel for the suffering; and inculcated the duty of the righteous to suffer for the welfare of mankind and to contest against evil.

Should we now, in view of such teachings and principles, still assert that these men were without moral worth and merit, that their followers were unable to accomplish any good and therefore lost and doomed without hope of salvation? We scorn such a proposition; we are ashamed and feel mortified at such an assertion; we treat it with all the contempt it deserves, in spite of the pretensions of all possible churches, and rather maintain that the elementary principles of morality, on which the welfare of mankind, the possibility of its social existence depend, have early and readily been discovered; "and that human history has been but little more than a record of the struggle, which began at the beginning and will continue to the end, between the few who are able to see into the truth and loyally to obey it, and the multitude who by evasion or rebellion have hoped and hope to prosper in spite of it."

And if we now turn from the moral side of the question to the theological one, have we any more right to declare all those millions of human beings who have never heard of Christianity, to be "lost and doomed to everlasting perdition?"

Only a fourth part of mankind are born Christians; and the other three-fourths, according to the dogma of the church, shall be lost forever! Every sense of justice and humanity in the human heart revolts against such an assumption; and still from thousands of pulpits we hear it preached every Sunday, that salvation can be effected only by the vicarious blood of Christ!

No, we know better. We know that man is the only creature on this globe which has been ordained to work out its destiny. He reaches it only by gradual education, advancing from improvement to improvement; and in every stage of his education, he is, as the theologian says, responsible only for the light given to him. The theory of damnation and miraculous salvation is one of the biggest hallucinations that ever troubled the human mind.

Let us, merely in weak outlines, sketch the essence of the religious development. The religious nature of man is awakened as soon as his moral faculties. The mysteries of the physical and intellectual world which surround us; the problem of life and death; the riddle of good and evil, all demand a solution. But the metaphysical questions are not as easily answered as the moral ones, and hence the progress is a slow one, retarded by both natural and artificial obstacles.

For in every religious system we may easily discern three distinct phases; the first, when the truth, as far as recognized, is proclaimed and promulgated; the second, when, being too abstract for the vulgar mind, this truth is changed into symbols, and represented by them; and the third, when the meaning of these symbols is forgotten, and under the dogmatic form, to which a priesthood always tended, they become petrified and incarnated into articles of creed. This is the general history of all religions. But whenever man reaches a certain point in his mental progress, he begins to understand the change things had undergone; doubt and scepticism follow; the old faith dies away by fits and starts; and the morning of a farther era, of a new progress, of another religion is dawning.

It is a remarkable and highly interesting fact, that the Hebrew Decalogue, already three thousand years ago, warned against this labyrinth. It says in the first command, "I am the I am." In the second, "thou shalt not make unto thyself any symbol whatsoever;" for, it continues in the third, "if thou wilt do it, thou wilt surely transfer the name of thy God to vain things." Had the world appreciated and obeyed this solemn warning, it would have spared many mistakes to human progress.

In the age of symbols we again discern three great phases of evolution. They all begin with the worship of heaven; they next descend to the objects of the earth, and finally end with man and his relationship to both heaven and earth.

The time allotted to a lecture will not permit me to trace this fact through the religion of Confucius; through the Vedas of the Brahmins, through the teachings of Buddha and Zoroaster; let it only be added, that the deification of man reached its climax in Greece and Rome; and no sooner had the human mind discovered its error, than doubt and scepticism undermined the whole fabric; an organized hypocrisy took the place of religion; an hypocrisy which Gibbon so tersely depicted in the famous words—"The vulgar held all religions as equally true, the philosopher as equally false, and the magistrate as equally useful."

But such an organized state of hypocrisy casts the shadow of coming events before. The intent of the primitive truth had been forgotten or concealed in Eleusinian or other mysteries; the meaning of the symbol was no longer understood, and religion had degenerated into outward ceremonies, the laughing-stock both of the Augurs and philosophers.

A new religion had to dawn over the human race, and it came to the Western Continent in Christianity; to the Eastern division, a few centuries later, in Mohammedanism. It was a glorious, divine and providential mission which Jesus of Nazareth had to fulfil. He tried to emancipate his followers from the petrification of ceremonies, and so re-kindled in them the spark of spiritual truth and universal love. It was a glorious time, when he re-endorsed the Mosaic command "thou shalt love thy fellow-man like thyself" by adding: "this contains all the law and the prophets." He uttered a glorious word, when he said: "By me"—that means, by my teachings, away from your symbols—"to the Father." But he, the teacher of universal love, never dreamed of dooming to perdition all the generations which had preceded him, or did not belong to his church. For one of the noblest sentiments of the New Testament reads: "Glory to God in the highest; peace on earth and good will to all men."

He understood but too well that mankind had always aspired after the Infinite and Unknown; that it had tried to worship and to approach it by the most various ways and means; and hence he reiterated, as one of his most prominent teachings, the old golden rule: "Do unto others, as you wish to be done by."

But Christianity did not escape the fatal error the old religions had made. Indeed it is true, that the affairs of men pass in recurring cycles. The plain and sublime truth, taught by Jesus, was soon replaced by the symbol, and this again, in its turn, petrified into a sectarian creed. Determined to convert heathen Europe, the Church adapted herself, in her own ways, to the prevailing heathen notions; knowing that "it is easy to persuade common men to accept new names, if they are permitted to retain old things." And ere long there stood the dogma of the Trinity, of the fall and hereditary sin of man, and of the vicarious atonement. And having now a power and strength of which the Church did not dream in the beginning, she soon boldly assumed the all-absorbing government in heaven and on earth. And while the record of the heathen religions is not stained by the ghastly marks of religious persecution, the annals of the Church, preaching and teaching love and mercy, are polluted by blood-stains of fanaticism and bigotry.

But

"Tempora mutantur et nos mutamur in illis."

says the old Latin poet. The time for all these things is gone by; reason, common sense, justice and humanity assume again their right and power, and the Church with her dogma and theology is summoned before the tribunal of unadulterated and immaculate truth. We all feel it, we are again on the eve of a new era. Reconstruction and reform has become the motto of the age, and no decree whatever can silence the universal demand.

For we have now learned to understand that there is mighty difference between Religion and Theology. Religion is universal, while theology is exclusive. Religion is humanitarian, theology sectarian. Religion unites mankind; theology divides it. Religion is broad and universal; theology preaches love and practices bigotry. Religion looks to the moral worth of man; theology to his creed and denomination. Religion teaches the common Fatherhood of God and the common brotherhood of man; theology teaches a sectarian God and demands special privileges for its communicants and members both in heaven and on earth. Religion, in general, is the way in which God looks down upon his human children, while theology displays the crooked ways in which men look up to their God. And in consequence of this discrimination, we look forward to the time in which the spirit of true, enlightened religion, instead of the dry bones of theology, will unite and reconcile us all.

Yet such a change is not the abrupt movement of the day. Truth, says our Draper, reaches her full action by degree, and not at once; she first operates upon the reason, the influence being purely intellectual and individual; she then extends her sphere, exerting a moral control particularly through public opinion; at last she gathers for herself physical and political force.

And what can we do in the mean time, consumed in this gradual passage, to accelerate the coming of the new era we are hoping and longing for? Our duty is two-fold, as men and as citizens.

As men, who appreciate the importance of the pending crisis, let us remove all prejudice; let us lay aside all sectarian ill-feeling; and let us compare notes, how we may best assist in fostering and advancing the highest interests of humanity. This, I understand, is the intent and purport of the Free Religious Association; and I think it to be a good and proper one. "Stand firm and you shall see the salvation of the Lord," said Moses to his wavering people; let us repeat the word "stand firm" and we will surely contribute our humble mite to that time in which truth and reason will reign supreme, and humanity accomplish its sacred and glorious mission in all the departments of human life.

And as citizens let us bravely repel any encroachment of the hierarchy, whatever be its name or pretensions. Let us keep State and Church separate; refuse any assistance from the public treasury to sectarian institutions; watch over the holy interest of our free schools, that we may educate free and not sectarian citizens; and under the ægis of free speech, free thought, and free inquiry we shall preserve intact the sacred legacy which the immortal Fathers of our Republic have bequeathed unto us as the greatest boon for all coming generations—Liberty, as they understood it, Liberty, civil and religious, in the fullest and noblest sense of the word!

[For THE INDEX.]
CHRISTIANITY AND FREEDOM.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I thank you for the hearing given to my letter. It is evident that we have not yet fully developed the question between us. I recognize in you an honest conviction, nor can I claim anything less for myself; yet, if you are right, my position is untenable, and vice versa. Let us then work out the question thoroughly in the name of that truth which is above us both, and which it is not for us to make, or choose, but with single minds to recognize.

First, then, let us take account of our agreements and differences, that we may not argue at hazard, but narrow the question between us down to its real centre, and there grapple with it. We agree, first, in our conviction of the right of the private judgment; second, that the ultimate standard of belief, scientific or religious, is the truth as it is, or Nature, if you like, using the word pro sensu to cover not alone physical phenomena, but all real existence; that Christianity and Jesus are to be judged on their intrinsic merits, apart from any claim set up by anybody for them. These, as I gather from your article, are your principles and method. They are exactly mine, nor can you be more thoroughly convinced of their truth than I am. They lie at the foundation of my position.

We evidently differ in the meaning we attach to the words "authority" and "master." Let me explain what I mean by these words. By "authority" in religion, I mean that inward power and influence arising from the actual possession of superior knowledge, insight, or goodness, analogous to what you recognize as a just "authority" in the department of science. I recognize it everywhere in life, in science, art, religion, and everything else, and when you say it does not exist in religion, it seems to me you draw an arbitrary line, a line not found in Nature. Authority is indeed a morally neutral word, meaning any kind of dominion, just or unjust. I used it in its good sense, specifically, of the authority of the "competent witness." There is an unjust authority in religion, as you show there is in science,—an authority

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Brought up at the feet of Orthodoxy, so called, if not a come-outer, a step-outer for more than sixty years, as I should be for sixty ages, under like circumstances, I have hardly read of such a strengthening plaster as your good INDEX, for myself. The mistaken opinion, on the part of the Church now extensively and honestly entertained, that the truths of the Bible are rejected by all who refuse to accept its errors, will necessarily, for a time, compel you to occupy the position of those who have to say—'We have piped unto you and ye have not danced.' But it can hardly be said in this day of free schools, free speech and free press—'The world has grown wicker.' It wags, it moves, it advances! The blacks are already emancipated; and it is time the whites should be."

"There have been times during the past year, when it has seemed to me that I could not keep to myself my enjoyment and appreciation of certain articles in your paper, and the thought suggested by them. Then I would begin a letter to you, but lack of strength and time, etc., would prevent its completion, and so you have not known how grateful one lonely Free Religionist has felt toward you, and how much good THE INDEX has done her, even though she could not communicate the treasures revealed to those about her, save by transmutation. I have enjoyed the recent articles on Free Churches, exceedingly, and wish there might be a Radical Club here; but Mr. — says there is not sufficient material for one."

"I attended some of the meetings of the Free Religious Association recently held in this city, and would have been present at them all if business was less exacting. On leaving the room one evening, I received a number of your paper. Being 'Orthodox,' I do not care to subscribe just now; and being in very 'so so' circumstances, I cannot afford to send you a full subscription for past numbers. But if you have any surplus copies of the numbers published this year, I should like to know what you can afford to sell me a set for. I liked a great deal (not all though) of the articles in THE INDEX."

"You will please find enclosed two dollars for THE INDEX, which suits my taste better than any liberal paper in the United States. You can count upon me as a permanent subscriber, as long as you are the editor. THE INDEX is well calculated to scatter the clouds of superstition that have so long made the world dark and gloomy. So soon as we get sufficient strength here, we shall start a Radical Club. We have plenty of material here now; but too many have the bad habits of Christians, and therefore think more of a few dollars and cents than of their soul's freedom."

"Through the kindness of a friend I have been favored with the perusal of two numbers of THE INDEX. I am very much pleased with the spirit and matter of the paper. We are hand and heart with you for freedom—freedom from every enslavement—a free social system, a free religion, and a free state. All who have felt the galling chains of slavery know their depressing influence, and each has his appropriate field of labor. Let not the head say unto the hand—'We have no need of you;' for there is work for all."

"I have read with much satisfaction THE INDEX from its birth, and wish to continue it the remainder of my time, which is drawing to a close. I have not seen anything during my time that meets my views until I got THE INDEX. I am now sixty-seven years of age. Shall end on THE INDEX track, right or wrong. The hereafter part is not my business, else Nature would have given me that knowledge. Enclosed find five dollars."

"I am not in sympathy, however, with your interpretation of Christianity, but I am not at all alarmed by it; for I do not think a few discussions of the truth will ever injure it in the least. I believe, however, that it is not what you think or what I think about Christ and his kingdom that will free this world from sin, but an earnest effort on our part to lead men to do the work necessary to gain an entrance there."

"You may set me down as a Free Religious Spiritualist. As such, I can and do feel that I am with you heart and soul in your noble efforts to free mankind from popular, but nevertheless lamentable slavery. I was delighted with your article on Free Religion compared with Spiritualism. I have passed the paper around until I have lost track of it. Can you send me another one?"

"I rejoice that one voice is heard crying in the wilderness of dogmatism, that religion is free, and not only free, but natural—capable of cultivation as is mathematics or music—something that gives not length alone to countenance and character, but breadth and geniality. May your subscription list increase, to the end that your paper may double its present dimensions."

not founded on Nature and intrinsic merit, but wilful, overbearing, arbitrary, scilicet, attempting to overawe and overrule the private judgment. That is a constant danger to be guarded against most jealously in every department of life, science, religion, and the rest. What I claim is, that there is in religion also, as in science, the just authority. If not, what do you call that power and influence which wiser and holier men than we are exercise upon us? I care little what you call it, and I should be glad to get a more definite word than authority; but I say there is such a thing, and I don't think you can deny it, and as it is a part of Nature, you have no right to ignore it. As to the limit of the authority which I recognize in Jesus, you seem in doubt of my meaning. I do not recognize absolute infallibility or absolute moral perfection in him. These attributes, it seems to me, belong to God alone, and the Jesus whose authority I recognize is a man of flesh and blood, living in Palestine, about nineteen centuries ago. The authority I recognize in him is the inward power and influence justly exercised over our spirits by his spirit, by virtue of its intrinsic excellence. My mind freely exercised declares it to be the truth that he is the holiest of all mankind known to me, and, as humanity is one, and the human heart one, that therefore his inward influence over my heart is by right superior to that of any other human being known to me. That is what I mean when I call him, not exactly as you quoted it, the "supreme master" in religion, but, as my letter had it, "humanly speaking, and within the range of my knowledge, the supreme master in religion." Thus the influence which I recognize in Jesus is not an imposed authority, overruling the personal judgment and conscience, but a freely recognized authority, springing from the consent and adhesion of my conscience, not opposed to my freedom, but growing out of the exercise of my freedom, and itself a part of my freedom. Mr. Potter, in his "New Protestantism," recognizes this distinction between an overruling and a freely recognized authority as you do in your article. Thus I believe in the earth's motion on the authority of astronomers, with Galileo in this particular point at their head. My faith in the doctrine of the earth's motion is perfect. I cannot shake it if I try; yet I have never demonstrated the matter, nor do I know how to do so. This authority is indeed subject always to the ultimate standard, the truth of Nature, yet it is a real power and influence. But does this authority limit my freedom? No, it increases it. By enlarging my knowledge of the truth, it gives just as much freer scope to my nature—it is itself a source of freedom.

Is the authority of Jesus, then, the same as that of Galileo? No, the analogy is suggestive, but not adequate. The authority of Jesus is like that of Galileo in its being a freely recognized and not an imposed authority, and therefore not incompatible with freedom, but the source of a larger freedom; but it differs from that of Galileo by all the difference between astronomy and religion, between earth, sun and stars, and man, eternity and God. We revere and love Jesus, and give him of all men the highest place, and his influence is of all human influences most powerful with us, because religion is the central and controlling power of the human heart, is the heart itself in its supreme relations, and the truths of religion bear, of all truths, the mightiest and most manifold results, both personally in our life and conduct, and publicly in human institutions. And religious faith is personal and indivisible. It cannot be patched up, a piece from here and a piece from there; it is the very personal spirit itself, one and indivisible; and while the highest faith may subordinate to itself all lesser faiths, doctrines, and systems, it can never be subordinated to them, and therefore Christianity, in its essence, i. e. the personality of Jesus, can never be superseded by any patchwork of other faiths. If superseded at all, it must be fulfilled by a higher faith, originating humanly in a personality superior to that of Jesus. All human religions have a human as well as a divine origin. Some religion is indeed natural to all men, but the best religion is natural only to the best man; the best religion is the best man in his supreme relations; yet as humanity is one, his religion is not his alone, but the common heritage of all his fellow-men within his influence.

With the word "master," you evidently connect base and slavish associations. It has to me, on the contrary, the most free, tender, and helpful associations. Those I count my masters, among my friends and fellow-men, who, possessing some excellence not granted in like measure to me, have shared it with me, have raised me by their knowledge or goodness to a larger freedom. Whoever gives me a thought, or truth, or inspiration, enlarges just so much the free scope of my nature, and in proportion as I receive the influence of his goodness, do I increase in freedom, and so the influence of Jesus in my soul is to my mind the very source itself of my highest freedom.

As to the words "authority" and "master," however, I set very little by them. I am very willing to waive them, and should like to find better words. I only want to make apparent the existing fact, namely, the relation subsisting, and as I think rightly, between Jesus and certain of us among his disciples. If I do not make that existing fact plain, it is for no lack of good will, but from the difficulty of the subject.

Let me, then, re-state my position. First, my mind declares it to be the truth that, of all humanity within the range of my vision, Jesus is the holiest person, the supreme man in religion. Do you deny that? If so, I ask you, again, to show us his superior. Can you ignore the question, whether he be so or not?

Do I understand you to say in your article that it is of little interest to you whether he be so or not? Of a matter of little importance to you or to mankind, who is the holiest of its members, who has the divinest character, when all mankind is one, and the actual possession of any vision of the truth or excellence of character by any one man places that truth or excellence within the aspiration and possible reach of every man within its influence? I think you do not mean that. I do not see how you can rightly ignore such a mighty question. Secondly, I affirm that the just consequence of this fact about Jesus, namely, that of all mankind known to us he is the supreme man in our supreme interest—I affirm that that fact rightly places him in a relation of the deepest and most vital inward influence with regard to us, bearing fruit in our personal hearts, and in the public heart, in our personal conduct, and in public institutions. Recognizing the mighty importance of this influence is what I mean when I profess, and feel myself bound to profess, my allegiance to Christianity and to Jesus.

If, then, you admit Jesus to be the holiest man known to you, do you deny the second point, the consequence? I have to be brief, and if you will say just where you differ from me, I shall be glad to sift that point thoroughly with you.

To sum up, then;—in religion, I affirm the individual centre to be the personal conscience, the human centre to be Jesus Christ, the divine centre to be God; and in the harmony of our individual, Christian, and divine life lies the highest religious life within our reach. Our religious life is enriched, indeed, by the life of all men whose influence for good reaches us, but among these Jesus is supreme, and, if we leave him out, we leave out the centre of humanity, as far as known.

This position is one of allegiance both to Christianity and Freedom. I think it is the position held, consciously or unconsciously, by a great many Unitarians, both of the clergy and laity, and by very many others; but I can of course only affirm it with full responsibility for myself. If there is anything in it not found in Nature, point it out to me, for I have but little respect for it as my own opinion; but as expressing what seems to me to be the truth of Nature, I cannot but yield it my entire allegiance.

Yours truly,

FRANCIS T. WASHBURN.

MILTON, Mass., Jan. 1, 1872.

London has had another Asiatic sensation. The Pagans are taking sweet revenge on their Christian benefactors by sending competent and cultivated men to tell them what the precise condition of Pagandom is. And the storytellers open one set of eyes to a culture and dignity and ability they were not prepared to see, while the story opens another set of eyes to an interior view of life in the East, which fills them with interest and wonder. The last affair of this sort was the lecture of Syed—which is a title equivalent to Baron—Ameer Ali, a young Mussulman, who lectured on Mohammedanism in India, giving a very complete and highly interesting account of the relations of the Mohammedans to the Hindus, of which they were once masters but are now yoke-fellows under British rule. Two hundred years have not amalgamated the two races, nor blended the two religions. The Mohammedans of India are divided into two great sects differing not on doctrine, but on legal matters—the Sunnites and the Shaites, which are further subdivided. The leading tendency among Mussulmans is to rationalism, and all sects would be satisfied if the ethical portions of the Koran were taught in their schools. Syed Ali warmly denied the charge to which the recent assassination of Judge Norman had given rise, that Islam is a religion of aggression, teaching the duty of war on other religions. On the contrary, it is religion of peace. It is a strict doctrine of Islam that every Mussulman must be loyal to a sovereignty whose protection he has in any case accepted, except in extreme cases of oppression to his religion. Islam denounces resort to arms against a de facto government in any case short of a prohibition of their religious observances; and in that case the oppressed are instructed to emigrate, unless they have strong chances of success. The Moors acted on this principle when they left Spain. There is no disloyal dream whatever among the Mohammedans of India of overthrowing the English Government there, however much they may feel aggrieved by its policy in some respects—with the single exception of a small sect of extremely ignorant fanatics in Lower Bengal, whom the leading Mohammedans have been foremost in denouncing. The speaker was earnest, graceful and persuasive, and the discussion that followed led not a few to reflect on the folly of trying to plant English Orthodox Christianity in Hindustan.—Golden Age.

A YOUNG POSITIVIST.

[From the London Punch of December 30.]

PARSON.—"What's a miracle?"

BOY.—"Dunno."

PARSON.—"Well, if the sun were to shine in the middle of the night, what should you say it was?"

BOY.—"The moon."

PARSON.—"But if you were told it was the sun, what should you say it was?"

BOY.—"A lie."

PARSON.—"I don't tell lies. Suppose I told you it was the sun; what would you say then?"

BOY.—"That yer wasn't sober."

ROME OR REASON,—WHICH?

A liberal-minded man of large experience recently said that the objective point at which religious reformers should aim their blows is the doctrine of Infallibility,—the doctrine that there is any infallible guide within human reach, whether it be supposed to be embodied in a Pope, a book, or a church. And this belief—the belief that there is, somewhere, a human representative of the Absolute Right invested with authority to overrule the dictates of individual reason and conscience—is certainly the root of the prevailing ecclesiastical dogmatism and superstition. The simplest and most logical form of the doctrine of Infallibility is that held by the Church of Rome; and perhaps the recent declaration of the Infallibility of the Pope is the most logical shape into which that church could put its belief,—though it may seem to many plain, common sense people like a reductio ad absurdum. It is of the Roman Catholic Church and its claims, and of the relation of its claims to American institutions, that I wish to speak in this article.

We in this country, removed several thousand miles from Rome and having had heretofore only a small and unimportant percentage of Catholics in our population, are liable to underestimate the power of the Romish Church. We are apt to think its long and tenacious hold of power nearer its end than there is any good reason for believing. We forget that in the census of the world the Catholics are reckoned at nearly double the whole number of Protestants. Nor do we sufficiently consider what an advantage the Church of Rome has over Protestantism by reason of its unity under one head and its perfect organization in one ecclesiastical system—an advantage which is by no means counterbalanced, as at first sight it might seem, by the superior enterprise and wealth of Protestant nations, since enterprise and wealth in Protestant countries are more secular and less readily drawn into the service of religion than in Catholic countries. It is to be hoped, indeed, that the new German protest against the doctrine of Papal Infallibility will prove another wedge of division in the Romish Church. But for the present that movement is only local and partial; and even if it amounts to a practical secession of a part of the German churches, the great body of the Catholic Church will not be disturbed by it for a long time to come. Making all allowance for difference of opinion and policy among the bishops and learned men of the Catholic Church, that church still has over Protestantism the immense advantage of unity, of numbers, of ecclesiastical prestige, of organization, of machinery, of facility in commanding and applying its resources, and of devotion to a single purpose,—that purpose being not so much the conversion of people to this or that doctrinal belief (a process which implies some dangerous exercise of the intellect) as the simple extension of its ecclesiastical sway.

In its conflict with Catholicism the sole advantage which Protestantism has over its antagonist is that its principle is more in accordance with the spirit and progressive tendencies of the age than is the fundamental principle of Catholicism. And when I say this I say it with the implication that the central, vital principle of Protestantism is not the assertion of some other form of infallible authority, but the assertion of the right of private judgment. It is this recognition of the claims of reason (though the recognition has been imperfectly developed in practice) that has given to Protestantism all its real life and power. And looking at these two great divisions of the Christian Church in respect to their influence in the world to-day, this advantage of possessing a principle more in harmony with modern thought is all that can be claimed for Protestantism over Romanism after three centuries of existence. As an organized ecclesiasticalism, the Romish Church is still the mightier power of the two. Whenever a new country is to be colonized or to be civilized, its missionary machinery, fixed yet elastic, is ready to be applied. Wherever a city is likely to spring up, it has a sagacious agent on the spot to mark the site of a future church. Whatever ecclesiastical work is to be done, the men and the money are always forthcoming to do it. The Papacy has eyes in every corner of the earth, and misses no opportunity for aggrandizement. As soon as China is reopened to foreigners, its priests are at the ports ready to step on shore, having in their pockets title-deeds of property which pioneer missionaries had acquired in the country centuries ago. The property in the interval may have many times changed hands, but the deeds had been carefully preserved in the Vatican at Rome, awaiting the future. As soon as the shackles of slavery are removed from the negroes in our Southern States, Catholic priests spring up there as if by magic to entice the new-born freeman into the inviting shelter of the great church, which at least has this merit, that it knows no distinction of race or color. In the Propaganda at Rome colored boys have been for some time in process of education for the priesthood, and it would now seem as if with foresight of this exigency. Thus do the sagacity and power of the Catholic Church extend around the globe. Its machinery is always ready to be put into motion.

And we in this country are beginning to feel this power of Catholicism in our civil and social life. The rapid increase of the Roman Catholic population in the United States in the last twenty-five years—the increase having been at a rate nearly double that of any other sect—has precipitated upon us some momentous political and social problems. In our larger cities these problems are already demanding practical solution. The principle of the Roman Catholic Church is despotism,—the utter subordination and subjection of the individual to the will of the church. Hence when it comes into contact with free forms of government and is strong enough to manifest its power, it is inevitable that friction should ensue. We in this land of all lands are believers in progress, in freedom, in the rights of individuals as against the claims of institutions, in the opportunity of the individual to secure whatever culture he can and make his own career in life. But to none of these things does the genuine Roman Catholic assent. We are believers in individual independence and self-government. The Catholic, if logical, is a monarchist. The American tradition is that people should think for themselves. The Catholic tradition is that people should be treated as children and surrender themselves implicitly to the guidance of the church. Said a Protestant lady, who had been attracted to the Romish church, to one of its bishops,—"I want to join the church, but I cannot convince my judgment of its claims." The bishop replied, "The church does not ask for the conviction of your judgment, but for the submission of your will." Submission to its authority,—that is the fundamental principle and claim of the Catholic Church. It is the supreme culmination and embodiment of the principle of authority in religion, as vested in some external representative rather than in the individual soul.

The Church of Rome has some great merits; it has done some good work in history. But none of its merits can counterbalance the danger that springs from the falsity of its fundamental principle. And the only way effectually to meet this principle and overcome it, is to proclaim its logical opposite and to follow it boldly to all its results; to declare anew and in full the old Protestant principle of the right of private judgment,—which the Reformation of Luther and Calvin proclaimed, but did not consistently carry out to all its legitimate conclusions. Here are the two principles which are contending for mastery in the civilized world to-day,—the principle, on the one hand, of external religious authority, of ecclesiastical sovereignty and despotism; and, on the other hand, the principle of religious freedom and spiritual independence.

The first of these principles makes the mass of mankind depend for their religion on what is told them by a priest or through a book. The second regards the soul of every human being as in vital contact with the eternal source of Truth and Right, and as receiving thence directly the primary elements of faith and moral life. The one says,—Here is an infallible rule of belief and duty ready-made for all time, to which human beings have only to square their opinions and conduct in order to be safe forever; the other considers human beings as living organisms, as finite incarnations of the vital essence of truth and love, and as evolving beliefs and virtues out of the substance of their own natures, just as the plant produces from and through its own living substance its beauty of blossom and wealth of fruit. The one brings to man a completed revelation; the other opens to his vision an infinitude of truth which can never be wholly revealed to any finite mind, but must forever draw it on into continually increasing light and assurance and joy. The one directs attention to the places where Almighty Power is said once to have been; the other finds the Infinite One in the present laws of the universe and in all human history, in the daily sunrise and the developing seasons, in the common mysteries of life and birth and death, and in every ray of intelligence that enters a human mind and every throb of pure love that pulsates in a human heart. The one rests on something that human nature has achieved in the past under alleged divine guidance; the other holds that human nature is as capacious of divine inspiration as it ever was, and that infinite wisdom is pledged for its guidance in every age.

Can there be any doubt which of these principles is the better adapted to the needs of modern civilization, and which of them is the more likely to stand as the foundation of the future religion of America and the world?

W. J. P.

EDUCATION AND RELIGION.

When we escape from the belief in a supernatural origin of religious movements in the world, it is interesting to watch their course, and see how they blend with and influence and are influenced by the general currents of thought and feeling in every period.

Recently some discussions on the subject of Industrial schools before the Educational Committee of the Massachusetts legislature have served to show how the feeling about education is changing in the same direction as that about religion.

Formerly it was the opinion that the less religion had to do with earthly things, the better; and an educated man, also, was the last one to be selected for practical work.

The object of education was to make gentlemen and ladies; of religion to form saints and hermits. Now, when religion is conceived to be that spirit and temper of mind which will best fit us to lead a good life in this world, education is held to mean that training which will best fit a man to do his work in the world. One speaker at the State House expressly said:—"The object of education is to enable us to get a living." Would not that have been a strange reason for sending a man to Oxford or Cambridge a hundred years ago, except it were an ecclesiastical "living?" The needle and the jack-knife are now proposed as more important implements of juvenile training than the Westminster Catechism and the Ladies' Accidence.

Then, too, the theory of total depravity of boys is getting out of the school room, as that of men is getting out of the church. The old maxim was—"It is always safe to whip a boy, for if he doesn't deserve it now, he will soon." Now grave professors and Normal School principals propound the theory, that it is rather the school committee and the teachers who deserve a flagellation, for so ordering the schools that a boy or girl, acting according to the natural laws of youthful activity, must get into mischief.

This is a very severe test of learning as well as of piety. If every scientific theory has got to be tested in actual life, there will be no flaws that will escape the searching ordeal. The poor professor who used bravely to stick to his theory when the experiment failed, saying—"Gentlemen, such and such a result ought to follow, but it doesn't"—will have to find out the cause of his failure, and be sure of his results, whatever becomes of his theory.

The hearings at the State House, though very desultory and unsatisfactory so far as regarded methods of instruction or plans for schools, were still very valuable as showing the earnest interest of the community in the subject, and an entire unanimity of feeling in regard to the general direction which education ought to take, namely, a more practical relation to the every-day work of life.

And in spite of all the wrangling of the sects, the same tendency is observable in the great majority of the churches. The Catholic priests enforce the duties of industry, frugality, and temperance on their flocks; and unless you unfortunately hit upon doctrinal days, you may hear good statements of the importance of a good life and of all the popular virtues as an accompaniment of religion, in the churches of every sect.

This is the solution of the question how to make education religious. When both education and religion have one common end, the welfare of humanity, education will become more and more religious, and religion more and more intelligent.

B. D. C.

Virtue in the midst of vice, like the water-lily, converts the mud at its roots into beauty and fragrance.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICE.

MORE CRITICISMS ON DARWIN, AND ADMINISTRATIVE NIBBLISM (D. Appleton & Co.) is a little treatise by Prof. Huxley, containing a couple of his latest essays. They are marked, of course, with those graces of style which make all his writings so charming as works of art. But the merit of his writings is not chiefly literary. They are packed with thought, wit, and learning. The first of these two essays contains a pungent criticism of St. George Mivart, whose "Genesis of Species" is shown to be suspiciously similar to the article on Darwinism in the Quarterly Review of last July. Mivart strangely maintains that the Evolution theory is in perfect harmony with Christian theology, and quotes Father Suarez, a great Catholic authority, to prove his point. Huxley re-examines the subject, and convicts Mivart of the grossest ignorance of Suarez' real opinions. Rightly characterizing the Roman Catholic Church as "the greatest and most consistent of theological organizations," he shows that Suarez held to the belief that the work of creation was accomplished in six natural days, and had no views that can be harmonized with the Evolutional philosophy. He says:—

"When, Sunday after Sunday, men who profess to be our instructors in righteousness read out the statement, 'In six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is,' in innumerable churches, they are either propagating what they may easily know, and therefore are bound to know, to be falsities; or, if they use the words in some non-natural sense, they fall below the moral standard of the much-abused Jesuit. . . . It [the Evolution theory] occupies a position of complete and irreconcilable antagonism to that vigorous and consistent enemy of the highest intellectual, moral, and social life of mankind—the Catholic Church. Elijah's great question, 'Will you serve God or Baal? Choose ye,' is uttered audibly in the ears of every one of us as we come to manhood. Let every man who tries to answer it seriously, ask himself whether he can be satisfied with the Baal of authority, and with all the good things his worshippers are promised in this world and the next. If he can, let him, if he be so inclined, amuse himself with such scientific implements as authority tells him are safe, and will not cut his fingers; but let him not imagine he is, or can be, both a true son of the Church and a loyal soldier of science."

It is refreshing to read this deserved rebuke to the pretence that modern science can be harmonized with Christian theology. The pretences are mischievous and demoralizing; and we welcome whatever shall put the truth of facts in its right light before the world.—Price 50 cents; for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

The Radical for March contains—Theism, by S. Longfellow; One God; The State of Scientific Thought in England, by A. Jayram; Conquest, by L. W. J.; Prayers by Telegraph, by M. D. Conway; Thoughts upon Seasoned Books, by N. R. Waters; The Ideal Wins All, by G. S. Burleigh; Timothy Tot, by F. G. Fairfield; Notes.

A Radical Extra announces that about $7,000 out of the required $25,000 have been subscribed to the stock of the Radical Association. There is enough wealth in the country in radical hands to raise the whole amount easily. Let it not be said that the Radical expired from lack of goodwill. The persistent self-devotion of the editor and the great ability of the contributors should assure abundant support. Each share is $10 a year for ten years. Take one, at least.

Subscribers who fail to receive their papers regularly will please inquire at their post offices before sending here. The fault is usually in the mail. There can be no mistake in the address, if the labels are once made correct; and subscribers should inform us promptly of any errors in these. All orders are attended to as soon as possible; but it is unreasonable to expect them to be filled "by return mail." Where so much work has to be done, each must wait his turn. Often complaints are made when the next mail brings an apology. Especially when orders are sent from a distance, time is required for their execution: and we find it necessary, in justice to our excellent business agent, to ask from our friends the exercise of a little patience.

"Buddha said: 'A man who foolishly does me wrong, I will return to him the protection of my ungrudging love; the more evil comes from him, the more good shall go from me,—the fragrance of these good actions always redounding to me, the harm of the slanderer's words returning to him.' (A Catena of Buddhist Scriptures, by Samuel Beal, p. 193.)

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errors.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE SIGN OF THE CROSS.

In far-off days of Egypt's prime,
When Nature smiled on arid sands,
'Tis told by men of ancient time
That priests inspired ruled o'er their lands.
These holy men the people taught
That death was gain and life was loss;
And, when in faith men eager sought
For symbolized hope, they gave the Cross.

Ostrife's priests are now unknown;
Strange men and gods call Egypt home,
But templed walls and shafts of stone
Still bear the sign of life to come.
Their priestly rites and judgment hall
The world now counts mere empty dross;
Yet Egypt's sons, both great and small,
Adored through life the sacred Cross.

Chaldean's sons, ere Babel rose,
With reverent eyes the sun adored;
He rays seemed friends, his shadow foes,
Who kept their steps or wrath outpoured.
The vernal cross again brought life
To triumph new o'er winter's loss;
And men, in trust that e'er from strife
The good survives, adored the Cross.

When fair Antartia held her sway,
And men of Tyro their ships sent far,
The magnet old made clear their way,
O'er trackless deeps a guiding star.
With trusting love they dimly saw,
Though winds might blow and waves might toss,
The compass told of higher law,
And men adored the saving Cross.

On distant shores by India's sea,
Ere Aryan left his Bactrian height,
The early race, though wild and free,
Yet looked with hope for lands of light.
In shaded groves and caves' recess,
They carved, on rocks now grown with moss,
The glad release from life's distress,
As symbolized in the phallic Cross.

The Aztec in the distant West,
Where blood like rain for gods was poured,
And victims new but added zest
To love, he gave the Cross adored.
And Moyses danced, with fervent prayer
To shield from sin and demons gross,
Their prattling babes with tender care,
Safe placed beneath the shielding Cross.

In ancient days, ere Switzerland
Had passed beyond the Age of Stone,
Where pile-built huts in lakes did stand,
This sign of life and hope was known.
The mighty Thor, the god of strife,
Ere Norsemen wept their hero's loss,
The serpent smote; and souls to life
Were raised by the old Runic Cross.

When sainted Paul stood forth in Rome,
With zealous faith in God's just cause,
To tell glad news of life to come,
For all who kept his Father's laws;
He told that Christ—the very God—
All souls to save from endless loss,
Had paid the ransom with his blood
By death upon the holy Cross.

"Salvation's plan" and "life to come,"—
"Redeemed by blood" from all our fears,—
Were twined to tales to men of Rome,
Outworn and grim with dust of years.
All down life's stream this sign has stood
For glad release from matter gross;
Though darkly dyed in martyr's blood,
The heart still throbs before the Cross.

This pagan symbol yet is dear;
Beloved by souls in ages past,
It tells of time that still draws near
When winter's gloom no shadows cast;
When Light shall rule the moral world
And quick restore all Nature's gloom,
And demons dark below are hurled,
When time shall reach its vernal Cross.

PORTLAND, ME., JAN., 1873.

D. D. L.

THE NECESSITY OF UNIVERSAL CONCEPTIONS.

HAMMONTON, New Jersey, Jan. 1, 1873.

MY DEAR SIR:—

In the World, the other day, I was delighted to read your "Truths for the Times." While I cannot say, with Mr. Darwin, that I "agree to almost every word," yet as it is so seldom that I can find any one who comprehends the necessity for universal conceptions, or how much grander is the conception of the inherent morality of human nature than any of the poor misrepresentations of the theologians, and as I think it but just that those who have risen to the plane of truth should know each other, and lend to each other the support of sympathy which we all so much need, I commence my new year by writing you these few lines.

Allow me to congratulate you upon many of the statements in your "Truths." For years I have felt the necessity for some organized plan of action, by which the results of science should be given the social influence which is their natural correlative; and to do this requires only that those who have arrived at the application of a scientific method to the study of life and its phenomena should mutually support each other. For myself I do not like the word religion. It implies a recognition of something divine, and this we have never seen, and cannot conceive. Let us discard the word, as we do the anthropomorphic conceptions which it represents. Proposition 39 I cannot also accept, for I do not understand it. The "still small voice of the private soul" to me means nothing, and further it is as dangerous in science to profess to know what we do not know as it is in mechanics. We know nothing of the soul; how then can we say that it is private, or that it has a voice, or that this voice is either still or small? And what do we want, we who believe in man as a normal product of the natural forces, with this old jargon? Let us discard it as we have in politics the divine right of rulers, or in philosophy the abhorrence of Nature for vacua.

Excuse the freedom I take in these remarks. I make them only to show you where I stand myself. Allow me, however, to offer you my cordial sympathy in the work you are doing; and if you can accept it from me with the modifications, and my aid can in any way assist you in carrying it out, you can count upon my hearty co-operation.

I am yours very sincerely,

EDWARD HOWLAND.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Esq., Toledo, O.

THE BIBLE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The Bible is in my opinion—in spite of the many fine passages contained therein—a book so full of contradictions and illogical conclusions drawn from a false thesis, that none of its relations are of any value; although its propagators—the priests—have in former ages contrived to fasten it upon mankind as the test book, by which their soul will gain heaven or hell for their eternal abode, according to the degree of credence they give to it. The priest's interpretation of it is in the highest degree absurd, for they will deny God power or foresight in order to retain a beloved dogma, which is calculated by them to keep man in awe of their power, as well as of themselves as preachers of his revealed religion. I have heard Catholic priests admit even to myself that God was not omniscient before the fall of Adam and Eve, our first parents, and this they did in order to retain their assertion of man's free will. On the same principle they would deny that God did not know that the sun would give light before he had created it. Such presumption and foolishness is really laughable, and I for one should enjoy it immensely, if it did not have such a deadening and weakening effect upon the intellect of those who believe in it, who, I am grieved to say, are so many. Nevertheless, many thoughtful men are breaking the bond which bound their soul and intellect—as it were—in a narrow cell, and are giving full scope to the reasoning power with which God has endowed them. This is a cheerful sign, and I hope the number will increase rapidly, so that the Free Religionists will be able to cope with the sects as regards numbers, as well as regards men of genius, of whom undoubtedly they have their share.

I have often noticed one passage in the Bible, which has always seemed to me to be very illogical and unsound. In Matthew, chap. IX, verses from 2 to 7, these words will be found:—"And they brought unto him a paralytic lying in bed. And when Jesus saw their faith, he said to the paralytic man: Son, be of good cheer; thy sins be forgiven thee. And immediately some of the scribes said amongst themselves: he blasphemeth. And Jesus, knowing their thoughts, said: why think ye evil in your hearts? For which is the easier to be said: thy sins be forgiven thee, or to say, arise, and walk? Now, that ye may know that the Son of man hath power on earth to forgive sins: He saith unto the paralytic, take up thy bed and go unto thine house. And he arose, and went to his house." (I must apologize for the quotation given above, as it will be found upon examination to differ a little from the words given in the common Bible; which will be accounted for, when I inform you that I am not in possession of that highly valued book, excepting that I had the New Testament in the Italian language, the above being a translation from it.) There is another account of the above miracle in Mark, chap. II, verses from 3 to 12. Also Luke gives an account of it in chap. V, verses from 18 to 28. Now what seems to me absurd is Christ saying: "arise, take up thy bed and go to thine house," as though that proved he had the power to forgive sins. Even if he performed the miracle related, it did not prove one jot more that he had the power to forgive sins, because it is simply impossible to prove such a thing, as it is not a thing which could be made visible. But even assuming that he could prove the assertion he made in a visible manner, the performance of the miracle did not show that he had the power, because it was an entirely different matter, and to say that because a man could do one thing he could do another (and that too more difficult and incredible than the other), would be illogical and childish. To make a rough comparison, it would be saying as it were:—"Because I could run as fast as a locomotive, I could fly up into the clouds." Now we know well, the first named thing is an impossibility for any mortal to perform, but assuming that he could do the former, it would not prove that he could do the latter. Therefore the passage quoted seems to me to be very unreasonable. It may be argued that Christ performed the miracle for the purpose of showing the people that he had power to do great things, and that the only way he had to substantiate his first assertion was by so doing; but even yet the latter act did not prove, in the slightest degree, that he had the power to do the former. Therefore it is not to be wondered at that it was disbelieved, as it could not be proved, although the people were astonished at the miracle. What do you think of my argument, Mr. Editor? Am I right or wrong? [Right.—Ed.]

If the question were to be asked, how does God act? I should without hesitation say, only through Nature and her unchangeable laws. For if we see a man prosper and rapidly advance in any business he undertakes, none but fools would attribute it to God's special care and providence for him, because he might be a doubter in God; but men with reason would simply attribute it to his superior skill and tact in that line of business, which another man would utterly fail in, however pious and worthy a Christian he might be. In my opinion there is no such a thing as "the grace of God," except we understand by it the variety of talents God has given to each of us in a greater or lesser degree. Granting that to be the meaning of it, there is no difficulty in understanding it, because then one could say to another:—"You have more talent (i. e. grace of God in you) for preaching and mathematics than I have, for which you have great cause to thank God." All without exception could understand that, but as it stands now with its old recognized meaning, none but those calling themselves Christians can make anything out of it, and I should not be far wrong, perhaps, if I even affirm that they themselves know nothing at all of it, although it is their constant affirmation "that without the grace of God dwells in us we cannot be saved."

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, I fully agree with your sentiments on most religious topics, and can only wish your paper, THE INDEX, a most lasting and boundless success.

If you think these few words of mine are worth a place in your paper, I need hardly say how glad I shall be to see them in an early issue. Again wishing you all possible prosperity,

I remain, Mr. Editor,

Your sincere well-wisher,

HORACE WADHAM NICHOLL.

ONE MORE.

MR. ABBOT:—

Please affix my name to the counter-petition which you propose to send after the Christian one. I have no desire whatever to be compelled to worship at the shrine of Christ, neither at that of Moses, Mahomet, or any other. I propose to worship where I will, and what I will, or not at all, as my judgment dictates. Feeling morally bound not to intrude on the rights of another, I deny the right of another to intrude on mine. Intolerance I abhor, whether born in Rome or America.

A few years ago, when the slaves were liberated, I thought the battle over; but now I see that, as then we fought for the freedom of others, so now must we fight for our own. If the battle must come, the present will do as well as the future. The more of it that falls on us, the less will there be for our children to do.

Bigots see their time-honored dogmas perishing one by one. Priests see in the distance their fat living beginning to wear a lean look, and that men cannot be saddled and ridden as easily now as they could when the world was younger. They see humanity rising, and superstition ready to fall and bury them in the ruins. Hence one more heroic effort to prop the tottering thing. "Whom the gods wish to destroy, they first make mad." This Constitutional Amendment, aimed at in this age and in this country, would indicate madness incurable.

I hail the present basis of THE INDEX as eminently healthy and sound. (I feel a speck of sorrow that I am unable to make it more so.) But I have other ideas, I find, in regard to size, &c., than some of your correspondents have. I believe in a larger paper (if finances will justify), as size sometimes adds dignity, and those who really ought to read it are very often induced to do things by appearances. Also a greater variety of matter could be given, which would not only induce persons to read it, but would make it something of a family paper as well. Dry logic without any seasoning does not commend itself always to those just beginning to think. I wish to see THE INDEX such a paper that men, women, children and bigots will all find something in it to interest them, and in the reading find themselves being educated to common sense. I am not offering this as advice, but merely as a free criticism.

Yours in faith,

GEO. B. GILL.

COAL CREEK, IOWA.

REFORM.

The cry of the age is for Reform. There seems to be a universal and prophetic consciousness that, in Church and State, there is a higher attainable life, and multitudes are struggling towards it. The aspiration is glorious; but there is danger that, with the majority, it may miss its aim and utterly fail. The true end of Reform is the elevation of the individual life. The soul that is at war with its own evil tendencies, its own selfishness, its own sluggishness, may press forward in the full assurance of victory, for every faithful effort is itself a victory. This is genuine Reform. It is "the straight and narrow way" which a few shall find, which every earnest spirit, without external organization, without priest or creed, may find; but there is another department of the work that is vastly more attractive to the popular mind. This is external in its character. It acts through parties and conventions and seeks to elevate society as a whole; but thus far its work seems more destructive than reconstructive. It commences with certain bold negations. You shall find a man whose creed is of the standard length, but every one of its "thirty-nine articles" commences with—"I don't believe," and he finds others also who don't believe, and says to them:—"Upon this common ground let us be brethren." So long as they can find some musty superstition to combat, they may keep together and call themselves a party or a church; but they should remember that these musty superstitions, as they regard them, have long been the spiritual food of the race,—aye, nourishing food, and that, if these are destroyed before a genuine and healthful substitute is found, spiritual famine and death must ensue.

It will be said that the old ruins must be removed before the new foundations can be laid. This is true of an old building, but not true in Nature. Here the new growth forces out or consumes the decaying forms of the past, feeding upon and assimilating all that is good in them, but not awaiting their entire destruction. So in the spiritual sphere there is abundant material, abundant opportunity, for new formations, yet they rarely appear; and between attacks upon the past and merely external schemes for the future—schemes that do not touch the individual character,—the universal aspiration toward a higher life threatens to exhaust itself in fruitless words.

But true Reform awaits not conventions or churches or constitutional amendments. It awaits the willing spirit of an individual,—the silent resolve to a higher life,—the patient struggle against bad habits and evil tendencies; and wherever this unheralded work is going on, though it be in the heart of but one little child, there the new kingdom is established; there springs a growth that shall truly replace the decaying past. With this view, then, let us labor; first for the individual life, afterwards for external organization. So shall we realize the hope of a better day.

EDWIN.

DANGER.

EDITOR INDEX:—

Every lover of religious freedom from clerical interference and impertinence should be thankful to you for the space you gave in your opening paper of the New Year, showing up the danger ahead which is fairly inaugurated by the evangelical Christians, in suddenly ascertaining, in the eighty-third year of our constitutional history as a government, that we have been, through these long years, running the country upon a basis of fraud.

This discovery is fearful, and calls for a complete revision of our opinion of the great men whose memory all have been taught to cherish.

These Christian "Callers" all know the reason why the divinity of Jesus of Bethlehem was not mentioned in our Constitution, for nearly half of those great men, with Franklin and Madison at their head, did not endorse the theory.

In the speech of Mr. Martin, Attorney General of Maryland, as a member of the committee of 1787, it is said:—"That part of the system which provides that no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States, was adopted by a great majority of the Convention, and without much debate."

The article finally adopted in the Constitution resulted from a wish entirely to separate church and State; and by this we learn—"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press."

You publish the preamble proposed, acknowledging Jesus, a man who lived a short life in Asia, and departed after preaching about three years to a country in which he scarcely has a religious follower to-day, as "the appointed Ruler of Nations" for thousands of years afterwards; and also the outrageous clause—"We ask that such changes be introduced into the body of the Constitution as may be necessary to give effect to these amendments in the preamble." What becomes of the religious liberty which has always been the boast of America?

We have about twenty religious sects, besides a goodly number who call Toledo, Ohio, their conscientious hub, all the Hebrews of the country (who are about the only self-sustaining sect we have), the best part of the Unitarians, and that large body of men of whom mention is made by these Callers as having "no religion;" and they make up a large body of thinking people who never expect to get to Paradise by proxy, and who could not swear or affirm to such a Constitution.

These would all be ostracized by these Christians; could hold no office of trust; could not even sit upon juries. Their evidence would not be accepted even in court by these Pharisees, who would require all witnesses to take some such oath as this:—"You solemnly swear that your whole reliance is in the blood of Jesus."

It cannot be possible that many Unitarians, even so of the Hepworth-Osgood type, will lend their permanent aid to this movement. When they are "left out in the cold" by these revolutionists (for they are nothing else), they will regret the day when they ever gave it countenance.

The true reason of the movement is, these men fear that their control over mind is passing away,—that the intelligent public are having their own thoughts about religious matters.

You ought to have 10,000 names from the great city of New York, for we have large numbers of Lots (without his immorality) whose character is sufficient for the saving of the city.

J. E. H.

DR. HOPKINS ON DENOMINATIONALISM.—During the late meeting of the American Board, Dr. Hopkins, the President, addressed the large audience upon his sympathy with its undenominational character. "I would send," said the Doctor, "any evangelical man as a missionary, Lutheran, Presbyterian, Methodist or Quaker. I would not send a close communion Baptist, because he would not let me commune with him, and that would hurt the cause. Neither would I send a high church Episcopalian, because he would not let me preach, and that would hurt the cause." At this point the audience laughed very heartily, greatly amused by the Doctor's high regard for his own preaching, thus publicly expressed; though all before him, without doubt, would have confessed his estimate correct. He saw at once the source of their amusement, and as soon as the laughter had subsided, continued: "You do not understand me. I do not say that the cause would be hurt because he would not let me preach, but because he would not let me preach."—Congregationalist.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the ODEON, in the new EXPRESS BUILDING on St. Clair Street, opposite the WHEELER OPERA HOUSE, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICE.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending February 24th.—Toledo Printing Co., $10; Joseph Friszy, $1.50; Geo. Brenet, $2; Dr. T. M. Cook, $2.50; W. C. Flisk, $3 cts.; W. H. Walworth, $3; Benj. F. George, $5 cts.; Jehu Mitchell, $2; Jacob R. Benborn, 10 cts.; Joseph LeClere, 10 cts.; Henry A. Dean, $2; J. M. Rowley, 10 cts.; Wm. Jabine, $2; F. L. Hoemer, $5 cts.; R. F. Horton, $2; J. M. Holmes, 10 cts.; Geo. H. Kingsbury, $2; D. C. Thayer, $2; Armetia S. White, $2; Wm. M. Gardner, 10 cts.; James Allen, 50 cts.; Thos. M. Johnson, 50 cts.; James Ford, 50 cts.; T. A. Worley, $1; C. W. Newton, $3.25; J. W. Fowler, $1; Jno. M. Hunt, $2; Miss Mary S. Osborn, $2; Mrs. M. G. House, 20 cts.; J. S. Thompson, 50 cts.; J. R. Holmes, $2; R. H. Ranney, $2; Mrs. R. F. Townsend, $2; Mrs. C. L. Henderson, 10 cts.; Joo. Hendrie, 10 cts.; L. S. Bacon, $1; Julius R. Rose, $2; Nicholas Jovanovich, 50 cts.; Benj. H. Watson, 40 cts.; M. A. Warren, $2; M. Hellman, $2; Walter B. Vanvart, $1; Jas. C. Boyden, $2; Jas. C. Boyden, $1.50; James Ives, 15 cts.; Geo. Iles, $2.50; L. W. Blakeley, $1; D. $2.90; H. Lockwood, 75 cts.; J. M. Lamb, $1; E. W. Piko, $2; C. S. Rowley, 50 cts.; Mary E. Hayden, $2; M. S. Clark, $2; R. Butler, 50 cts.; M. Welch, 50 cts.; E. B. Warren, $4; A. R. Morse, 50 cts.; Marceus Wright, $1.50; Mrs. H. W. Beach, $2; Wm. M. Ogden, 50 cts.; H. Sprague, 10 cts.; Edward Atkinson, $2.50; Mrs. Sarah B. Haynes, 15 cts.; H. C. Tuttle, 15 cts.; Delos Denton, $2; Jacob Miller, $1; Chas. Bonsall, 10 cts.; Dr. Jas. Fischer, 10 cts.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

RECEIVED.

CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY AND MODERN SKEPTICISM. By the DILE OF NORWICH, E. G. New York: D. APPLETON & COMPANY, 549 and 551 Broadway. 1872. 16mo. pp. 128.

FATHER TAYLOR, THE SAILOR PREACHER. Incidents and Anecdotes of Rev. Edward T. Taylor, for thirty years Pastor of the Seamen's Bethel, Boston. By Rev. GILBERT HAYES, Editor of "Zion's Herald," and Hon. THOMAS RUSSELL, Collector of the Port of Boston. Boston: Published by B. B. RUSSELL, 55 Cornhill. San Francisco: A. L. BANCROFT & Co. 1872. 12mo. pp. 446.

THE NEW VIEW OF HELL. Showing its Nature, Whereabouts, Duration, and How to Escape it. By B. F. BARRETT, Author of "Lectures on the New Dispensation," etc. Philadelphia: J. B. LIPPINCOTT & Co. 1872. 12mo. pp. 216.

THE FINDING OF THE BOOK. An Essay on the Origin of the Dogma of Infallibility. By JOHN ROBERTSON, Coupar-Angus. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. 1870. pp. 109.

A DIALOGUE BY WAY OF CATECHISM, Religious, Moral, and Philosophical. By A. PHYSICIAN. 1872.

HOW TO COMPLETE THE REFORMATION. A Lecture by EDWARD MATTLAND.

AN EPIPODE IN THE HISTORY OF RELIGIOUS LIBERTY. By Rev. CHARLES VOTREY.

CHRISTIANITY AND EDUCATION IN INDIA. A Lecture by A. J. RAMMOY, of Mysore.

A REPLY TO THE QUESTION, "Shall I seek Ordination in the Church of England?" By SAMUEL HINDS, D. D., (late Lord Bishop of Norwich.)

ON PUBLIC WORKS. By a Lady.

ON THE RELATIONS OF THEISM TO PARTISANISM AND THE GALLA RELIGION. By Prof. F. W. NEWMAN.

[The above tracts all published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mt. Pleasant, Ramsgate.]

STATE CHURCHES AND THEIR MODERN APOSTLES. A Lecture delivered in Rev. Mr. Vickers' Church, Cincinnati, on the evening of April 3, 1870. By J. B. STALLIO. Cincinnati: Robert Clarke & Co. 1872.

THOMAS PAINE. An Anniversary Address delivered before the Radical Club of Indianapolis, in Washington Hall, Jan. 30, 1872. By T. A. BLAND. Indianapolis: J. R. RANDALL & Son, Printers, 33 East Market St. 1862.

A PLEA FOR SCIENTIFIC REFORM. A Letter to Rev. Theodore L. Cuyler, D.D., on the Attitude of Physicians and Scientists towards the Temperance cause. By GEO. M. BEARD, M.D. New York: 1872.

EQUALITY BEFORE THE LAW. Speech of CHARLES SUMNER on his Supplementary Civil Rights Bill, delivered in the Senate of the United States, Jan. 15, 1872.

PORTAL TELEGRAPH. Speech of Hon. JAMES B. BECK, of Kentucky, delivered in the House of Representatives, Jan. 27, 1872.

MEMORIAL OF ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, ISABELLA BECHER HOOKER, ELIZABETH L. BLADEN, OLYMPIA BROWN, STEPHEN B. ANTHONY, and JOSEPHINE L. GUNTER, to the Congress of the United States, and the Affirmation thereon before the Judiciary Committee of the U. S. Senate by ISABELLA BECHER HOOKER, ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, and STEPHEN B. ANTHONY. Washington, D. C.: CHRONICLE PUBLISHING COMPANY, 511 Ninth St. 1872.

THE RADICAL. Published Monthly. March, 1872. Boston: Office of Publication 25 Bromfield St. $2.00 a Year.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, coarseness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated through the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution.—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single copies, Five Cents; Twelve Copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Stated and Answered from the Bible Standpoint, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
20 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO.

SOW THE SEED!

THE "IMPEACHMENT OF CHRISTIANITY," published in the first number of the third volume of THE INDEX, has been electrotyped, and an edition of Ten Thousand Copies has been printed in the form of

A Cheap Tract for Gratuitous Distribution!

It is intended to circulate One Hundred Thousand Copies during the current year. In order to accomplish this purpose, we must rely upon the co-operation of our active sympathizers.

☞ Packages of these TRACTS, containing any desired number of copies, will be mailed to any address on receipt of enough money to defray postage, and whatever additional sums, large or small, the generosity of distributors may prompt them to add.

Of course, money will be needed to carry out our intentions; but we urge every one who believes that THIS TRACT WILL DO GOOD, and who is willing to distribute copies of it, to send in an order at once, even if unable to donate more than the simple postage and the time required for distribution. Do not hesitate because you cannot give more. We are convinced more than ever by the character and objects of the late Cincinnati Convention, that such plain speech as this TRACT contains is greatly needed at the present time. In the name of Christianity,

A most Dangerous Attempt is now Making to Subvert the Religious Liberties

of the American People; and the mighty magic of that name is still powerful over multitudes even of otherwise liberal minds. Let the world learn that the protest made against Christianity is not made by hatred of Goodness and of Truth, but rather by a love for these that can no longer be satisfied with sham. He woefully misjudges this Tract who thinks it has no higher aim than to "make a sensation." It was meant to tell needed truth so plainly that it must be heard. And it will be heard. All we ask is—give it a chance.

☞ Address your orders to THE INDEX,
Drawer 23, Toledo, Ohio.

JUNIOR UNBASKED, or, THOMAS PAINE the author of the "Letters of Junius" and the "Declaration of Independence." A DEMONSTRATION. Royal 16mo. pp. 322. Price, $1.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.
Address JOHN GRAY & CO.,
112-3rd St.
P. O. Box 909, Washington, D. C.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice President.
P. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, New York, N. Y.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ASA K. BUTTS, Boston, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Toledo, O.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, " "
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN COLE, " "
EDWARD BISSELL, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo, O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	" "	Fifteen "	1,500
C. CONZ,	" "	" "	1,500
EDWARD BISSELL,	" "	Forty "	4,000
F. E. ABBOT,	" "	Ten "	1,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	" "	" "	1,000
GUIDO MARX,	" "	" "	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	" "	Three "	300
R. P. BARNETT,	" "	" "	300
H. E. HOWE,	" "	" "	300
W. C. FISK,	" "	" "	300
J. M. KROHNE,	" "	" "	300
Y. KERN,	" "	" "	300
ALANSON WOOD,	" "	" "	300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	" "	Five "	500
J. G. HOLLEWARTH,	" "	One "	100
JOS. E. MARX,	" "	" "	100
C. AUCHARD,	New York, N. Y.,	Thirty "	3,000
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York, N. Y.,	Two "	200
T. W. HIGGINSON,	New York, N. Y.,	Two "	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin, Pa.,	Five "	500
GEO. HOADLEY,	Cincinnati, O.,	Two "	200
Miss A. HALL,	Defiance, Mass.,	One "	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Northampton, Mass.,	" "	100
J. SEDGWICK,	Tonawanda, N. Y.,	" "	100
F. L. POST,	Painesville, O.,	" "	100
HENRY MILLER,	Mourne, Mich.,	Three "	300
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Sacramento, Cal.,	One "	100
J. L. WHITING,	Quincy, Mass.,	Five "	500
LOUIS BARNETT,	Boston, N. H.,	" "	100
J. E. SUTTON,	Croydon, N. H.,	" "	100
S. L. DUNN,	Olahe, Kan.,	" "	100
J. M. BARNETT,	" "	" "	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence, Mass.,	Ten "	1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill, Mass.,	Two "	200
JON. F. BARNETT,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	200
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange, Ind.,	Five "	500
FRANK PRATHER,	Boston, Mass.,	One "	100
E. F. DENMON,	Wellesville, Kan.,	One "	100
J. T. DICKINSON,	New York, N. Y.,	Two "	200
W. J. POTTER,	Middlefield, Ct.,	Fourteen "	1,400
G. C. GLATTE,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
W. C. GANNETT,	Kendallville, Ind.,	" "	100
Miss M. C. PERKINS,	Boston, Mass.,	One "	100
Miss S. EMMERSON,	Dover, N. H.,	" "	100
Miss E. EMMERSON,	" "	" "	100
W. H. DOWDER,	Birmingham, Ct.,	" "	100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing, Mich.,	" "	100
R. B. SMITH,	Warren, Pa.,	" "	100
W. C. RUSSELL,	Ithaca, N. Y.,	" "	100
WM. CLARKE,	Toledo, O.,	Three "	300
C. L. SMITH,	" "	One "	100
J. N. LYMAN,	Cincinnati, O.,	One "	100
L. F. FELCH,	Monroe Centre, Pa.,	" "	100
A. FOLGOM,	Boston, Mass.,	Three "	300
L. O. BASS,	Colebrook, Conn.,	One "	100
S. E. SAWALL,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
ELIUD WHORNT,	" "	" "	500
E. B. WARD,	Detroit, Mich.,	Twenty "	2,000
A. D. WILT,	Dayton, O.,	One "	100
S. S. BOWEN,	Kokouk, Iowa,	" "	100
WM. JONES,	Peekskill, N. Y.,	" "	100
S. H. DAVIS,	Oskaloosa, Iowa,	" "	100
J. H. YORK,	Dover, N. H.,	" "	100
JOS. HAYES,	" "	" "	100
G. P. FOLSON,	" "	" "	100
"A FRIEND,"	" "	" "	100
Mrs. H. E. PERKINS,	Boston, Mass.,	Two "	200
WILLIAM GREENE,	Orange, N. J.,	One "	100
"A FRIEND,"	Lowell, Mass.,	" "	100
D. B. STEEDMAN,	Brattleboro, Vt.,	" "	100
Mrs. F. W. CHRISTIAN,	Kelley's Island, O.,	Two "	200
C. W. FARGOT,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	One "	100
EDW. M. DAVIS,	" "	" "	100
Miss LUCY MOTT,	Jersey City, N. J.,	" "	100
Miss M. A. WHEAT,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
A. S. BROWN,	" "	" "	100
EDWIN BROWN,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
R. P. HALLOWELL,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
BENJ. BODMAN,	" "	" "	300
H. B. CLARKE,	" "	Six "	600
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo, O.,	Ten "	1,000
M. L. HOLBROOK,	Houlton, Me.,	One "	100
W. H. BOUGHTON,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	" "	Two "	200
E. G. BURNETT,	Webster, Mass.,	One "	100
J. E. FOLETT,	Winona, Minn.,	" "	100
JOS. WARBASSE,	Newton, N. J.,	" "	100
T. M. LANE,	Franklin, Pa.,	" "	100
W. H. DYKE,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
W. H. SPALDING,	Prairie du Chien, Wis.,	" "	100
LOUIS BELLORE,	Duluth, Minn.,	" "	100
LEWIS KURTZ,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	Two "	200
SAM'L WARBASSE,	Augusta, Kan.,	One "	100
W. L. RATHS,	La Fayette, N. J.,	" "	100
W. EMMERSON,	Amesbury, Mass.,	" "	100
C. H. HOBSON,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	100
Miss I. THOMSON,	Dover, N. H.,	Two "	200
BENJ. HALLOWELL,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	One "	100
Mrs. M. R. VAN KENSACKER,	N. Y. City,	" "	100
R. B. STONE,	Obenoch, Miss.,	" "	100
WM. RITCH,	Fall River, Mass.,	Two "	200
Mrs. J. WHITAKER,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Five "	500
S. H. ROPER,	Kerhonkson, N. Y.,	One "	100
Miss R. D. FRANCIS,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	Two "	200
CHAS. BONNALL,	Salem, O.,	One "	100
G. H. BRUGER,	Amesbury, Mass.,	Two "	200
J. T. CLARKSON,	" "	" "	200
C. W. NEWTON,	Canton, Ill.,	One "	100
HENRY KLEIN,	Toledo, O.,	Two "	200
OTTO KLEIN,	" "	One "	100
H. G. NEUBERT,	" "	Two "	200
A. HUNERT,	" "	One "	100
TOLEDO PRINTING CO.,	Detroit, Mich.,	Thirty "	3,000
T. K. PROZ,	Cincinnati, O.,	Two "	200

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 20 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 23 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM B. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.
Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription. Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 23, Toledo, Ohio.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE!

BOOK BUYERS who wish the LIVE BOOKS OF THE DAY can have their orders filled promptly by mail, post-paid by sending the Publisher's price to

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Bookseller and Publisher
TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE WORKS OF DARWIN, HUXLEY, SPENCER, TYNDALL, PROCTOR, FROUDE, EMERSON, MARX, MILLER, LECKY, M. D. CONWAY, JOHN WELLS, JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE, ROBERT COLLYER, ROBT. DALE OWEN, and all of the POPULAR BOOKS OF THE DAY constantly on hand.

☞ PRICE LISTS AND CATALOGUES sent upon application. Correspondence and inquiries solicited.

ANY BOOK PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED STATES

Sent post-paid on receipt of Price. Address

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Bookseller, Toledo, O.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $2.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 20 cents for a Specimen Number.

"A Success Every Time."

MERRY'S MUSEUM,

FOR YOUNG PEOPLE!

The Gem of all Juvenile Magazines.

—Index, Waterbury, Conn.

Terms $1.50 a year with a fine Steel Engraving free to every subscriber.

This Magazine contains more good reading for the price than any other one of its class.

—Eagle, Union City, Ind.

☞ A specimen number of "MERRY'S MUSEUM" with a full description of the premium engraving will be sent free to any address.

It is finely illustrated and occupies a solid truly its own. There is a sprightliness about it that is exceedingly charming.

—Jacksonville Independent.

Subscribe now for 1872 and get the November and December numbers of this year free.

Always welcome to the older members of the family as well as hailed with joy by the younger ones.

—The Occident, San Francisco, Cal.

☞ AGENTS WANTED! Great inducements! Send for terms.

HORACE B. FULLER, Publisher,
101-111st
14 Bromfield Street, Boston.

☞ The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent post-paid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word;") "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. BRADFORD; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. FROTHINGHAM; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, MARCH 9, 1872.

WHOLE NO. 115.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT.

Editor.

COTAVIUS BROOKS BROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. R. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOYSEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MORDECAI D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

P. H. BATESON.

Business Agent.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio."

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1872.

INTERPRETATION OF NATURE.

BY SAMUEL JOHNSON.

[Eighth Lecture in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, February 25, 1872.]

They who described the master-piece of Phidias as "seeming to add something to religion itself," might with equal truth have recorded that a fresh "word of God" can never be other than some form of noble human art. Religion, whether as thought, feeling, or action, must employ the elements and laws of Nature. From the savage who carves his fetish with a bit of flint to the theist who puts his ideal into arts, sciences and humanities, from the uncouth rune scratched on rock or tree to the Ode of Wordsworth or the Beatitude of Jesus, the measure of spiritual vitality is in the insight with which these laws and elements are interpreted and the love with which they are used.

Thus responsive to our appeal, Nature must be of one essence with us. Such invitation to express our highest thought is the sign of infinite sympathetic Mind. It implies, too, that the oneness of Man and Nature thus mysteriously hinted is an identity of the substance, and therefore to be apprehended only by his ideal vision and aim. Even in rude ages it is religion that identifies mind with the elements. And the civilized man, in applying the term "Nature," as he also does, to his inward and outward world alike, means thereby no less than substance, the genius of entity itself. In this one term he blends ideal and real, God and man. It means the world of the scientist and the world of the seer, hospitable alike to fact and dream. When our poet-philosopher would take us to the root of thought and things, he writes of "Nature." When our theology and piety come out into mature liberty, they turn champions of this Name that stands for the Perfection of the Whole. It is our root-word for sincerity; for the fit and becoming; for the simple, genuine, graceful and free. It is our tribute to genius; it means the spontaneity of childhood and the perfection of art; it is the exponent of universality in every great step of human progress.

This ideal unity of man with his surrounding, which the word Nature expresses, implies that his actual relation as a progressive being to the order of the universe is and remains substantially sound. And the laws by which this soundness is maintained, both physical and spiritual, are thus properly natural laws. To deny the ideal value of Nature, either in man or out of him, is simply the defeat of religion. It is easy to see why the theology which antagonizes natural and spiritual, as elements of his life, should also eternize misery. It treats the nature of man just as the nature of the world is treated, when it is held to be mere dead externality to mind. To deny that true relation to spiritual conditions is natural, is the same as if the farmer should deny the natural relations of his mind to laws of gravitation and growth, the very conditions under which he must live and work. In both cases, to dismember Nature is to demonstrate misery to be natural and eternal. This bad conclusion of the creed is in the bad premise.

OUR INTERPRETER OF THE WORLD IS THE IDEAL.

It is the highest ideal of man to realize his own unity with the universal order; and his interpretation of the sensible world, which represents the outward conditions under which he must achieve it, records the phases of this aspiration.

For the struggle involved in these natural conditions must not make us forget that, after all, the world means what we make it, and so awaits our best meaning as its own. Are not we its alphabet and key?

"We receive but what we give;

And in our light alone does Nature live.

Ours is her wedding garment, ours her shroud."

Where is our gauge of the world, but in ourselves? The primitive man reckons it on his fingers, measures it by his forearm or the palm of his hand. And the latest philosopher endows it with real existence, in spite of his doctrine of the "relativity of all knowledge," upon the warrant of his faculties alone. For what whispers to us that indispensable word existence, but the mind? Were there no infinite in our thought, there would be for us no boundless space for the worlds, nor endless time for their process; and where then were all our science and our song? The "unspeakable divine significance, full of splendor, wonder and terror," which man has seen in Nature, was the revelation of his own soul.

You see to what I would lead. To interpret is to refer things to an ideal standard. And it is by right of his ideals that man bids the world's meaning change and grow. This is what makes his childish fabled prophetic. Vishnu striding the earth and sky in two paces to disprove the claim of the demon of evil to own the world, Confucius announcing himself at his birth to be lord of the universe, the stars and the climes doing homage to the Infant Christ, Ulysses proving himself rightful master of his ithaca by bending the ancestral bow which foiled all pretenders,—are adumbrations of this eternal claim of the ideal in man to treat Nature as its patrimony, to exercise eminent domain over its meaning, supplant old faiths by new, and domesticate him more and more in the mastery of its forces and its laws.

I have defined this ideal as the aspiration to be one with the universal order. See how confidently it speaks in his earliest presentiments and in his latest science, repelling all implication that natural or moral evil can defeat this unity. Primitive Hebrew mythology bended the rainbow over a penal deluge, in token of an indefeasible good will even then discerned on the face of Nature. And our maturest reading of all natural strife and havoc is that these are incidental to development; that if the steps need bettering, it is because they waited and still wait for man.

No Syrian blood-offerings to fire could mar that cordial element which circulates through plant and star and human brain. It waited to shape the structures of our civilization. And now, if it turns a city to ashes, before these are cold its own steam and lightning have brought a world to the rescue. If it mows down best and worst, that very indiscriminate tendency to stay the superstition that calls elemental fury the outbreak of an angry God. Come closer to these austere lips of Nature, and we hear yet nobler responses. "Though my sunshine," she whispers, "is for the evil and the good, though my winds heed not whether it be saint or slaver that seeks a port, though my lightning never changed its path to strike a swindler's palace or a gambler's den, though my gravitation was never suspended to help a 'Messiah' save the world,—you shall not hold me reckless of the moral interests of man. Are you not learning that this very obduracy of my law to special justice is what guarantees everything dear to you in duty and desire? What transient benefit to good people could possibly compensate for the utter insecurity that would come in with the first miracle, even in their behalf; for the unreliableness that would paralyze all study of actual relations and uses?"

Opening our ears to this philosophy, science, we say, has not only justified Nature, but emancipated man. But where, I ask, could he have found courage for such a step, but in a prophetic impulse which preceded all sciences, and made them possible? His ideal confidence in his own inmost identity with the Universal Order is his inspiration. As it tempts our explorers into polar ices and tropic sands, so it made singers of the earliest seers, inviting their primitive Nature-Gods to sit as guests and companions at the home altars, and guard the graves; and making friends, like Indra and Hercules, out of the sun's grand round of labors for man. How penetrative that infantile reading of the bow in the sky! How passionate that pursuit of "life-elixir" and "philosopher's-stone," the struggling dawn of physical science! This ideal presentiment of harmony with the universe stimulated the quick sense of the Greek, so that he caught the rhythm of numbers in circling stars and human forms, and taught the world that pursuit of relation and trust in law which makes us masters of art and science, frees our theology, and inspires all our constructive work. This fine accord made Hellenic faith a worship of light and joy, so that Nature was ever the beautiful play of immortal mind, and death itself, as Nature's invitation, "a good hope" to Homeric hero and Athenian sage, as now to the bravest of us all. For, as one with the human ideal, it was Kosmos, or Beauty, and forbade doubt or fear.

NEGATIONS AND AFFIRMATIONS OF IT.

And when this happy acceptance of the order of Nature broke up in a terrible no, that rent man's life to its roots, had the universe all at once become his foe, that his faith in its name should fall? There at the beginning is the genial instinct of mythology, and here at the end the fearless insight of science, both interpreting it with homelike confidence. Yet for nearly two thousand years theology has been flouting at the very word, as if it meant the exact opposite of health and growth. Was Nature in fact what the creeds reported it, and have science and mythology alike deceived us? Not at all. The interpreter was wanting, the only interpreter; the ideal faith of man in his inmost self.

To a troop of merry children, a few red berries, strips of birch bark, or shining mica scales will suffice to make the woodlands shine. But if fret or quarrel arise, what poverty, what eclipse! An enemy possesses the woods and blasts their gifts. Here, in little, is the substance of that hatred of Nature which infects the creeds. The simpler races played with the day and the night, till a sense of sin carried its own misery into the spaces, and clothed the earth with penalty as with a pall. When his self-contempt undertook to read Nature, man's alphabet could spell out no meaning that was noble or sweet; and the friendly secret had to wait over, till his ideal was again at home within him. Christianity first pronounces the world under doom of destruction, and then world, flesh, and devil go into one category; until great Augustine comes at last to run the thought to its root, and say plainly that human nature is itself diabolic. For, with all its promise of help from without, Christianity took its tone from a condition full of misery, fear, and self-contempt. It offered itself as man's deliverance from himself and his world; hence its war on the very word "Nature," which means both these considered in their essence, and represents their ideal unity. That the best in this religion was a natural aspiration does not alter the fact, patent to any student of the New Testament, that it turned away at the same time from Nature in the senses and from self-reliance in the soul. And so the meaning of the world lay latent through all consequent reviling till man's faith in his own faculties, its true interpreter, should return.

Now we note, on the other hand, movements in history in which the ideal impulse begins in a sense not of shame but of self-respect; not in the fear of penalties or the suspicion of worthlessness, but in the ardor to discern uses and powers, and to achieve growth. And the sign of such a step is always a revival of respect for the word Nature. To this free impulse it means invitation and opportunity; unless soul and sense; becomes a name for human and divine.

Such ideal naturalism was reached eighteen hundred years ago in that moment of free impulse, not unlike our own, when the old polytheism was being put away, and Christianity had not yet been enthroned. The Roman Stoics had perhaps the noblest form of respect for man's natural relations with universal order that the world has ever seen. They sought to make him at one with this by making him at one with the equally natural conditions of inward and personal freedom.

"By paths of Nature," says Seneca, "man can become the companion, not the beggar, of deity."—"We are made for unity; what is done against each other, is done against Nature."—"Providence, nature, fate, fortune, are but different names for the same God."—"All things are fruit to me, O Nature, which thy seasons bring," said Marcus Aurelius, best of rulers and an imperial man. But it was a moment, also, of violent reaction against a sensuous Nature-worship, and self-abasement had become a passion. Men were seeking escape from themselves through some force that should antagonize Nature, within them and without. They cried out to be saved by miracle, because all familiar paths seemed to have proved ways to death. Spiritual demands always create their own supply. So that stoical self-respect had to give way to Christian self-abasement, for that age and for long ages to come.

The difference I would note was just here:—"Now, in this life," said the Stoics, "with laws, and liberties, and common mutual service in great public relations, we will build a city of God."—"Not in this life, not with these visible materials, not where men marry, and lay up treasures, and make governments, and obey laws, and look to bodily wants,—not like the Gentiles, but by hate of these natural relations, and by preaching the coming end," said Jesus and his disciples.

In this "gospel of the kingdom" the soul was in protest against its sphere—spirit and sense divorced—the universe rent. Disguised with his own past, man was laying the burden of his self-contempt on the constitution of the world, as if the evil were in that, as his tempter and ruin. So "Nature" meant curse. The Church of Paul and John knew no sadder word than that which our translators are substantially right in rendering "the natural man," meaning man in the order of Nature, the child of heredity, propensity and the law and drift of his own faculties. Christianity was held to be supernatural, in the sense of introducing a foreign element, to overrule and defeat these. It grew to be wholly ascetic, absorbed in the death of the body, the destruction of the world. For centuries it proscribed art, or caricatured it with haggard Christs and hideous saint-hood; and though human nature has continually protested even in the Church, drifting again to the side of beauty, yet church reformations, reaching to the primitive models, have usually consigned the fine arts to Satan. All through the Middle Ages the physical sciences were hunted down as the "Black Art." How the old instinct clings! Our own forefathers thought every charming bit of scenery was in league with the tempter, and gave it a bad name. The Puritan's horror of Nature, in man or out of him, is still so strong in his descendants that it would rather the faculties of laboring people should starve, than that they should be permitted the use of secular reading-rooms or the open country on Sundays, lest they cheat God of his time. Note that the Roman Catholic, which has strayed furthest of all churches from the primitive Christian idea, has the least of this jealousy of Nature and art. Yet Christian anti-naturalism was a step in the order of progress. It was inevitable that the sense of moral alienation, the plunge of the soul into self-contradiction and despair, the bitter dream that man was forfeit and life itself his foe, should gradually shape out for its relief a scheme of redemption by miracle; and that the remedy should bear marks of the morbid conditions which produced it, and which it had to meet. But this was not the only result of that stern experience which, like all earnest negations, was the stir of growth. There arose, also, a tender ideal longing for reconciling light on those inexorable compulsions and limits that made Nature the dark problem it was to faculties that must yet somehow come to good terms with it. And this longing could not be satisfied, still less silenced, by any scheme of mediation or tradition of miracle. Suffering, penalty, death—the inevitable in human lot—had always been the problem of thinkers and the burden of the heart, and more than the Christian's faith in his Incarnate God was needed for its solution. It had had its mythology and its art; its stern impassive Sphinx, its fate-tragedies, fates and furies avenging crimes on children's children. It had had its

"Woe of Creopora" line
And its tale of Troy divine."

It had had even its Church of Deliverance, in the "Mysteries" or Initiations, where immortality, providence and final good, were taught in mystic symbols to all thoughtful minds in the ancient world for a thousand years. There had been personal solutions, too, of these natural problems, such as Plato's vision of eternal ideas; and Socrates' serene reliance,—"If death gives me to divine society, let me die again and again;" and the manly Stoic sympathy with the order of Nature, "that dear City of Zeus,"—from Zeno and Cleanthes down to Aurelius the Emperor and Epictetus the slave. The pious trust of Jesus that all would be well with those who loved God and man also lent its aid in that reconciliation with the conditions of existence which man can never cease pursuing till it is thoroughly won.

Christianity, as I have said, had met this burden of inevitableness in what we should call natural laws by associating it with moral evil. These implacable conditions were explained as a doom, from which the Messianic miracle, breaking through them, and making them void, had provided the one way of escape. But the solution proved inadequate; first, because miracle did not come when it was wanted most; and suffering, penalty, death had to be borne, instead of being set aside; and second, because injustice was done to these constant forces themselves, as conditions of human progress.

Only two paths could lead to the genial interpretation required. The imagination must reconcile them with the ideal; the understanding must explore them without fear. Hence two fresh directions of thought; to Æsthetic and Moral Sentiment and to Positive Science. And it is by these two ideas that Nature has been lifted out of that shadow, cast by man's moral depression, which forced Jesus to think the world under an approaching doom, and which Paul called our natural subjection to the law of sin. Out of that eclipse ascend the world and the flesh; realities, not to be supplanted, but justified by noble uses. Out of that eclipse come forth the inevitable conditions of life, transfigured; not to be miraculously escaped, but to be accepted, trusted, developed as our own. Lo, now indeed man has risen from the tomb!

THE REVIVAL.

It is in the Middle Ages that modern sentiment and science begin their interpretation of Nature. We see them there struggling into life; and there stands the Church launching its bolts at these grand prophetic brows. Inevitably so. They were living protests against the dogma that man should renounce Nature for a mysterious efficacy in the Christ. The singers and the scientists of those days, pioneers of our civilization, worked outside the Church, undermining its theology and its authority. And as every law announced by the one class and every inspiration followed by the other meant a rival authority in man or Nature over the Church, so all new prophets of Nature in physics, ethics or song were persecuted, and, as far as might be, consumed by fire down to the last paper shred they had profaned. Exiled Dante was the type of their fate. The Troubadours, minstrels of love, were religious reformers earlier than the Protestants, preachers of dogma; and their native province was desolated by the Inquisition. John Tauler and his humane apostles were forbidden to preach their infinite sense of God and faith in man. Savonarola thundered natural ethics against a Church that dispensed with all moral allegiance, and he was silenced at the stake. Giordano Bruno set up scientific reason against blind faith, proved immortality by natural philosophy, pronounced the world infinite and its laws eternal; and he, too, went to the stake. Roger Bacon lay ten years in prison, with the name of sorcerer. Galileo tortured, Leibnitz and Spinoza under ban, Villanova's body burned for having belonged to a student of science—I need not recount these birth-pangs of our modern consciousness. Itself plunged in sensuality, the Church held fast to its function of protecting man against his arch-enemy Nature!

Thus driven forth from the fold of authority, science had to face and interpret the facts for itself. Could anything have been more needful for an energy whose very motive force is the spontaneous delight of the faculties in discovering the laws of beauty and use? By this delight the self-respect which a day of inward schism and shame had smothered, was rekindled; the interpretative ideal resumed its sway, leading men deeper than ever into the reconciliation of mind and matter, the soul and the world.

Hence more honor than ever centres in the name of Nature, which combines these two ideas, and intimates their unity; always the sign of a sense of healthful progress, homefelt confidence in life, and free play of human forces; until the term expresses Religion and Development in one, and expels every theological phrase and implication which would discredit the definition. A sublime intuition expels the trembling impotent slave that passed for man from the religion of our time, and makes it an enthusiasm, a new creator—I mean the sense of right in the world, and of right to the world.

And modern sentiment learns to announce the ideal law of this home-right, in such language as Beethoven's: "I have mastered music by accepting her immutable terms;" or as Lessing's, "Let me not have the truth by outright gift; better than having it is the free pursuit and earning of it;" or as this comment of Schiller on Lessing's "No man must must." "Nothing is force in Nature's dealing with the free man, since before it comes to him it has already, by his choice of it as good, become his own action, or else he has spontaneously withdrawn his real self above the range of its control."

Not less clear its admonition to egotism and self-assurance not to spoil this magnificent gift of the new day.

"Let knowledge grow from more to more,
But more of reverence in us dwell;
That mind and soul, agreeing well,
May make one music as before,
But vaster."

MODERN SCIENCE.

The interpretation of Nature by Science is claimed as the distinctive achievement of modern thought. And how radical a religious emancipation is involved in the idea of development by law needs not here be explained. The time has past for the student to open his book of Nature by being sworn upon the text of Scripture, that he will spoil artless poetry to make Nature superstition. From the Adam of Genesis, or man who is not man at all, to the Christ and "Second Adam," or God-Man who answers neither to the idea of God nor to that of man, and the New Jerusalem, dropping like them straight down from the sky, a city that is no city,—the whole Bible world of historical construction by miracle contradicts all our methods of inquiry and grounds of belief. And with its external Shemitic God are disappearing his corollaries—plan of salvation, and pettiness of final causes, imported mediator, special creations, and all other intermittent shocks from outside batteries to the order of the world. Nevertheless we shall not disparage that element of aspiration which has been inter-fused with these now out-worn convictions, both in the Bible and the church; an inner substance, more lasting than their special forms, or than the blind belief they were held competent to command.

But what I would note is this. Science, superseding the stand-point of miracle and Bible, can not supersede the law that man's sense of harmony with the universal order depends on his faith in the faculty of ideal affirmation, and its power to bring truths transcending demonstration out of his inmost oneness with Truth and Beauty and Good.

Ever since Bacon summoned mankind to observation and experiment, scientific theory has tended to disclaim ideal interpretation. Yet as this herald himself was a very child of imagination and faith, so the actual basis and material of science comes to consist more and more of ideal forces, given neither in observation nor experiment.

From Bacon's epoch onward to "natural selection" and "evolution of forces," and the molecular mechanics of which science is now constructing Nature, what increasing effort to exclude ideal pre-conceptions, what growth of resource by the increasing use of ideal data! This fact alone may well suggest that an element so vital and constant should not be treated as if science were its maker, or even its absolute master, with power of life or death over its genius, which is in imagination, intuition and faith. This would be to bring in a fresh despotism, analogous to that of Bible, Christ and Church, and, I think, quite as intolerable.

And so, in my judgment, the next step in our interpretation of Nature should be this. Since science, according to Spencer and Mill, its best expositors, is distinctly concerned with the order of phenomena, tests knowledge by the understanding, and derives it from "experience" alone, it must be fully recognized that these marks evince its limitations, not its all-sufficiency. It does not quite meet the case to lay up "ultimate cause" on one side as "the unknowable," and then to give these methods and processes full swing to rule out, to explain, and to define.

Their explanations, it should be constantly borne in mind, do not yield the genesis of ideas, nor interpret the facts in which they deal.

I note that when Spencer, or Tylor, or Lubbock endeavors to show how such ideas as number, equality, or likeness originate in "experience," he is so far from describing their actual advent in the savage or infant mind, that the explanations merely re-state the ideas themselves, accounting for a thing by its definition. In fact these general conceptions involve a predictive, imaginative, ideal element, which presses to a point far beyond what is given in the outward data which awake it. Experience, as the scientific "genesis," or sole source of knowledge, itself needs a genesis. As Goethe has well said, "They who prize experience exclusively, forget that experience is but the half of experience."

As with origin, so with interpretation. To call organization a "re-distribution of matter and force" rides it of supernatural interferences; but it does not reveal the significance of Nature for man. To say that "organic development begins with homogeneous matter" may be historically true, and to say that man begins with a "Golden Age" may be historically untrue. Yet the one yields quite as incomplete a reading of the genesis of life as the other does of the infancy of man. To say that "instability of the homogeneous and multiplication of effects are the causes of heterogeneity," is to use phrases which account for a set of facts by re-stating them in a different form; but these phrases give neither their genesis nor their interpretation. Only the ideal can do this.

Let me illustrate the defect. For Lyell, Darwin, Spencer to put "insensible modifications of forces" in place of "special creations" seems to me a magnificent step, as basis for interpreting Nature. But what if science tries to act as sole interpreter with this idea? When Spencer describes it as explaining the suffering and wrong in Nature better than the other, because not involving, like that, a Creator inspired with malevolent purpose,—we can hardly assent; since there still remains the terrible fact of their existence, however explained, and no purely scientific observations will ever make this fact less awfully blind and dark. All the data require to be interpreted by the conception of what Spencer's principles declare to be wholly outside scientific knowledge, in the realm of "nescience;" namely, perfection of Mind or Soul, discernible by man neither as definite purposes nor in observed facts; and reconciled with these facts through his ideal imagination and faith alone. Because superstition has abused these fine organs of sight, are we therefore to give them over to the limits of the understanding for entire suppression? They are the eye that sees the inscrutable facts not only as conditions of finite growth, but as infinite opportunity; and pierces through depressing phases to a necessity of noblest ultimate meanings. If science deals only in what is realizable by the understanding, I do not see how it can of itself supply any other key in place of that definiteness of final causes which it justly sets aside. It simply yields us new facts of Nature, which we must still take to the intuitive faculty to be read.

I do not honor science less because it does not account for the order of Nature, nor supplant ideal interpretation. And I make this following statement, in what I believe to be its highest interest. If we conceive the laws of "evolution," "development," "genesis," "production" and the like as coming to as through observation and experience alone, and give the terms themselves no meaning but such as these sources supply, and yet take them as sole data for the explanation and definition of facts, it will be to mistake the mechanism of the universe for its soul, and the processes of Nature for their substance. Such a result will be especially apparent in the attempt to define and test the intuitional faculty itself, the crown of the ideal realm, solely by these processes of the understanding. And however competent they may be to bring special intuitions to clearness or control their reading of Nature by facts—if taken as source and judge of the faculty itself, they must hide the essential meaning of its data for the imagination and the sentiments, and practically put them aside.

A strong drift in this direction attends the present special development of the physical sciences.

Two causes, the gravitation of the understanding towards facts that are most obvious, and the reaction of interest to a sphere from which theology had excluded it, have given these sciences such prestige that they are coming to be held competent to determine what can or cannot be known. And so man's ideal relations, made questions of physical research, of course get such definitions as this account of their origin can afford. Now physics must explore for origin in the direction of the elementary structure of bodies; that is, in a downward and backward direction. That is its proper function. What is the result of this method, or the assumption that distinctive science is the only source of knowledge?

The ascent of forms in Nature will be construed as pure production of greater things by less; and the terms which express this ascent made to imply derivation of largest result from least resource. Oak shall be explicable from acorn and man from beast. Now it does not harm us to find that man is the son of an anthropoid ape. That is one thing. But suppose this physiological progenitor is taken as accounting for man. In other words, suppose, in general, that the lower terms are to be taken as explaining the higher, then such spiritual affirmations as are grounded in what transcends our highest thought, either disappear or take emasculated meanings. An illustration will best show the effect of the method itself.

Thus Huxley, regarding consciousness itself as a function of nervous matter, is not prevented by his admitted ignorance of the steps by which the transition from nervous molecule to mental state is produced, from defining the moral consciousness by simple facts of pleasure and pain. He perceives nothing in the phrase "immutable morality" but the mere fact that man will always be capable of feeling certain things as pleasant and certain others as painful. Spencer regards the faculty of moral intuition itself as a product of organized experiences through concentric races, and refers moral feelings to physiological causes. And Darwin's notion of conscience is "the dissatisfaction felt from gratifying a passing interest instead of an enduring one." This strange masquerade of the conscience and law of right, through which I confess myself quite unable to recognize them, is simply a result of deriving the higher from the lower, and excluding ideal relations, after the method of physical science just described.

I do not, of course, ascribe to these writers the negations of the so-called "positivists," which they deny. Nor do I suppose them unaware that to run back to some primitive starting-point is not to find the ground of a fact in Nature; or that the ground of each fact is in the movement of the whole; or that the search for origin leads us at once into the mystery of origination itself, as instant and constant fact. Yet their full emphasis on historical derivation, after isolating ultimate cause as unknowable, none the less directly leads to definitions like those just given, which strip the intuitions of their vital meaning.

These are results of the physical method divorced from the ideals. But what I would here say of it is, that to expect it to determine the meaning or the worth of intuitions for which it cannot account, is to me as striking an instance of mistaken jurisdiction as is to be found in the history of thought.

Upon the very face, however useful as analysis, it makes no headway as a pursuit of origin, even in scientists of so admirable a breadth as Herbert Spencer himself. Perhaps I may misapprehend it as it lies in their minds. I am sure I do not misread the consequences of it in the current thought of the time, and as a practical habit or thought.

The phases which physicists employ to express beginnings have of course but a secondary and inferior sense. "Origin of Species," "Basis of Life," mean simply that a series of processes have been traced to some provisional point of departure. Back of the origin of species lies that of life. Ecce protoplasm! But this is also a vanishing point; and the piercing eye of the microscope already searches for archigenesis, or birth of life from the inorganic. And it is manifest that this line crossed, the hunt must go on till we find some bridge of atoms across the nebular dust itself to a new departure; yet it will never reach a beginning, for the simple reason that there is none.

And now what if it be supposed that this bee line of phenomena from cruder to cruder conditions yields all we can know of the ground and source of things; in other words that, so far as we know, the lower stage of its own force makes the higher? That ideal fact which gives the very substance of all cause is excluded. Could I be shown vegetable protoplasm passing into animal, or some form of ape life into life unmistakably human, what authority should I have for inferring that the one form ORIGINATED the other? Here are successions, conditions; the cause must lie deeper; since while a less may be the pure product of a greater thing, a process admitted to be an ascent requires for its explanation the presence of resources as great at least as are represented by the higher term. And so for a continuous indefinite progress, a source is required greater than the greatest term conceivable. Thus the physical method of Vagt or Biechner, in so far as seeking adequate causes in the lowest germs, and presenting the protoplasmic atom as the real father of mind, reverses our conception of cause, as of power, and sweeps away their essential, with their ideal, basis.

The million-seeded tree is not the product of one seed; it is the concentration of heaven and earth: the child of what is infinitely greater than itself, not of that material atom which was cast into the ground. So let the ape, and welcome, have grown into the man. Yet man none the less involves not apewood merely, but at least as much greater spiritual force than his own manhood as is needed to explain the advancing spiritual element that is in it.

I do not criticise the physical method; only the attempts to read Nature by it without the ideal faculty. What does it discover? Simply that a continuous thread of conditions connects the lowest forms with the highest; albumen, nitrogen, carbon at one end, heroism and sainthood at the other. Yet not one step in the series is proved adequate to account for the next above it. Socrates and the "cytod" are alike unsolved. And one thing at least is evident to the sense of causality, that for this magnificent ascension there is required, and that constantly, and at every point, a higher form of force than historical generation supplies. Many times as much of the sun's creative heat comes from the invisible as from the visible rays, says science, so limited the range of her outward vision. But just as dark to her inward eye are the master forces that stir in every step of evolution. This is what I want to see emphasized.

THE INTUITIONS AND SCIENCE.

It is plain that the method in question can never elicit even a suggestion of Infinite Mind. The very process from greater to less forecloses this: the logic makes it a needless hypothesis. Even physicists who admit that ultimate force eludes their analysis will yet, if reaching for causes towards least developed forms of being only, naturally infer that this indispensable force which they cannot reach is the lowest and least developed of all; and this will be their idea of ultimate cause. It is not the downward, but the upward look that finds infinity, for the scientist or the saint.

So of immortality. If the lower accounts for the higher, we have metamorphosis of forms, transmigration of atoms, a ladder whose rungs drop and are replaced: but only these migrating atoms shall be undying. If mind be Biechner's "resultant of brain," then what the physical nexus accounts for, shall not its separation dissolve? If vital phenomena are only physico-chemical, where shall that inviolable thing we call immortality enter this field of ascending forms? Pile these flitting physiological atoms as you will, they shall never utter the words "immortal mind." "And what then?" you may say. "If this life be all, is it therefore vain?" By no means. But the fact I state remains true. The persistence of a physical atom or force is all this method can mean by "immortality."

And so of Duty. The explanation of the moral faculty, already quoted, derives it from the reciprocal relations in which two elements, the individual and the social, have been found to stand. But what if they do so stand? Can that give us a moral faculty, or a moral sense, the very force in us to which the relation must appeal? As well say that this faculty came by the sermon on the Mount or miracle of Pentecost. Does the mere observation of two associated facts account for that sense of absolute personal allegiance which goes with the word right? Of course this is left out of the definition. So thoroughly does the physical method of seeking the source of things in what is inferior to themselves eviscerate the ethical principle in the attempt to explain it. In fact all this analysis is but the laying open of a dead body; and an autopsy never yet showed the processes of life.

How should these three cherished elements of man's faith in the universal order, which the exclusive physical method of science is unsuited even for discerning, be subject to the decision of this tribunal? As they reach us by no such path, so they stand or fall by no such criterion. They are ideal elements, and do not come to us from the world of experience to interpret us, but from us to interpret it.

Nor do they come from science in any form, if science means the processes by which the understanding advances from definite data to definite results. These data are undefinable, immeasurable, impalpable. They are in the substance of our own personality, and rest on its authority, behind which we cannot go any more than one can raise himself in a basket by the handles or ply a lever without a point of rest.

In every mental act, we consciously or unconsciously assume this authority. To what else do the sciences make their appeal? What is it that sees, judges, names, interprets all their material—"evolution," "development," protoplasmic basis and physico-chemical process, and all,—but human personality and its spontaneities of thought? I do not find definitions of life as "correlation," or "combination," or "adjustment of forces" adequate. They leave out the chief factor, man himself. It is we that stand here, fathers of our conceptions of Nature. Do we pass for nothing in all this show, we the substance of it? What are time and space, the very conditions of its process, but idealities, through which things take their shape, relation, order, meaning for us? Do not bring physics to account for us, their architects. Personality is the primal witness as it is the primal mystery; and all fruitful research into origin starts from this. No number of special experiences constitute the consciousness, or the moral faculty, which are generative forces of living mind. To suppose that no clear voice ever issued from this shrine, is to drop the ground of all process and all study of Nature. It is to forget, too, that the value of a pursuit depends on the worth of the pursuer.

Given in the personality is its ideal vision. It sees essential substance and cause; conceives it with greater or less distinctness as Infinite Mind, as sole basis for all its own possibility as mind, and as in some sense inseparable from it. And this intuition of God,—not a God, but God,—imagination, sentiment, all ideal energies in man have combined with the purifying toils of science to develop into the sense of all-pervading, all-satisfying Ideal Good, not limited by our desires or prayers, nor by our conceptions of final cause, nor introduced at intervals; but the transcendent ground and Indwelling Life of that whole order of the universe with which it is man's inmost necessity to become one. By the light of this developed intuition we read the religions of the past with happy recognition of a common desire. Moses, Plato, Antoninus, Jesus, Mohammed in their different ways are all striving to utter this word, Infinite Mind. They did not wait for science; they waited neither for Spinoza to grudgingly demonstrate to them that God is all, any more than for Comte to lay out the order of the sciences on an ideal plan, and then report that God, the Ideal itself, was nowhere!

Why should you go to physics, any more than to the Bible, to determine whether there is Infinite Intelligence? A God measurable by the understanding, dependent on the latest discovery for life or death, were not worth keeping. But come home to your ideal thought, you find somewhat implied therein, which makes loving, trusting, aspiration, to be freedom and joy. Were it not Mind that reached out on every side of this moral and spiritual personality of yours, I think you would hardly be alighting at better or dreaming of best. For it is by mind that mind lives, loving and pursuing what is like itself. Would our thought explore causes, if it were not of one essence with the Cause of causes? Do we not "think the world," as Malebranche said, "in and through God?"

Again as indivisible unit, self-identical through all natural changes, personality, once arrived at existence, affirms its own permanence. In this indivisibility Plato read that which makes men unconsciously act on the presumption of immortality. There are other ideal data to like effect. "We feel that we are more than a mere nothing which someone has animated." A quick sense of new birth haunts man, waiting its opportunity to thrill him as he wakes from sleep; coming to the young in parenthood; refreshing the old with dreams of returning youth. There is in him a profound attraction to life: ever associating deathlessness with the noble appreciation of its uses, with whatever moves his admiration, his affections, his largest good will; ever turning good men into guardian gods. A still deeper guarantee is in the home-sense of intrinsic relations with truth. These are not experiences only, but interpretations of experience, that reach beyond it. Nor do I see how science can touch the substance of the intuition, which does not at all define what we shall be, but simply associates as with continuity and permanence as an indefinable ideal, whose elements it is in fact our liberty, and not our bondage, to leave unresolved.

These are ideal data of the personality, relate to what transcends its experience, and stand by no other authority than what its dignity imparts. We need not overlook this value because there are those who, believing that this life is all, still find it a noble sphere, and who at the least escape the pettiness of doing or being good in it to save their souls in another. For the prophetic faith that would perpetuate personal opportunity to be left to the final decision of physical research or practical observation is to drop the very faculty by which these are made to point beyond themselves to personal dignities and uses.

So too the moral sense, which no analysis can pick out of physical causes, is given in that inherent relation of man to what is above his individual life; to the Infinite and Eternal—names which the ridicule of physicists will hardly strip of their initials so long as they yield such living meaning. It is man's ideal aspiration and vision which announces that all-preserving word Duty. It was not given in his understanding, nor taught him by the earth or sky. No exploration of these can prove that to be unreal the path of whose coming is not in them. They teach new duties and untouch old, but that which gives meaning to all their lessons must flow through them all.

INDISPENSABLENESS OF THE IDEAL.

I would emphasize this independence of the ideal element. A science of the intuitions would not give the intuitions themselves. It must assume the personality as primal spring of thought, and framer of the moulds in which thought must flow. Mr. Spencer has shown that we do not scientifically know our personality at all. Not the less must we accept these moulds. It is not on the authority of science that we accept the principle of causation. It is on the authority of this principle that we pursue the processes of science. The closer to our life a fact is, the less capable it is of demonstration. What is the scientific proof that I think, or that I am I? Or that I ought to do right? Or that thought implies subject and object? Or that I am justified, when a Darwinian has proved by social instincts that an action is for universal good, in bringing in such a notion as ought to bear on the fact? These elements are unfathomable, indefinable, in a word ideal. How to trace and explain them we know not. But that we have them and others of like origin is the spring of constancy in all becoming desires. For moral and intellectual ascension depends on a certain presumption of free, sure space, as much as a bird's wing does on the open air. An absolute trust in what you have no need of proving, in what your own intellectual limits do not confine: in what must open out for you beyond your furthest flight. All great movements must have, like the lever, its centre of rest. And thus our intuitions of God, Duty, Immortality, however their meanings may change, are attested by the culture they condition, and remain the eternal alphabet of the world. I hold them as signs of an authority in the faculty that yields them, to guarantee the substance of its special affirmations, through whatever changes modify their meaning.

Through all the positive truth which science brings to guide him, man's ideal import continues to interpret Nature, not less than in his childish mythologies. We have seen how closely the reading conforms to the phases of this element in him. To his theological self-contempt, which excluded it, the world means satanic guile. To a physical method which ignores ideal data, it becomes void of hold for spiritual beliefs. And as this law is inevitable and supreme, as it is what he brings with him that must determine what he shall find, so it is by eminent right that his ideal self-affirmation pours through the process of the worlds that infinite meaning of which religion and ethics are expressions.

ITS POWER AND WORK.

It is not wisdom to deny this master of meanings. He, at least, is indispensable. No art of ours can paint autumnal woods. Yet does not our ideal hope and faith warm the hues of their dying leaves into flames of prophecy, and hear in the chickadee's trill in late October the bugles of returning spring? What do we mean by the "wisdom" that "day utters to day and night to night" but man's ideal world? What are the fables and proverbs of nations, the parables of the teachers, the imagery of the seers, but the assumption of his choicest meaning by Nature, to bloom for him in her terms and forms forever?

The imagination of man is the life and light of the world; transfusing Nature with sentiment and purpose, and mastering the doubts and fears that a literal rendering would teach, by "reading the earth from heaven and things below from above." This symbolism has authority in his being. The celestial paths and cycles have always made so large an element in it, because he is made for rhythm, and the return of his life on itself, in ceaseless renewal, reaches within him into infinite significance. Music, poetry, prophecy, progress, work out the instinct of rhythmic self-recovery and growth.

It is the courage of the moral ideal to claim Nature as its own that now dares to prove the world no penal prison, nor mere probational soil and contrast to another life, but invitation to the best motive and resource. Hence the imagination is only rendered the more nobly human by the science that supplants its fictions by pure facts. This exquisite apocalypse of the lens and the prism makes the old colors of theological heavens and hells too crude and trivial to interest us. Yet this very transfer of regard to the visible present world which science and art effect is directed by a moral ideal: a passion for the right of things, raised to intense devotion by finding actual Nature so much richer than the supernatural which it supplants; so that the very withdrawal from other-world anticipations as if this life were the only immortal life, holds a moral dignity that brings immortality itself to higher meaning.

Nature responds to the new confidence like a soul that has found its sphere. As it opens to this earnest sympathy and search for the real only, it seems hastening to be beforehand with meaning for the Idealism that centres in a supreme love and living service of truth. Make but this the ear that listens, and Swedenborg's correspondences shall seem but crude hints, mere play on a single string of this conscious instrument. What a recitative of pure loyalties is the tribute of each atom to the whole through adherence to its law; their polarity and balance of forces; the pulse of the earth to the planetary attractions, the solar storm felt at once in the magnetic thrill of every orb! In the still ordeal of the spectrum, where every infinitesimal yields its secret to the test of fire, and there is no escape for it from being sifted into pure essence and tenderest hue, waved by the flaming sword to its own place, and so justified at once by the sense of beauty and the law of right,—we greet the image of that constructive treatment of character, which seeks fit use and place for every element and justifies it thereby: a more ideal Judgment-Picture than Michael Angelo's, free of the old destructive wrath. Is not the free play of convertible forces, the dance of shifting forms which science traces, the very world for the æsthetic faculty to interpret by its own liberty and creative joy? The very world to stir this Ariel with hope to turn all ugly Callibans that lurk in Nature to nobler uses? Does it not belong to the finest sense of truth to read these delicate relations and fidelities of forces that seem to raise artists and lovers out of the stocks and stones?

So perfectly are the moral and physical laws coming to be bound in one meaning, under the common name of Nature, dear to poet, philosopher, believer, again in the maturity, as once in the childhood of man. Representing this unity, freed from superstition and re-enforced by scientific method and resource, it opens its new gospel. Leave better worlds till they come, and make this world better than the best of them ever seemed. Buy no otherworld policies of the ecclesiastical brokers, but greatly insure mankind by your ideal personality here. Let alone supernatural redemption, and work out natural: work straight into the earthly elements, artists of your human ideals in virtues and institutions. Your kingdom is of this world.

Your key to Nature is invariable law. Forget not that its basis and guarantee are ideal: that this very step of the mind from observed successions to invariable rule requires a predictive vision beyond experience: that it is a mystery of the personality, and demands that we hold that in highest honor. The universality of Law is itself an intuition: the understanding could never have found it in any number of special instances; and yet this is the white light itself out of which science unfurls all her rainbows of analysis. And wherein lies the prestige of Law? In the assumption of an intelligent being that this is the method best suited to perfect Intelligence. Or do we lift this perfection of Law in God above definite volitions and limited purposes? It is because, beholding the reach and mystery of thought in ourselves we find it most becoming to infinite intelligence to be thus unconfined. Our sciences all rest on bases that do not exist in observable Nature, but are supplied by these mysterious steps of the ideal interpreter within us. Where in actual Nature are the equal units of the calculus? Where the geometrical forms? The circle, line and point? Where the molecules, the axes of crystallization, the axis of the earth? Where the true pendulum that measures seconds at the pole? And where the ether wave, of which it takes hundreds of trillions, entering the eye at once, to make red light?

THE PERSONALITY AS INTERPRETER.

Everywhere we are led back to the dignities of the personality. What are eye and ear and brain but its pensioners? Can lenses and bone-labyrinths and fibre batteries explain the joy of man in the beauty of the world? Hearing itself is but a response to a hearer, seeing to a seer. Every step in physical science goes back to its conditions in a prophetic faculty, and man seems to have been divining it all through the ages. We love to note the fine foreshadowings of modern discovery in ancient mythology and science, which multiply as we grow free for better acquaintance with them. But we are not apt to consider how much it means for each of us that Pythagoras, without an experiment, should have known numbers to be the secret of the world whose relations and proportions we are now reading off as chemistry, botany, astronomy; or that Kepler should have been listening to the chime of planetary movement within him, long before the music could get itself clothed for him or us in the actual laws of celestial mechanics.

And beyond all this, is not the very perception of Nature in itself a mystery of intelligence? This first step of consciousness puts you where the physicians cease to guide. You become, here at least, the transcendentalist who has no place in their systems. For seeing is after all thinking the thing you see. And the problem of the world recedes into the profounder problem of mind.

In claiming for the personality the ultimate right of interpretation, note that I make this demand in behalf of the ideal in man, his power of moral and spiritual recognition, his aspiration to unity with the Universal Order. In other words, not in behalf of a petty individualism, but against it. Nature is not explicable as mere highway and freight, meat and cupboard, lights and fuel, or as otherwise ministrant to private plans and desires. She bids us die, for one thing; and we did not plan that. How helpless our love of life before one little heave of a bit of the earth's crust, or a drop less of ozone in the air! The law that wastes a myriad seeds where it brings one to perfection, and destroys whole races to make way for others, can be interpreted only by the key we bring with us as beings divinely capable of disinterestedness. Read by this ideal, the law of death says, "Yield the form, and let the substance use you for its ends." Give yourself like seed and species to the whole, and let this painful transiency sift out, as it will, all but that which is fittest to endure. Only Duty can yield the reconciling light. That is no spiritual science which would rule out discipline of self-denial, loyalty and patience, that stand for us in the very mystery of death. It is but idolatry of self-indulgence, whose cravings are not competent to measure the serious purport of Nature.

Go into the forests. See what immeasurable destruction awaits the delicacy of leaves and flowers; what wasting beds of pine-needles, that but just now stood ranged in orderly lines to give the wind a voice, perhaps unheard; and how the very fungi of an hour are overspreading dead trunks with frailest mimicry of the convolvulus and lily in their shapes and hues; and what golden rain of sunshine is sifting through the foliage in millions of exquisite fugitive images, of which you can see but one or two!

What can this mean, if Nature is but a mechanism of human economies and utilities? But trust your ideal of an Infinite Beauty, freely filling all space and time with the best and fairest, by its own inward law, and your book of Nature grows clear. You will know by participation what it means to work out your highest human art for its own sake, and leave it without asking who shall record it, or whether it shall live or die.

The transmutation of forms and forces confirms that oldest persuasion that "all things are in flux." How read between the vanishing lines? By bringing that ideal Reverence for the Permanent which enables you to perceive through all this evanescence a constancy of beauty and use. How find the moral unity that shall give coherence to this dioramic show?

By your ideal Reverence for the Universal, the One in All; sole key to the meaning of invariable laws, and interchangeable forces, and the ascending chain of forms: to the religions and the sciences: secrets of Darwin and the Vedas alike.

Bring your ideal of sentiment, and Nature, no longer automatic rules, is gifted with a heart. Science, opening up the drift of destructive forces to universal good, the antidotes and compensations, the wise precautions, the fitting uses, preaches inheritance of providential care. There is even persuasion to noble living in the competition of lightning with sunshine for service to the arts and charities of life. A somewhat deeper trust in the moral intuition and science will have slain the superstitions that death is a penalty for sin, and that the pain of collision with natural laws is a scourge of wrath. It will be held a folly to ascribe to "Christian revelation" whatever in Nature has made men good or happy, and then shudder in homilies at her insufficiency to cheer or comfort, at the "oppressive silence," the "whelming vastness," the "dead unconcern." It is not Christian revelation that authorizes our trust in the order of Nature. It is the freedom of the ideal to interpret it that finds its vastness no drawback to the minute providence of its laws. Only a reverent love of the infinite makes the Parsec at home in the presence of the stars he adores. And the eye of an orthodox Christian scientist that measures their enormous spaces wants just the same eternal light behind its own. To ideal reason and love, an African Sahara, waiting but the prick of its sands to break forth everywhere into a garden of life, becomes the symbol of all our social deserts, now awaiting but the artesian wells of beneficent science to prove Nature everywhere greater than the religions of the past have dared to dream.

The freedom of the moral and spiritual personality to interpret Nature is rapidly ripening. Neither Church, Bible, nor exceptional Christ can longer postpone its self-reliance. No reverence can be won for Jesus by disparagement of man nor for Christianity by defamation of intuition or of science. If the symbols and analogies of Nature do not satisfy doubt, still less can any witness brought to supplant the universality of law. But not the less is it of moment, in view of an absorbing faith in consolidated external machinery for making and developing human forces in the name of science, to affirm a yet higher personal emancipation. It is no better for us to be sworn to a utilitarian than to a biblical rule and squire. I would emphasize the truth that science does not originate and cannot finally test man's spiritual intuitions. They are his faith in his own ideal nature. If he doubts them, least of all is it by physical analysis that he can reach their track. It is vain to seek the living among the dead. We may see life issue from larval clouds and crumbled rocks, but we shall search these sepulchres in vain to reach the mystery of its origin, to learn how it came there, or how long it shall endure. On relations with the Infinite there opens no daylight, but as Intuition is accepted as man's primary guide. Then Nature starts into symbol, flashes with confirmation, becomes their fit atmosphere and soil. It feeds the high desire, bears on the sacred song of the soul. It is no longer the taunt of man's insignificance, but the nurse of his self-respect. For the world but shadows forth the sacrifice, the patience, the freedom and the growth that are predestined to him in the laws of his spiritual being.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—No more copies of the bound volume of THE INDEX for 1870 (Vol. I) can be furnished. They are all disposed of.

We are frequently indebted to friends for clippings from newspapers containing interesting articles, paragraphs, &c, which we should not otherwise see, and which we should be sorry to miss seeing; and we desire to express our thanks for their thoughtful kindness.

A friend asks a reply through THE INDEX to certain questions concerning our lecture on "The God of Science." We should gladly oblige him if we could do so in a reasonable space; but the subject is such as to require a detailed treatment. In fact, it would require a volume rather than a small journal like this. We were unable to use a title of the material we had accumulated, and were obliged to confine ourselves to a mere outline sketch of our thought. Our friends for the present, at least, must excuse us from attempting a better exposition of it, though we are painfully conscious of the inadequacy of the lecture as it stands.

The Jewish Times, of New York city, has our sincere thanks for urging its readers to fill up lists of signatures to the counter-petition, and for promising to send them to THE INDEX to be joined with the rest. We have already received many names of Jewish citizens for this purpose, and take especial pleasure in the knowledge that they are thoroughly devoted to the cause of civil and religious liberty. The Jews have an absolute right to enjoy their own religion in this country unmolested and unhampered by political disabilities; and, as a class specially interested in the preservation of the Constitution as it is, it is especially fitting that they should join in the great protest against the machinations of those who would pervert it to the service of religious intolerance.

The Index.

MARCH 9, 1872.

MRS. WOODHULL'S LETTER.

On returning from our recent journey to New England, we found among numerous other articles sent for publication a manuscript from Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull, which had been received nearly a week previous. We publish it at our earliest opportunity as an act of justice, believing that she has a right to be heard in her own defence, and in the same journal in which her theories had been criticised. Without at all presuming to speak for Mr. Hallowell, who is quite able to speak for himself, and who, we know, would be the last to complain of our publishing the paper, we think it best not to wait till he replies to it (in case he wishes to do so), but to express our own opinion in the same number of THE INDEX that contains it. We ought not, however, to omit saying at once that Mr. Hallowell made no declaration or insinuation against Mrs. Woodhull's personal character, but avowedly abstained from doing this; and that he made no pretence of speaking as "one commissioned from on high."

In this respect we shall tread in his footsteps. If anything is repulsive alike to our taste, our inclination, and our moral sentiment, it is the tendency to assail persons when principles only should be under discussion. Against Mrs. Woodhull we have no stones to throw—a vile and mean warfare worthy only of the basest of mankind. More than that, we are strongly inclined (knowing nothing of her personally) to respect her as a woman brave even to heroism in facing an adverse world, and faithful in a rare degree to the duty of uttering convictions honestly held. We doubt not that she obeys her own conscience, and has a right to meet the world's gaze unflinchingly. Shame on the pious dastards who cannot even fight a woman without resorting to foul play, and must eke out the feebleness of their logic by the clamorousness of their abuse!

But we must add that, if Mrs. Woodhull should avail herself of the "liberty" she claims, and should exercise the "rights" she demands, we could not respect her. Our respect is based wholly on the supposition that her womanly instinct is truer than her unwomanly speech—that she is an enthusiast for an idea with which her practice is totally inconsistent. She presents the sad spectacle of one intellectually fascinated by an ideal far below the law she lives by. Her action is higher than her thought—almost as melancholy a defeat of the true end of life as if her thought were higher than her action. The highest respect belongs to those whose thought and action harmonize on the highest plane. It is painful to base respect on the assumption of a "noble inconsistency;" yet it is only through this assumption that Mrs. Woodhull can maintain herself in the esteem of right-minded people. If indeed she practised what she proclaims (which we disbelieve), she could command no higher tribute than that of pity.

It is necessary to say this, because there can be no condemnation of her theory so absolute as to say—"No pure woman or man could live by it." Just so far as it acquires power over conduct, to that extent it must demoralize and dehumanize. Let us briefly see what her theory is, as she herself states it in her present letter.

1. The right of every individual to perfect freedom, the right of every individual to be protected by society in the exercise of perfect freedom—this is the double basis of her theory. From this double principle it follows, as Mrs. Woodhull correctly infers, that no individual should be permitted by society to tyrannize over any other individual, or to "impose himself upon non-consenting parties." The "perfect freedom" of each, therefore, is limited by the prohibition of all infringement upon the equal rights of others. In all this there is nothing new. It is the merest A B C of republicanism.

2. The inference she draws is that any "two persons may do whatever they may agree to do, in their individual spheres." True again, both in logic and in fact, provided the words "in their individual spheres" are properly understood. If, however, two persons agree to do something which interferes with the equal rights of other people, Mrs. Woodhull's own premises require her to admit that society may lawfully prohibit it as a crime against other people, i. e. against society. The mere fact of their mutual consent cannot alone establish the permissibility of an act, unless the consequences of the act terminate in and with themselves. If the consequences of the act, whether direct or indirect, immediate or remote, affect third parties, then Mrs. Woodhull cannot evade the admission that the permissibility of the act by society depends on something more than the mere mutual consent of the two parties themselves. It must be shown that no harm can result to third parties before society's right to interfere can be denied. If, for instance, A and B agree to take a walk together, society has no right to interfere; but if they agree to break into C's house by night to steal his silver, then society has a right to pronounce their act a crime against itself, and to prohibit it accordingly.

3. Now Mrs. Woodhull makes explicitly an application of her own inference which is false in logic and abominable in morality. After saying that her "declarations permit two persons to do whatever they may agree to do, in their individual spheres," she presently adds, as if it were the same proposition in another form—"My theory permits any two persons to contract sexually." This is a complete begging of the whole question—what logicians call a petitio principii. The question in debate is whether the sexual contract concerns only the two persons "in their individual spheres." Society by its marriage laws says emphatically no; and it is for Mrs. Woodhull to prove society wrong, and not thus quietly to take her own views for granted. If she wishes to convince reasonable beings, not to say moral beings, that her theory is good, she must set herself, with all the intellectual power at her command, to prove that the sexual contract concerns only the two parties to it. Society has always held that rights of children, and rights of property, and other rights, are vitally affected by it. Mrs. Woodhull will have all the work she can attend to, if she enters fairly on this discussion. She has proceeded on the assumption that nobody is concerned in the sexual contract but the two parties themselves; and this is the glaring absurdity of her whole theory.

The only argument she offers in support of this position is conveyed in the question—"Suppose society does not know of the act, are its rights invaded?" What a plea! Is a secret murder no crime, because secret? What sort of moral vision can one possess to hint for a moment that the moral quality of actions depends on mere publicity? The sexual contract involves vaster interests than those which depend on the mere preservation of external decorum; and it is the right of society to demand that the interests of children, of property, of public order and civilization, shall not be passed over in silence, as they are, by Mrs. Woodhull and her sympathizers. So long as society believes that such interests as these are at stake, it will not be convinced that the sexual contract lies wholly "in the individual spheres" of the two contracting parties. And Mrs. Woodhull will be wise carefully to note this fact.

4. Furthermore, she expresses a commendable but most illogical objection to the practice of promiscuity. She protests against "debauch." Why should she? That she does so is an amiable weakness, a most illogical yielding to the womanly nature that revolts against the foul corollaries of her theory. To protest against debauch, whether in Greene Street or in Fifth Avenue, implies that she, quite as much as Mr. Hallowell, "sits in judgment" on other people. By her own theory, it is none of our or her business what other people do "in secret." She has no right, by her own principles, to condemn debauch any further than to abstain from it as a mere matter of taste, as she may abstain from onions, or curry, or sour kraut, or anything else she dislikes but never think of protesting against. Her protest embodies the very "condemnation" she condemns. We accept it as the voice of her heart, bearing testimony against her head.

The debauchee, however, will say to her:—"Mrs. Woodhull, you concede to me a perfect right to do what I please in private, if I forbear to insult public decency in public places. You protest against the public opinion which interferes with this right, as a species of tyranny of society over the individual. Yet you protest against all real exercise of a right which you are so forward to claim for me. You join with my oppressors in sustaining the tyrannical public opinion which condemns debauch, and thereby help to inflict a penalty on the debauchee for practising what you declare it to be his right to practise, uninterfered with by society. I demand, therefore, that you suppress your protest and mind your business. I am acting only in what you admit to be my 'individual sphere.' By what right do you intrude with your protest into my inviolable privacy?" In saying this, the debauchee has logic, if not politeness, on his side. If Mrs. Woodhull proposes to follow out her own theory unflinchingly to its legitimate conclusion, she must withdraw that protest, and cancel the feeble warning that even she herself utters against the black ocean of licentiousness sure to follow her own success.

Instead, therefore, of falling into a panic with Mr. Wasson, and admitting that Mrs. Woodhull carries out the logic of "natural liberty" with such terrible fidelity that there is no remedy but to give up the very idea of "natural liberty" itself, we say emphatically that she does not comprehend the logic of natural liberty at all, but falls into flagrant logical absurdities. We have no notion of being frightened out of faith in natural liberty by any such perverse and brittle logic as hers. The remedy is to hold her more strictly to logic, and compel her to prove the principle she now tacitly assumes, namely, that the sexual contract concerns only the two parties to it. She cannot prove this. The sexual contract involves the birth of new beings, who are third parties to the contract most vitally affected by it; and such monsters as Rosenzweig and Madame Van Buskirk, with the nameless crimes against society of which they are guilty, are the logical consequence of her theory. It is because we have absolute faith in the power of truth to conquer error, without favor of wind or sun, that we are willing to publish in THE INDEX the strongest statement that Mrs. Woodhull can make of a social theory we utterly abhor. Adultery, seduction, abortion, prostitution, which this theory treats solely as crimes of individuals against themselves or of society against individuals, are crimes of individuals against society as well; and it is perfectly safe to encourage discussion of these and all other kindred points. For Mrs. Woodhull we have no condemnation, believing her to be sincere in her theory and both logically and practically faithful to it; but her theory, which, if adopted by women in general, would increase ten-fold the army of common prostitutes, is as false to the logic of natural liberty as it is abhorrent to the moral sense of mankind, and deserves nothing but the unsparing and outspoken condemnation of every decent man and woman.

MORE PETITIONS.

The following lists of signatures to the remonstrance against the Christian Amendment of the United States Constitution have been received since our last issue:—

Col. J. O. Martin, Indianapolis, Ind., sends three hundred and thirty-six names (others still to be forwarded); Mr. Lewis Kurtz, Augusta, Kan., sixty-one; Mr. B. B. Scofield, Woodhull, Ill., twenty-two; Mr. Geo. M. Scott, West Liberty, O., forty-nine; Mr. A. C. Smith, Wellington, Kan., forty-five; Mr. S. Townsend, Baltimore, Md., twenty-eight; Mr. Alvin Hoyt, Burr Oak, Mich., twenty-two; Mr. Gilbert Knapp, Margaretta, O., forty; Mr. J. W. Cogswell, Springfield, Mass., forty-one; Mr. W. A. Stewart, Newcastles, Pa., sixty-six; Mr. O. C. Clogston, Montpelier, Vt., ninety-two; Mr. Erwin Byington, Elgin, Ill., one hundred and fifty-three (one hundred and twenty-seven from his own Watch Factory); Mr. J. W. Wright, De Sala, Iowa, thirty-seven; Mr. C. W. Loomis, Leeds, Mass., thirty-four; Mrs. Sarah R. Crawford, —, thirty-eight; Mrs. E. M. Spalding, Duluth, Minn., fifteen; Mr. Max Pracht, Cincinnati, O., thirty-two; Mr. F. M. McDonagh, Council Bluffs, Iowa, one hundred and thirty-one; Mr. Henry Austin, Mt. Airy, Iowa, forty-two; Dr. Wm. Jordan, Port Huron, Mich., forty-five; Mr. J. M. Mays, Covington, Ky., forty; Mr. H. L. Green, Syracuse, N. Y., forty-seven; Mr. B. S. Davenport, Lockport, N. Y., forty-five; Rev. G. F. Whitfield, Eureka, Wis., thirty-three; Mr. Jacob Gelhart, Atwater, O., ninety-four; Mr. J. L. Newell, Port Huron, Mich., ninety-nine; Mr. Orlando Davis, Ithaca, N. Y., one hundred and thirty-eight; Mr. J. C. Lyons, Fond du Lac, Wis., eighty-one; Mr. H. J. Morrison, Centerville, Kan., thirty-two; Mr. W. D. Warren, Wellington, O., forty-two; Mr. G. Maxwell, Mazonia, Mich., forty-nine; Mr. A. H. Baker, Centre, O., twenty-seven; Mrs. Elmira Wilson, —, ten; Mrs. J. G. Kinley, Richmond, Ind., forty; Mr. W. B. Lewis, Mound City, Kan., forty-three; Mr. Geo. Molnar, Franklin, Pa., one hundred and eleven; Mr. David Wright, Des Moines, Iowa, one hundred and twenty-three; Mr. C. D. B. Mills, Syracuse, N. Y., twenty-nine; Rev. J. M. Barnes, Snowville, Va., thirty-three; Mr. T. Magee, St. Paul, Minn., seventy-seven; Mr. C. B. Cartwright, Hutchinson, Col., forty-four.

Please send for INDEX EXTRAS containing the Counter-petition, and interest your neighbors in getting signatures. The work is going bravely on, and we return heartiest thanks to all our friends for their efficient co-operation.

SECTARIAN CONSOLATION.

Rev. Mr. Dall, the missionary of the American Unitarian Association in India, has recently joined the Brahmo Somaj. The fact has proved a most tempting target for Orthodoxy, and Orthodox newspapers generally have seized the occasion, and evidently with great zest, for newly showing up the weakness of Unitarianism. Their assaults are none the less sharp for the touch of humor that mingles with them, as all round the circle of the Evangelical editors the charges are wrung on the fact that the only missionary that the Unitarians have among the heathen, instead of converting the heathen, has been converted by them. The charge is not exactly true; for, though there is little doubt that Mr. Dall's views have become more liberal since he went to India, he distinctly announces that in joining the Brahmo Somaj, which is not pagan polytheism, but a Theistic church, he has renounced neither Unitarianism nor Christianity.

But it is clear, nevertheless, that this action of Mr. Dall has not a little annoyed his Unitarian brethren at home. It exposes the fact, which Unitarian journals are anxious to cover up or to explain away, of the close relationship there is between the vital principles of Unitarianism and natural theism. It shows how easily and logically those principles of rational inquiry, which have always been the boast of Unitarianism, will, if allowed full freedom, pass over the bounds of a religion alleged to rest on specific and supernatural claims to authority, and enter the domain of the religion of natural reason and intuition. It is a practical act that illustrates the logical connection between Unitarianism, Theism, and Free Religion too, as steps in the march of the Protestant principle of free inquiry. Hence the annoyance the act causes to those who do not wish to see these steps, or will not believe that they are there, or, having a suspicion that they are there, try to look very earnestly the other way and to divert also the attention of other people from them. What the Unitarians will do with Mr. Dall remains to be seen. They have not yet had any explanation of his course directly from him. The Executive Committee of the Unitarian Association have just voted to continue his salary to the first of July, expecting by that time to have the matter fully explained.

But in the meantime the Unitarian Christian Register, for the "mistake" and "Indiscretion" of Mr. Dall, and for the consequent thrusts of the Orthodox, has discovered a most ingenious mode of consolation which is worthy of note, though not perhaps, on reflection, to be recommended. In a recent issue it derives great comfort from the belief that, whatever Mr. Dall's error, "he has rendered a great service to the world by unmasking the narrowness and bigotry of these Oriental theists;" and it is still further consoled because, by this "unmasking of Oriental bigotry" to the full sight of the world, a lesson of warning has somehow been given against the Free Religious Association in America, which has in some way, according to the Register, had its bigoted purposes unmasked too, and stands "before the world now as an anti-Christian sect, organized for propagandism of their own peculiar dogmas." But let us give the Register's mode of consolation, which it entitles "A Lesson from India," in full:

"Whatever may be thought of Mr. Dall's discretion in joining the Brahmo Somaj while acting as a missionary of the American Unitarian Association, he has rendered a great service to the public by unmasking the narrowness and bigotry of these Oriental theists: But for the treatment which Mr. Dall has received at their hands, the world might have supposed that they welcome to their ranks all believers in God, without requiring them to renounce their Christianity, their Judaism, or their Mohammedanism. Now, however, it is declared that their theism is anti-Christian, and no Christian is to be admitted unless he lowers Jesus to the level of Confucius and other great and wise teachers.

When the Free Religionists organized in this country, it was proclaimed that men of all denominations would be welcomed to their ranks, without the least repudiation of their cherished convictions, and, at first, they succeeded in obtaining a few representatives of various sects to speak from their platform. But it has since become very evident that the Free Religious Association, like the Brahmo Somaj, withholds full hospitality from all who do not virtually renounce Christianity when uniting with them. Their organ, and most of their officers, have ceased even to profess to be merely theological inquirers. Their court has decided against the claims of Christianity. Their jury has rendered a verdict of guilty in the case of the arraigned system of faith. The Free Religionists stand before the world now as an anti-Christian sect, organized for propagandism of their own peculiar dogmas. It is in vain that they continue to invite Christians to enter their enclosure. Individual Free Religionists may do so in perfect sincerity, and with no purpose of insisting that membership of the Free Religious Association implies withdrawal from the Christian Church. Yet this is the drift of the main body. It is a hostile camp to which no Christian can go without having his flag fired upon by the Free Religious organ and most of its leaders. Then let all men choose between these antagonistic organizations, for 'No man can serve two masters.'

It must be admitted that there is a touch of the heroic in this mode of getting comfort for denominational trial. It borders a little upon the old Hopkinton idea that one should be willing to be damned for the glory of God. In substance the argument is—No matter how much Mr. Dall may have to be condemned; never mind the assaults and ridicule of Unitarianism by the Orthodox for the defection of its one missionary; there is ample compensation of glory for him and for the denomination, in the fact that by his going down he has rendered a worldwide service in exposing the rotten but dangerously enticing pretences to liberality of the Brahmo Somaj and the Free Religious Association. We may imagine the Register pleading before its Orthodox judges:—"We confess all our sins, sentence us as you will, but before we go away to our punishment give us credit for having in our fall knocked off the masks from these whitened sepulchres."

But it is to be feared that the Register's method of consolation, though it may be respected for the heroic element in it, is, after all, not sound either as to facts or logic. We do not exactly see where the "unmasking" comes in. As to the Brahmo Somaj, it appears to be true that some of its members have not given to Mr. Dall so cordial and fraternal a welcome as they might have done. But in explanation of their coldness towards him there is one fact that ought to be remembered. Mr. Dall joined their organization with the purpose, hardly concealed, of proselytizing them to his own religious views,—of using his missionary position, machinery, influence to this end. We do not mean to say there was anything insincere, underhanded, or even shrewd in his course. On the contrary he seems to have been singularly frank, and of childlike simplicity, in what he has done. A year ago or more, as the writer of this article distinctly remembers, though the Register is oblivious of the fact, Mr. Dall, in a letter to Mr. Lowe, then Secretary of the Unitarian Association, told him that he was thinking of this step and gave his motive for it,—which was that he might thereby increase his influence with the members of the Brahmo Somaj, and be able, perhaps, to bring many of them to accept a liberal Unitarian view of Christianity. He said also that he was convinced that the best field in India for a Unitarian missionary was presented in the Brahmo Somaj. His correspondence with the Indian Mirror since he joined the organization discloses plainly the same motive.

Mr. Dall is, as he would probably call himself, a Christian theist. He believes in the prophets of all the religions. Nor does he accept the teachings of Jesus unless they are confirmed by the spirit within. Yet he believes that Jesus is so immeasurably ahead of every other religious teacher that he is in some sense the ideal representative and leader of the human race, and that the religion he taught, or pure Christianity, is the absolute religion, or true theism. He thinks that the theism of the Brahmo Somaj, which he can conscientiously accept as far as it goes, is on a lower plane than this Christian theism, but is a natural preparation for it; and that by becoming a member of the Brahmo Somaj he can help his fellow-members along and up to the higher platform of his views. But coming with this thought and purpose, it certainly is not strange if the Brahmos should regard his movement with some suspicion and coldness. However pure his intentions may be, he is not really with them with his whole heart and spirit; he does not put himself on an equality with them; he comes as a proselytizer. Nor can they be justly accused of bigotry, if they have looked behind his act to the motives which he has had the candor not to hide, and have reminded him, as self-respect would demand of them, that on their platform they cannot admit the superior claims of his position. From their point of view his position is a sectarian one. For it is to be remembered also, that the Brahmo Somaj claim that their theism is already higher and broader than Mr. Dall's; that Christian theism or Mohammedan theism or Hebrew theism is preparatory to the Universal theism, in which all relics of the disinctive authority of the specific religions are outgrown and left behind. If this is to be "anti-Christian," then the Brahmo Somaj is so, and has always been so. It has certainly never been willing to call itself "Christian." It is anti-Christian to just the extent that Christianity is anti-Brahmo Somaj,—that is, to just the extent that Christianity is regarded as having a claim to divine authority not possessed by other religions. If the Brahmo Somaj did not say this, they would stultify their whole history and position. At the same time there are many persons connected more or less with the Brahmo Somaj who have not yet taken this distinct ground of Universal Theism,—many who act with the organization who are not members. The line of membership is not drawn with strictness. Liberal people of other faiths, Mohammedan, Jewish, Christian, attracted by their rational views and free fellowship, attend their meetings and find themselves at home. And it is not to be supposed that any change has occurred in this respect,—notwithstanding that the Christian Register thinks that their treatment of Mr. Dall has opened the eyes of the whole world to their "narrowness and bigotry."

Still more defective are the Register's facts and logic with regard to the Free Religious Association. In the first place, it overlooks the important fact, which has more than once been pointed out, that the Free Religious Association and the Brahmo Somaj are not parallel organizations. The Brahmo movement, as an advance out of the native Hindu religion under the influences of reason and free thought to the broad and high platform it occupies, and as an effort at social reform, has had a great interest for the Free Religious Association; and there has been fraternal and edifying correspondence between the two. But the Brahmo Somaj is a church. It builds meeting-houses. It seeks to maintain public worship. It has all the machinery of a religious denomination. And, greatest difference of all, it has a creed; a creed of but one article—"faith in Theism"—but still a creed; and though the fact of membership, or of signing this article, is not very much regarded among them, yet this Theistic faith does make the central bond of their organization, and is their distinguishing doctrine which they aim to propagate. But the Free Religious Association is not a church or a sect; nor does it represent any church or sect. The Register continually calls its supporters a sect and wants to make them so; but they will not follow its bidding. The Association has been urged to help local societies, but it will not. It will not send out preachers nor build meeting-houses nor institute any sectarian machinery. And it has no creed, not even of one article. It does not call itself "Theistic," nor "Christian," nor "Mohammedan," nor by the name of any other specific form of faith. It is simply the representative of free thought applied to religion. It urges this principle, in its various aspects, by conventions and publications, and then leaves it to work in the sects and churches and society by the various methods through which a principle of so broad application must needs operate. With such a great difference between the Free Religious Association and the Brahmo Somaj, it would be difficult to see, even if the Brahmo Somaj had been showing itself very naughtily sectarian and narrow, how from its conduct any lesson of warning can be logically drawn against the Free Religious Association.

But the Register asserts that the Association has actually fallen into this pit-hole of bigotry; that it began with a fair show of liberality but has degenerated into a society of Anti-Christian dogmatists, "withholding full hospitality from all who do not virtually renounce Christianity." The Register has a way, in controversy with its Orthodox antagonists, of asking them to make good some of their charges against the loose views of Unitarian preachers by specifying names, time, and place. So we might ask it to apply its own method to this part of its argument. Of the present officers of the Association, will it name those who have announced themselves as "anti-Christian," or even those who have actually or "virtually renounced Christianity?" "Their organ," it says, "and most of their officers have ceased even to profess to be merely theological inquirers." Will it name those who ever professed to be merely inquirers,—to have discovered nothing worthy of belief? Or those who are not as much inquirers to-day as they were when the Association was formed? By the "organ" of the Association it doubtless means THE INDEX, for it has repeatedly made that misstatement. (If the Register does not know, it ought to know that THE INDEX is not the organ of the Free Religious Association any more than the Register is the organ of the Unitarian Association or of the National Conference). But this aside, how can it charge THE INDEX with ceasing to be an "inquirer," at the same time that it is satirizing its editor for waiting for a belief in God and immortality until science shall bring the proof? Finally, will the Register name the "peculiar dogmas" which the Free Religious Association is engaged in propagating? It would be very interesting to the members, without doubt, to have these "dogmas" drawn out seriatim into articles.

As to the statement that "their court has decided against the claims of Christianity," it should be said that the Association, as such, never accepted "the claims of Christianity" more than those of any other religion, and has never passed upon the question. It does say by its fundamental principle, as it has always said, that "the claims of Christianity," as of every other religion, must be determined by rational investigation and thought. But as an Association it does not give a decision. That would be to establish a creed. It says to individuals, "Take all the evidence, use your own reason, and decide each for himself according to the best of your study and ability; and, on this mutual regard for each other's free thought and belief, let us found our fellowship,—striving together after higher truth and life." If this attitude be "anti-Christian" or anti any other religion, then is the Association antagonistic to such faiths and has always been. Persons who are not willing to submit the claims of their religion to reason will very naturally feel that the Association is anti to them,—that it "fires on their flag" and shows other forms of inhospitality. But persons of whatever faith who believe that their faith can substantiate itself in the court of free reason and who have no fear of the result, will feel themselves at home on the platform of the Free Religious Association. Of such its membership consists. Of such its real constituency consists, whether they come to its platform and into active membership or not. It has representatives and workers in all the sects and faiths,—though all of them do not know for what they are working. But all who are working for free thought in religion and for a more fraternal fellowship are working for the Free Religious Association. The Register itself is sometimes its "organ."

W. J. P.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

A LETTER FROM MRS. WOODHULL.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The Principles of Social Freedom is the most dangerous of subjects upon which a superficial mind can enter for discussion. Nevertheless, many such do enter and succeed in demonstrating their capacities, or rather lack of capacities, while they appear to think they have demolished their antagonists. Such a writer appears in THE INDEX of Feb. 3.

I make the plain and broad assertion that that writer has not yet delved deep enough to reach foundation. He has descended only half-way, where he sees one side of the matter which is involved. I also make bold to observe in advance, that even his failure to comprehend what he thinks I do not comprehend will become clear to him, if he will go with me as I review the already very "deliberate and thoughtful survey of her subject" which I have made.

At the outset I desire to say, it is always unsatisfactory to reply to a newspaper article in a subsequent number of the paper, since each paragraph ought to be compared with the attention it receives, standing together. But I will reply as concisely as possible, and first to paragraph one.

To assume that our sisters in Greene street are "fallen women" is to prejudice the whole case, even before it is entered for trial. I claim no right to sit in such judgment. R. P. H. may be commissioned from on high to do so. But I have learned that "with whatsoever judgment ye judge it shall be measured to you again." If R. P. H. really has the competent authority to step into Greene street and say to those he finds there—"Get ye out of this place and go where and do just as I permit you" (of course he will supply their wants), why, he is just the person the world has been looking for, for these many years. I suggest that he come to New York from his home in Massachusetts, or, if more convenient, go to North street in Boston, and begin to practice his commissioned authority.

I remember, however, a certain conversation, recorded in a highly respected book, which may not be altogether inapplicable in this case:—"And he said to the woman, Where are thine accusers?" Also, "Neither do I condemn thee." I prefer to teach as much as I may, rather than to attempt to command and condemn. R. P. H. is more fortunate than I, since he speaks "as one having authority."

To paragraph two I reply: Most certainly I do protest against the continuation of all sorts of debauch, and believe that society, rather than its victims, is the more reprehensible. Against debauch in Greene and North streets, I am as earnest as against the same in Fifth Avenue and Beacon street; but not more so.

I protest against ignorance in social and moral conditions in the same way that I protest against intellectual and physiological ignorance. And more, I believe all of them are to be remedied in the same manner, by education and growth. When we shall be able to legislate intellect into people without other adjunctive means, then shall I think it possible to also legislate morality into them.

And right here I impeach society for its utter neglect of the true manner in which to do away with what it chooses to denominate prostitution. A legal standard of morals and religion will never effect the desired ends. Now I ask R. P. H. if the proper way to abolish prostitution is not to remove its cause, rather than to legislate regarding its effects? If he answer this, he may then proceed with a little more clearness of conception about "duties and rights," and about mental in contradistinction to moral deficiency.

While, as to personal character, I know nothing of R. P. H., I am quite certain he is no better informed in regard to me. I therefore suggest the propriety of leaving that out of the controversy, both as to statement and insinuation. There is sufficient to discuss of which we have knowledge, without lugging in subjects of which knowledge is improbable. I re-affirm, then, that the people—the women if R. P. H. please—who inhabit Greene street, have as good right to remain there if they so choose, as he has to remain where he chooses; or I where I choose. Will R. P. H. dispute that? Let him show counter-authority. It is an easy matter to deny a given proposition; but it is quite a different thing to substitute another to take the place of the one denied. R. P. H. may not have acquired that experience. That is his misfortune; not my fault.

To paragraph three I reply that it is also easy to make assertions; sometimes not so, to maintain them. I call upon R. P. H. to make good what he asserts in this paragraph, or acknowledge that he has proceeded beyond his depth. Against his inconsequent assumption I oppose the plain fact that in knowledge alone is there safety, while in ignorance there is always danger. Where and from whom does R. P. H. quote "deceived enthusiast"? I am an enthusiast; but it remains to be proved that I am deceived. I forgot, however, that I am dealing with a person commissioned by a higher power than I claim as my inspiration. He may be able to prove me deceived. Perhaps, however, he had better wait until it is done before assuming that I am.

To paragraph four I reply: R. P. H. was never more mistaken than when he affirmed that I base my theory of society upon my faith in individual liberty as he understands it. I base my theory of society upon the right of the individual to perfect freedom; but that is only one-half the base. With that only, the theory would fall of itself with no assistance from R. P. H. As I said before, it is because he perceives only this half that he falls, like the drunken person, thinking it is the ground that has left its place instead of himself his uprightness. If every individual is guaranteed perfect freedom to exercise all his powers and capacities, every individual is also thereby absolutely restrained from becoming a despot, from imposing himself upon anybody else, unless he first find a consenting party. Then it is no imposition, but a perfect exercise of the liberty of two consenting persons. Can R. P. H. see the other half of the basis now? But lest he may not, I will exhibit his previous failure to comprehend it.

The example which he supposes demolishes my theory is one of the best possible illustrations of its truth and beauty. If the woman should proceed as he states the case, does he not now perceive that she would not be following her individual freedom, but imposing herself upon non-consenting parties?—which is individual despotism. So it turns out that his attempt to burlesque my declaration of individual rights becomes the weapon of his own discomfiture; since his illustration proves, rather than disproves, my theory.

My declarations permit two persons to do whatever they may agree to do, in their individual spheres. They do not permit one party, first, to compel another to accompany her, and afterward to submit to her demands against his will. My theory permits any two persons to contract sexually; but it does not permit them to make exhibition of themselves to unwilling spectators, nor to insult public decency in places that belong in common to all.

I therefore still repeat—"I demand a free and unrestricted exercise of my right, and it is your duty not only to accord it, but, as a community, to see that I am protected in it." But I neither ask nor expect the community to protect me in imposing myself upon its members, against whom my right to command does not exist. Does R. P. H. yet understand that my theory consists not only of individual freedom, but also of protection for all individuals in it? If he do, he is about ready to begin to wish he could withdraw the remaining portion of his diatribe.

To paragraph five I reply by quoting R. P. H.'s own language, personality only changed—"Such declamation is no more wild and no less offensive"—than it is fair to suppose the mind is from which it emanated. "It serves to illustrate the complete lack of development and application of the principle of individual protection from the impositions of others," on the part of R. P. H. The "disgusting brutality" of R. P. H.'s conjurings "ought to be a sufficient refutation" of their application to the case in question "in the minds of consistent and logical men and women."

To paragraph six I reply—"His (her) error consists in his inability to conceive the close and intimate relation every member of the community bears to society." (This plainly shown above—indeed so plainly that R. P. H., even, will scarcely require to have it pointed out.) But he stumbles upon an idea in the latter part of this paragraph which discovers to him that a flagrant act of immorality is an invasion of the rights of society. But suppose society does not know of the act, are its rights invaded? Suppose R. P. H. goes to his room and imbibes "hot whiskies" until his vision is confused, whose rights are invaded? Suppose he feasts daily until gout is contracted, does he commit a grossly immoral act against himself or against society? You see, R. P. H., that all your verbiage presupposes you have the right to assume what is, and what is not moral; and what is, and what is not, indecent.

Now I say that it would be less indecent for a man to visit a "very respectable" Greene street institution than it would be for him to contract gout. In the former he would only be in danger of entailing disease upon society, while in the latter it would be impossible to escape doing so. Before jumping to conclusions, which may sink under us, it is safer to carefully examine their foundations before essaying to make practical use of them.

Let R. P. H. and those whom he represents contend for legal enactments touching the indulgence of the appetite for drink and food, the same as for the sexual appetite, and thereby show a little all-sided consistency. If the latter should, so also should the former, be controlled by law. Is that not clear, R. P. H.?

Paragraph seven I pass, and reply to eight: R. P. H. seeing the muddle into which he had thoughtlessly plunged, sets about endeavoring to extricate himself by asking me questions to explain his own arguments, previously made use of, and which he labored so arduously to establish. I have never assumed that the "social evil" "is, like murder, a crime against society." On the contrary I have always contended that it is a crime of society against the individual, and of individuals against themselves. Are you answered, R. P. H.? To persons who are so low in the scale of sexual evolution as to desire promiscuity, it is the natural expression of their natures to practise it. Therefore I repeat, "promiscuity is the anarchical stage of sexual"—I do not say the anarchical stage of society's—"development." (I deem it necessary to call R. P. H.'s attention to the distinction lest he will fall to discover it.)

Will R. P. H. contend, when the passions rule supreme, that it is a high, pure and true condition? I hold that to reach from promiscuity to spirituality is an immense stretch, impossible of any single person. But from persons in that condition there are all the various grades of development represented by various others, up to the highest, purest and truest, each and every one of which is perfectly legitimate and natural to itself, and entitled to its own law of existence, expression and control. But when R. P. H. declared that I encourage "houses of ill fame," he did me the very grossest injustice, since I no more do so than I encourage ignorance, by saying it cannot be legislated into knowledge. Indeed he has quoted my language diametrically opposed to such an assertion.

To paragraph nine I reply: "Should we pursue our examination of her" (his) "grounds of faith further, it would be easy to demonstrate an equal inconsistency, an obliquity in her" (his) "treatment of other phases of the social" (this) "question. I have chosen from her" (his) "many errors the one in which she" (he) "appears to find especial satisfaction," and about which he seems to be as deeply earnest as he appears to me to be ineffectually attempting to wade in water whose depth is too great for him to fathom.

To reply to paragraph ten, I continue to quote: "In this age of platform, newspaper and pamphlet, it would be surprising if some truth were not written." Nevertheless it is amazing that one "who has the reputation of being clear headed and who on occasion can utter sentiments creditable to the warmest heart and clearest intellect can" put out to the thousands of his fellow-men, "without shame or reserve," a pretence to analysis of the principles of social freedom, as this of R. P. H. is found to be.

"Let her" (him) "take a more deliberate and thoughtful survey of her" (his) "subject, and she" (he) "may yet discover that" individual despotism "independent of social relations is not possible;" and still further, that social or individual despotism and social freedom are incompatible. Individual liberty is impossible unless there is individual security behind it, guaranteed by society; and to grant that security, governments are instituted. "Rights imply duties; the rights of society are as inalienable as the rights of the individual, and its duties are equally imperative."

Society is made up of individuals, not individuals of society; hence individuals are first, and also their rights first. Secure the rights of every individual, and the common rights of society are thereby inevitably guaranteed, and their mutual duties become reciprocal and complete.

"In conclusion let me repeat that with" R. P. H.'s "personal character I have nothing to do. So far as I am able I will separate" the heaven appointed judge from his illogical review, "and think kindly of him." "As a professed" analyzer of the Principles of Social Freedom upon which so much of human weal or woe depends he "is a proper" subject for "the most searching exposition of inconsequent and shallow reasoning," as well as "for severe reprobation and censure by all lovers of true liberty and exalted morality," which underlies all true, and should override all false, laws.

VICTORIA C. WOODHULL.

44 BROAD STREET, NEW YORK, }
February 15, 1872. }

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, on REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. R. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the wickedness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. R. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. R. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single Copies, Five Cents; Twelve Copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio.

SOW THE SEED!

THE "IMPEACHMENT OF CHRISTIANITY," published in the first number of the third volume of THE INDEX, has been electrotyped, and an edition of Ten Thousand Copies has been printed in the form of

A Cheap Tract for Gratuitous Distribution!

It is intended to circulate One Hundred Thousand Copies during the current year. In order to accomplish this purpose, we must rely upon the co-operation of our active sympathizers.

☞ Packages of these TRACTS, containing any desired number of copies, will be mailed to any address on receipt of enough money to defray postage, and whatever additional sums, large or small, the generosity of distributors may prompt them to add.

Of course, money will be needed to carry out our intentions; but we urge every one who believes that THIS TRACT WILL DO GOOD, and who is willing to distribute copies of it, to send in an order at once, even if unable to donate more than the simple postage and the time required for distribution. Do not hesitate because you cannot give more. We are convinced more than ever by the character and objects of the late Cincinnati Convention, that such plain speech as this TRACT contains is greatly needed at the present time. In the name of Christianity,

A most Dangerous Attempt is now Making to Subvert the Religious Liberties

of the American People; and the mighty magic of that name is still powerful over multitudes even of otherwise liberal minds. Let the world learn that the protest made against Christianity is not made by hatred of Goodness and of Truth, but rather by a love for these that can no longer be satisfied with shams. He woefully misjudges this Tract who thinks it has no higher aim than to "make a sensation." It was meant to tell needed truth so plainly that it must be heard. And it will be heard. All we ask is—give it a chance.

☞ Address your orders to THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

St. Louis, Quincy, Hannibal, Keokuk, Toledo, Wabash & Western R. R.

PULLMAN PALACE SLEEPING CARS!

THE Toledo, Wabash & Western Railway Co., having recently extended its line of Railway to the City of Toledo, will commence running all its regular passenger trains through to that city on and after the 14th day of May, 1871. The day trains will be equipped with new and elegant passenger coaches, and all night trains with the much celebrated and popular Pullman Palace Sleeping Coaches.

	Special Thru' Express.	Pacific Express.
Leave Toledo.....	11:10 A. M.	11:15 P. M.
Ar. Ft. Wayne.....	8:00 P. M.	8:30 A. M.
" Lafayette.....	7:40 "	8:20 "
" Danville.....	10:05 "	11:20 "
" Springfield.....	8:35 A. M.	4:10 P. M.
" Quincy.....	8:45 "	9:25 "
" Keokuk.....	9:20 "	10:45 "
" St. Louis.....	7:00 "	7:15 "

Trains arrive from the West at 2:15 A. M., 8:40 P. M., and 5:00 P. M.

GEO. H. BURROWS,
Gen'l Superintendent.

JOHN U. PARSONS,
Gen'l Ticket Agent. (901f)

Lake Shore & Mich. Southern R. R.

1872.

ON and after Sunday, Jan. 14th, 1872, Passenger Trains will leave Toledo daily (Sundays excepted) as follows (Cleveland time):

CLEVELAND & TOLEDO DIVISION.

LEAVE TOLEDO.

8:00 A. M. Atlantic Express East, daily, arrives at Cleveland at 7:35 A. M.
6:30 A. M. Day Express will stop at Elmore, Fremont, Clyde, Bellevue, Monroeville, Norwalk, Townsend, Wakeman, Oberlin, Elyria and Berea, arrives at Cleveland at 10:30 A. M.
10:35 A. M. Cincinnati Express, stopping at all stations, reaches Cleveland at 3:45 P. M.
6:30 P. M. Special N. Y. Express, will stop at Fremont, Clyde, Monroeville, Norwalk and Elyria, arrives at Cleveland 10:15 P. M. Sleeping cars to Buffalo and Rochester.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

10:40 and 10:55 A. M., and 7:40 and 11:00 P. M.

MICHIGAN SOUTHERN DIVISION.

TRAINS DEPART.

MAIN LINE—8:15 A. M., Mail; 11:15 A. M. Special Chicago Express; 5:45 P. M., Coldwater Accommodation; 8:00 P. M., Night Express.
AIR LINE 11:05 A. M., Accommodation; 11:30 P. M. Pacific Express.
DETROIT—8:00, 11:30 A. M., 5:30 and 8:00 P. M.
JACKSON—11:10 A. M. and 9:00 P. M.
KALAMAZOO AND GRAND RAPIDS—11:15 A. M., and 8:00 P. M.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

MAIN LINE—6:30 and 10:35 A. M., and 5:40 & 6:30 P. M.
AIR LINE—2:50 A. M., and 5:55 P. M.
DETROIT—10:40 and 12:01 A. M., and 6:05 and 9:00 P. M.
JACKSON—10:35 A. M. and 8:00 P. M.
COLDWATER ACCOMMODATION—10:25 A. M.

CHAS. F. HATCH, Gen'l Supt.

Cleveland, Ohio.
8. H. WARING, Ticket Agent, Toledo, O. (901f)

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

First Series, No. 1 to 20.

Second Series, Just Published—

11. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
12. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
13. Who Wrote It? a proper and needful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
14. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
15. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
16. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
17. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
18. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
19. Justice and Love to Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
20. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
21. "Even as Others": showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicals" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
22. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows. Unbelievers will find God ever ready to welcome the repenting and returning sinner!
23. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children: did God ever lose, can he lose, His children?
24. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
25. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
26. The Boston Revival and its Leader: a method of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
27. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

EITHER SERIES 30 CENTS; BOTH 50 CENTS.
Address
[901f.] CHAS. E. WHIPPLE
19 Pinckney St., Boston.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 22 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. S. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCUR D. CONWAY, of London, England.
Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription. Send $3.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE!

BOOK BUYERS who wish the LIVE BOOKS OF THE DAY can have their orders filled promptly by mail, post-paid by sending the Publisher a price to

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Bookseller and Publisher

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE WORKS of Darwin, Huxley, Spencer, Tyndall, Proctor, Froude, Emerson, Max Mueller, Locky, M. D. Conway, John Weiss, James Freeman Clarke, Robert Collyer, Robt. Dale Owen, and all of the POPULAR BOOKS OF THE DAY constantly on hand.

☞ PRICE LISTS AND CATALOGUES sent upon application. Correspondence and inquiries solicited.

ANY BOOK PUBLISHED IN THE UNITED STATES

Sent post-paid on receipt of Price. Address

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Bookseller, Toledo, O.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. E. MOKER, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $3.00 each.

☞ All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

110—161ccw.

Box 2395, St. Louis, Mo.

☞ The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent post-paid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word;" "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. R. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. BRADFORD; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. R. ABBOT. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter.

JUNIUS UNMASKED, or, THOMAS PAINE the author of the "Letters of Junius" and the "Declaration of Independence." A DEMONSTRATION. Royal 16mo. pp. 32. Price, $1.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address JOHN GRAY & CO.,
115-2m* P. O. Box 629, Washington, D. C.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, MARCH 16, 1872.

WHOLE No. 116.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARBOT, Editor.
OTAVIUS BROOKS, FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VERA BLAIR, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. R. D. CROSBY, REV. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATHORN, Business Agent.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.
Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio."]

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1872.

THE CHARACTER OF BUDDHA.

BY THOMAS W. HIGGINSON.

[Ninth Lecture in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, March 2, 1872.]

It has often been questioned which type of character is the more noble in a reformer,—to step up or to step down; to overcome the drawbacks of a humble earthly position, or to set aside the temptations of a higher one; for a carpenter's son to enthroned himself in influence, above kings; or for a king's son to renounce his throne, adopt the garb and the life of a beggar, and thus at last overthrow all caste and make that despised yellow robe the highest of religious symbols to his followers. Types of the two positions are to be found among every band of religious reformers. It is remarkable that the two types should be represented in the two founders of the two great religions of the world. Each comprises from a third to a fourth of the human race. Each religion broke the bondage of an earlier and narrower creed; each developed missionary zeal; each had its martyrs; each taught love and forgiveness; each taught the equality of all ranks and conditions before the Eternal Law. The founder of the one came forth from a carpenter's shop in a despised city; the founder of the other stepped down from a throne and spent life as a beggar.

In the province of Hindustan now called Bahar and formerly Magadha—the province of which the commercial city of Patna is the capital—there remains a series of monuments bearing the edicts cut in stone by king Asoka, whose rule is known by facts beyond question to have begun about 225 years before our era. These are "the oldest Buddhist records that cannot have been corrupted." We know therefore with almost unerring precision what thoughts seemed most important to the first great Buddhist king—the Constantine of Buddhism. "Their teaching is marvelously simple. In one, the king enjoins his subjects 'not to slay animals'; in another 'to plant trees and dig wells by the roadsides for the comfort of men and animals'; in another he desires 'the appointment of teachers to superintend morals and encourage the charitable and those addicted to virtue'; in another he orders his subjects 'to hold quinquennial assemblies for the enforcement of moral obligations—duty to parents, friends, children, relations, Brahmins and Sramanas' (Buddhist monks). 'Liberality is good; non-injury of living creatures is good; abstinence from prodigality and slander is good.' In others he proclaims—"The beloved of the gods . . . does not esteem glory and fame as of great value; for it may be acquired by crafty and unworthy persons." "To me there is no satisfaction in the pursuit of worldly affairs; the most worthy pursuit is the prosperity of the whole world. My whole endeavor is to be blameless towards all creatures, to make them happy here below and to enable them to enter Swarga (heaven)."

The theme of my discourse to-day is the founder of that religion whose simple confessions of faith are recorded unaltered upon these stones. There are multitudes of books that record his life and doctrines; some of the Buddhist lamsaeries or religious houses have seventy thousand volumes; the Chinese canon includes 5586 volumes, the Siamese 3683; and the catalogue even of modern European books relating to Buddhism includes nearly a thousand titles. But these books are not permanent, like stone, and their myths and legends are so interwoven with the original truth, whatever that was, as to make it hard to decipher. All we can do—especially when we study them at second-hand—is to try to separate the simple foundation from the tangled narratives.

For this we have of course to adopt the two elementary rules applied to all religious traditions,—to compare different accounts and assume that truth is most likely to be found at the points of coincidence; and, farther, to assume that what is highest and noblest is least likely to have been invented and most likely to be genuine.

The English Buddhist literature multiplies so fast that the three latest translations seem really to throw more light on the actual teachings of Buddha than did all their predecessors. These three are Max Müller's translation of the Dhammapadam or "Path of Virtue," just reprinted in New York; Alabaster's "Wheel of the Law" (London, 1871); and Beal's "Catalogue of Buddhist Scriptures from the Chinese" (London, 1871.) Bishop Bigandet's "Life of Buddha from Burmese Sources," a book on which I shall largely draw—was printed at Rangoon in 1866. Neither of these four books is among those named as consulted by Dr. Clarke in his "Ten Great Religions."

It would seem that before the reign of king Asoka we can be sure of no Buddhist date; but we are getting closer to the actual facts. The year of Buddha's death has been heretofore fixed by approximation at 543 B. C., but there is now a disposition to place it about 477 B. C. If we accept the ordinary estimate that he lived 80 years, this would fix his birth about 557 B. C. The real name of this teacher was Gautama or Sakya-Muni, as you please to select between two family names; he was also called Siddhartha, "he by whom the end is accomplished;" and finally he was called the Buddha, or Enlightened, as Jesus is called the Christ.

The young prince, mythically represented as born without a human father, was in reality the son of a king, Thoodandana and of his queen Maia. Up to the age of sixteen, he was reared amid the luxuries of his father's palace; at that age, he was consecrated as Prince Royal, by the pouring of water on his head; and he was also married—as some say to a damsel named Gopa, which means cowardice, but by other accounts to the princess Yathandara, his first cousin. In the midst of this luxurious life, he was reproached by his relatives for too much self-indulgence—when he confounded them all by asking to be examined in the sciences, as then studied, and by passing his examination. His father's confidence was then wholly renewed, and great pains were taken to surround him with enjoyment, and to keep all painful sights from him.

But one day, when he was being driven by his coachman to some beautiful gardens, for a day's pleasure, he saw by the wayside, for the first time in his life, an aged man. "What is that?" he asked his coachman. "Prince," said the servant, "that is an old man. Every born being is destined to become like him; his appearance must undergo the greatest changes, the skin by the action of time will shrivel, the hair turn grey, the veins and arteries, losing their suppleness and elasticity, will become stiff and hardened, the flesh will gradually sink, leaving the bare bones covered with dry skin." "What!" said to himself the terrified prince, "birth is indeed a great evil, ushering all beings into a wretched condition, which must inevitably be attended with the disgusting infirmities of old age." He ordered the coachman to drive back to the palace, and when the father asked what had happened, he was told by the courtiers that the prince had seen an old man.

On another day he saw a sick man, sinking under some loathsome disease—and he again returned home thoughtful. His father multiplied the pleasures around him and doubled his guards.

On a third day, he saw a corpse and again returned. The King, more anxious than ever, set an immense guard round the house, with orders to exclude every repulsive object. They did not, however, keep out a monk or ascetic, whom the young prince saw walking in the grounds. "Who is that?" he asked—and was told that it was a man who had devoted himself to religion. From that moment the prince resolved that he would do the same. But first he resolved to dress himself in royal robes, be driven through the city, and consider for the last time the life he was to leave. He spent the day, therefore, in his garden in rural diversion, and dressed himself gorgeously for his pageant. His multitude of musicians and dancers gathered round to attend him and he entered his carriage. As he seated himself, a message came from the palace, that the young princess, his wife, had borne him a son. "That," said the prince, "is a new tie for me to break," but he rode on to the city, where all the people came out to meet him. A princess looked from the window and said—"Happy is the wife who has such a husband." The prince heard and said to himself—"By what means can a heart find peace! Only by self-control." He resolved that very night to withdraw from his palace and begin the life of a recluse.

That night his father, watching him anxiously and wishing in true Oriental way to tie him to the joys of life, sent to his apartments a crowd of beautiful singers and dancers to divert him. He watched them wearily, and then, exhausted by his vigils, fell asleep. The girls, discouraged, soon ceased their efforts, and, reclining about the gorgeous rooms, fell also asleep. At midnight the young prince waked and looked about him, observing the various attitudes of the slumbering beauties. Some were snoring, some lay with their mouths stupidly open, others tossed from side to side, or lay in postures without grace. "Now this represents," he said, "what men call joy! The world is despicable and I will leave it this very night, this very hour."

He bade a servant saddle his horse in silence, and while this was done, he went to the door of his wife's apartments. The young mother lay asleep, her arm over the head of her child. The prince paused on the threshold. "In order to see my child," he thought, "I must remove the mother's arm—both will awaken, and my resolution will vanish." He shut the door and left the palace, never to enter it again as its owner. As he left the city, he expressed a longing to look back upon it once more, and went forward into the open country.

He sent back his horse, his servant and his garments, and put on the dress of a recluse. He took the leathern girdle, the hatchet, the needle and the filer which marked the mendicant priest. The hatchet was to cut his wood, the needle to mend his garments, and the filer to purify the water he drank, lest he should destroy animal life. To beg food, he walked to a distant city ruled by a king, his father's ally. The king, divining who he was, offered him every attention, but he only walked in the street, accepting the coarse rice on which beggars lived. Bearing this out of the city, he tried to make his first meal. Accustomed to delicate food, he found this coarse aliment almost loathsome, and was disgusted by the very sight of it. "But was I not aware," he said, "when I adopted the dress of a mendicant, that such would be my food? The moment is come to trample upon nature's appetite." And he took his meal.

He was not yet, however, free from the yoke of that great Brahminical church in which he had been reared. He went to a great Brahmin teacher, learned what he taught, and went away disappointed. He tried another, with the same result. With five of his fellow-students, he tried a life of asceticism, with severe penances. After six years, he renounced this life so utterly that his fellow-students lost faith in him, as an apostle. It was the turning-point of his life; and at this time the great central principles which Buddhists call the "Four Great Truths," or "The Wheel of the Law," was revealed to him. The first great truth is the existence of pain. The second is the source of pain—unregulated desires. The third is the destruction of pain or the control of these desires. The fourth is the means to destroy pain—or, in short, virtue. The law or teaching of Buddha is said to revolve incessantly in this endless wheel—always presenting successively these four points to the contemplation of the faithful.

The experience through which Buddha came to the knowledge of these four truths is symbolized in the Buddhist books under the form of a great contest between him and the evil spirits, who attacked him by myriads as he sat meditating in the forest, cross-legged, beneath a banyan tree. He perceived them coming, but, reflecting that his life had been hitherto blameless and that he had always practised works of kindness and charity, he did not fear when the army of demons "came thick upon him from the North like a mighty storm." "Against me alone," he is represented as saying, "such a countless cloud of warriors has been assembled! I have no one to help me, no father, no brothers, no sisters, no friends, and no relations. But I have with me the virtues I have practised—these will be my safeguard."

Then follows a description of the contest. The storm shook the mountains, but not Buddha—the rain saturated the earth, but not him—there came a shower of rocks accompanied with smoke and fire; but they were changed into immense masses of flowers which dropped at Buddha's feet. The sovereign demon approached and demanded the throne of spiritual power from Buddha. But he calmly answered—"You have not practised the virtues, nor gone through the acts of self-denial; you have never devoted your life to help others. This throne, therefore, cannot be yours." Unable to control his passion, the demon "threw his formidable weapons at the young man, but they were all converted into garlands of beautiful flowers that adapted themselves gracefully around his body." The contest soon ended; that night the four great truths were revealed, and "the perfect science broke over him; he became the Buddha." Then "all the trees of ten thousand worlds shot out branches laden with fruits and flowers. The fine sorts of lilies bloomed spontaneously. The whole universe appeared like an immense garden, covered with flowers; a vivid light illuminated these, the darkness of which could not be dispersed by the united rays of seven suns. Rivers suspended their course; the blind recovered their sight; the deaf could hear and the lame could walk freely. It was then that the heart of Buddha "acquired an unshakable firmness, a perfect purity or exemption from all passions, an unalterable meekness, and a strong feeling of tender compassion towards all beings."

But, having learned the law of truth, would this "tender compassion" lead him to devote his life to preaching it? It would seem from the legend that he had a moment of struggle. "This law," he said to himself, "is hard to be understood. If I ever preach that law, beings will not be able to understand me, and from my preaching there will result but a useless fatigue." But "glancing over the whole world," as the legend says, and seeing its great needs, he was recalled to his duty, and made to the chief of Brahmins the solemn promise that he would preach his law to all beings.

He therefore began to preach, but found almost instantly that his work was not to be a religious one only, but a mighty social reform also. The great oriental system of castes was against him, with its root in the established religion, and its ramifications reaching every act of life. For instance, the lowest of all castes, the Kandalas, were forced to live far from all dwellings of other men, to carry a badge that they might be avoided, to be executioners or grave-diggers, to wear the dress of condemned criminals, to eat only from broken vessels. The distinction endured into eternity, and by no transmigration could the soul of a Kaulala be reborn into a higher state. The utmost extreme of separation between the white and the negro or the Chinese in the most degraded regions of America gives no conception of the social range which Buddha travelled when he stepped down from the palace, assumed the yellow robe of mendicants, and became their companion. If the religion in which he was reared proved true, this was a crime, so stupendous that by yielding to it he would become at his next transmigration only the vilest insect, and might forfeit the benefit of good actions accumulated for millions of years. Death by public execution was nothing, shame nothing, torture nothing, compared to the temporal and spiritual danger incurred by him who disregarded caste.

For instance, Ananda, the favorite disciple of Buddha, after a long walk in the country, meets with Matangi, a woman of the low caste of the Kandalas, near a well, and asks her for some water. She tells him what she is and that she must not come near him. But he replies, "My sister, I ask not for thy caste or thy family, I ask only for a draught of water." She afterwards becomes a disciple of Buddha.

To us this is a touching instance of human sympathy and nothing more—but to them it was infinitely more. When in the old pro-slavery times Prudence Crandall taught colored children in Connecticut, she was mobbed and driven from the state; but it was merely a social penalty for a social offence. That she had committed a crime which shook the heavens and the earth by its horror, that would reduce her family to the lowest disgrace forever, and condemn her to suffer in the vilest forms of animal loathsomeness for countless years of transmigration; this was never pretended. Yet this risk and nothing less than this was what Ananda, under his teacher's guidance, incurred. It was thus that Buddha attacked caste; he did not say a word against it, so far as the records show, but he quietly defied it in practice, from the first day of his preaching.

He began to preach; and soon great multitudes followed him. He went to Benares, the seat of Indian learning; he was heard there, and among his first converts were the five friends who had before deserted him. He preached in the field, and the poor accompanied him. He preached to four young princes whom he met; their servant was with them. When the princes were to join Buddha's corps of Rahans or mendicants, they said to each other—"Great indeed and deeply rooted is the pride of princes; it is extremely difficult to shake it off, and free oneself of its tyrannical exigencies. Let our servant be first ordained; we will have an opportunity of prostrating ourselves before him." Their request was granted.

Would the same favor be shown to women? In the deep degradation of oriental women's lives, they hardly dared ask it, but it was asked. Having converted a young man, his mother and wife also sought Buddha, "desiring to be ranked among his disciples and devoted themselves to his service." They were recognized as disciples, though not admitted to his priesthood. But soon that also came. When Buddha returned to his own country and visited his own palace, he found that his young wife had followed, step by step, in sympathy, all his progress; that she had put on the yellow robe when he did, and had reduced herself to the same simplicity of food. Finally his own aunt, Patzupati, the widow of his father, came to him after the king's death, and asked to become a Rahans or religious devotee. He refused. She asked again, and yet again. Then she gathered five hundred high born women; made them cut off their long hair and put on the yellow robe, and went on foot to the distant monastery where Buddha was. On hearing their request, he remained long silent; then said—"It is not expedient to allow women to embrace the religious state; otherwise my institutions shall not continue long." They continued their appeals, were at last received to the priesthood, and the institutions of Buddha have lasted twenty-two hundred years. Everywhere that they have gone, they have elevated the condition of women; thus testifies Bishop Bigandet, and adds that their position in Burmah and Siam is one of "almost complete equality with men," and that they are "man's companions, and not slaves." This is confirmed to me by a lady who was six years in the royal palace in Siam, and twelve years in other Eastern countries, Mrs. Lenowens, the authoress. The Buddhist women, she declares, are superior to any other women of the East; they are moral, modest and self-devoted.

What now was the character of this preaching of Buddha, which transformed oriental religion, broke down the cruel barriers of caste, and made a new life for a third or a quarter part of the human race? To illustrate its ethical part, I will quote from "The 42 Sections," or "Verses," a Buddhist work carried to China soon after the beginning of our era, but which must previously have attained high authority in India, or it would not have been selected for translation into Chinese. It is now rendered into English by Rev. Suman Seal, a Chaplain in the English navy, (London, 1871).

"7. Buddha said: A man who foolishly does me wrong, I will return to him the protection of my ungrudging love; the more evil comes from him, the more good shall go from me; the fragrance of their good actions always redounding to me, the harm of the slanderous words returning to him."

"There was a foolish man once heard Buddha, while preaching, defend this great principle of returning good for evil, and therefore he came and abused Buddha. Buddha was silent, and did not answer him, pitying his mad folly. The man having finished his abuse, Buddha asked him, saying, 'Son, when a man forgets the rules of politeness in selling a present to another, the custom is to say, 'Keep your present.' Son, you have now failed at me! I decline to entertain your abuse! I request you to keep it—a source of misery to yourself. For as sound belongs to the drum, and shadow to the substance, so in the end misery will certainly overtake the evil doer.'"

"9. Buddha said: A man in the practice of Religion, who exercises charity from a feeling of necessary observation or from a feeling of partiality, does not obtain much merit."

"10. Buddha said: To feed crowds by the hundred is not to be compared with the act of feeding one really good man;

"To feed one good man, however, is infinitely greater in point of merit than attending to questions about heaven and earth, spirits and demons, such as occupy ordinary men."

"11. Buddha said: There are twenty difficult things in the world—being poor to be charitable; being rich and great, to be religious; to escape destiny, [explained not to die]; to get sight of the Scriptures, [Sutras of Buddha]; to be born when a Buddha is in the world; to repress lust and banish desire; to see an agreeable object and not seek to obtain it; to be strong without being rash; to bear insult without anger; to move in the world (to touch things) without setting the heart on it; to investigate a matter to the very bottom; not to condemn the ignorant; thoroughly to extirpate self-esteem; to be good and at the same time to be learned and clever; to see the hidden principle in the profession of religion; to obtain one's end without exultation; to exhibit by a virtuous life the doctrine of Buddha; to save men by converting them; to be the same in heart and life; to avoid controversy."

"17. Buddha said: Let one behold heaven and earth and think—these are impermanent, and so the mountains and rivers, all impermanent! the varied forms of life and the productions of Nature, all destined to terminate and perish! Attaining to this condition of mind, in a moment there will be illumination (Reason)."

"18. Buddha said: Throughout an entire day's conduct to keep the thoughts steadily on Religion (Reason) and from this religious conduct to realize a deep principle of Faith; this indeed is blessedness without measure."

"20. Buddha addressed all the Shamans (ascetics): Guard against looking on a woman. If you see one, let it be as though you saw her not, and be sure of having no conversation with her. But if you must needs speak to her, let it be with pure heart and upright conduct. Say to yourself, I am a Shaman placed in this sinful world, let me be then as the spotless lily, unsoiled by the mud in which it grows. Is she old? regard her as your mother. Is she honorable? regard her as your sister. Is she of small account? regard her as your younger sister. Is she a child? treat her reverently and with politeness."

"42. (final.) Buddha said: I regard the dignities of Kings and Princes as the dust motes in a sunbeam; the value of gold and jewelry as that of a broken platter; dresses of the finest silk I regard as the scraps of silk given as presents. The different expedients in religious practice I regard as a mere raft to carry off the treasure."

To show the intellectual side of his preaching I will also read some extracts from what purports to be a sermon of Buddha, translated from the Siamese by Henry Alabaster, in the book entitled "The Wheel of the Law," already mentioned.

"On a certain occasion the Lord Buddha led a number of his disciples to a village of the Kalamachon where his wisdom and merit and holiness were known. And the Kalamachon assembled and did homage to him and said: 'Many Priests and Brahmins have at different times invited us and explained their religious tenets, declaring them to be excellent; but each abused the tenets of every one else, whereupon we are in doubt as to whose religion is right and whose wrong; but we have heard that the Lord Buddha teaches an excellent religion, and we beg that we may be freed from doubt to learn the truth.'"

"And the Lord Buddha answered: 'You were right to doubt, for it was a doubtful matter. I say unto all of you—Do not believe in what you have heard; that is, where you have heard any one say, this is especially good or extremely bad; do not reason with yourselves that, if it had not been true, it would not have been asserted, and so believe in its truth. Neither have faith in traditions, because they have been handed down for many generations and in many places.'"

"Do not believe in guesses—that is, in assuming something at hap hazard as a starting point, draw your conclusions from it, reckoning your two and your three and your four before you have fixed your number one."

"Do not believe in the truth of that to which you have become attached by habit, as every nation believes in the superiority of its own dress and ornaments and language."

"Do not believe merely because you have heard, but when of your own consciousness you know a thing to be evil, abstain from it."

"And then the Lord taught of that which is good, saying, 'If any of you know of yourselves that anything is good and not evil, praised by wise men, advantageous and productive of happiness, then act abundantly according to your belief.'"

"And the Lord continued, 'The holy man must not be covetous or foolish or revengeful, and he must be versed in the four virtuous inclinations (Phrommawilan), which are Meta, desiring for all living things the same happiness which one seeks for one's self; Karuna, training the mind in compassion towards all living things, desiring that they may escape all sorrows either in hell or in other existences, just as a man who sees his friend ill desires nothing so much as his recovery; Mudita, taking pleasure in all living things, just as playmates are glad when they see one another; and Upekka, keeping the mind balanced and impartial, with no affection for one more than another.'"

In the translation of the Dhammapada by Max Müller (lately reprinted in this country) you will find many grand passages, of which I will quote but one or two. "Let a man overcome anger by love, evil by good, the greedy by liberality, the liar by truth."

"He abused me, he beat me, he defeated me, he robbed me:—hatred in those who harbor such thoughts will never cease."

"For hatred does not cease by hatred at any time; hatred ceases by love; this is an old rule."

When we remember that this is one of the manuals of ethics habitually taught in the children's schools of Siam, we can understand the value of the teaching. I will quote no further from this book, since it is more easily accessible than the others I have named. For this reason alone I omit the beautiful parable, to be found in the same volume of Max Müller's Lectures on Religion, where Buddha instructs a young woman who has lost her child.

It is the general tradition that Buddha began to preach when thirty-five years old—that he preached forty-five years, and died at eighty. Only a little of this period is definitely recorded, if anything in Oriental tradition can indeed be called definite. During this period he simply went about doing good, reconciling strife, rebuking sin and preaching his doctrines. The books are full of anecdotes concerning him. We now find him talking in the fields with farmers, and drawing his illustrations from their cattle and their crops. Again we find him received in princes' homes with music and processions and gorgeous array. Once he turns from such an invitation to accept that of some Mary Magdalene whom he has converted. Is there a dangerous forest, frequented by robbers; he enters the forest alone, and brings out the chief robber as his convert. When reviled any where so that his disciples wish to flee, he says gen-

ly, "A little patience will save us the need of so many travels;" then they remain and prevail. His rich disciples give to the poor, and there are beautiful descriptions of kindness done to the humble and timid, who are again and again brought forward into the chief places of the worshipping assembly; now it is a poor wood-cutter, now a young girl who brings her weaving in her hands, and lingers on the outskirts of the crowd. Then we read of quarrels among the followers, to be reconciled by the master; and then persecutions gather round, proceeding from the Brahmin priesthood. Assassins are sent, but are rebuked and disarmed; cunning slanders are devised to Buddha's character, but they fail. A new king enters on a systematic attempt to suppress the new faith. One of the oldest of the disciples, Mankalan, is caught and tortured to death by a band of five hundred men, but the Master always is saved. There is little doubt that a part of these long years of priesthood were spent in hiding from these dangers; but Sakya-Muni, Gautama, the Buddha, died at last in peace, in the arms of his disciples. When his death was approaching, he called round him his followers, and gave them a parting address, of which Bishop Bigandet says that "the greatest moralist, possessing the most consummate and perfect knowledge of human nature, could not lay down wiser regulations for setting on a firm and lasting foundation a great and mighty institution." These parting counsels are preserved, and it is also recorded that, when Ananda the favorite disciple asked the teacher about his funeral, he answered like Socrates: "Do not be much concerned about what shall remain of me after I have entered Nirvana; but be rather solicitous to practise the rules that lead to perfection."

I chose for the subject of this lecture the character of Buddha. Into the vaster theme of the religion which now bears his name I shall not enter. Though it is the religion of a third or a fourth of the human race, it has only been investigated by Europeans for some forty years. Even now, almost all of us must study it not through those who believe in it, but through some Roman Catholic Bishop, through some Wesleyan Missionary, through some clear-headed Frenchman, who frankly begins with the admission that he writes as an advocate, not as a judge. Its central point, its theory of future existence, revolves around one figurative word, Nirvana, about which scholars are still hopelessly divided, though with an obvious tendency to more and more spiritual interpretation. That the books of this religion assert all the noblest maxims of human action is already certain; that these principles have broken down caste and established a sense of the brotherhood of man, and to some degree of the dignity of woman; that they have taught a grand self-control, these things are admitted by all scholars. No form of religion has done so much for any Asiatic people as Buddhism has done; tried by the test of practical results, it has nothing to fear. All travellers agree that Buddhist races, like all others, practically believe in a Creator and in immortality, whatever their metaphysicians proclaim in their theories, and whatever Buddha personally taught. Mrs. Leonowens testifies that the strongest religious impressions she ever received were beside the death-bed of a Buddhist priest. It is true that, as we read the books of this religion, we miss the ideal and poetic element so strong in the Brahmanism against which it rebelled. To come to Buddhism from the Vedas is to come from the mountains to the valleys; from the mighty Himalayas, full of storm-gods and shadows, to the grassy steppes of Thibet, where shepherds lead their peaceful lives and say forever, "Are we not all brothers?" But after all, as Tennyson says, "love is of the valley;" and even on the ideal side, it is hard to make any deny spiritual depth to a religion among whose votaries we still find in use that sublime Sanskrit word, the grandest of all formulas for the Deity, Bhavanatrya. It signifies the Eternal Father, the Eternal Mother, and that which is neither Male nor Female, but is greater than either, unites both, and is not to be understood by human intelligence.

And as to the founder of this religion, it is hard to see that in any trait of sublime virtue he falls short of the highest human example; and the best proof of this is in the exceptional homage his character wins from those who went to the East to make converts from his religion. Bishop Bigandet frankly compares him with Jesus Christ; and the vehemently antagonistic St. Hilaire says that it must be owned that the life of Buddha is spotless; "he is the perfect model of all the virtues he preaches; his self-abnegation, his charity, his unalterable sweetness, are never found wanting for a single instant." [Sa vie n'a point de tache. Il est le modèle achevé de toutes les vertus qu'il préche; son abnégation, sa charité, son inaltérable douceur ne se démentent pas un seul instant.]

Such opinions could easily be multiplied.

It has been said by one of the foremost thinkers among ourselves that every prophet has some one central word; that the word of Buddha is "renunciation," the word of Jesus, "love." I think this is sacrificing a little of the truth to an antithesis. It was Jesus who said, "If thy right eye offend thee, pluck it out," though Buddha used similar expressions. It was Buddha who said—"If a man foolishly does me wrong, I will return to him the protection of my ungrudging love," although Jesus in these words would have recognized a brother in spirit. I think I should wish to modify Octavius Frothingham's statement so far as to read, Jesus preached love and renunciation; Buddha renunciation and love.

And I would reverently say, that when humanity makes up its final criticism on these two, its greatest religious teachers, I believe it will be found that both of them need even in these statements some modification from other religious attitudes; that both of them saw love itself too much in the light of renunciation, and ignored too fully the Greek ideas of beauty and of joy.

Whence this limitation came, in these sublime masters, I think is plain. Gautama seems to me to have been restrained by the very belief that he was Buddha, as was Jesus by the Jewish tradition of the Messiahship, which made him apparently expect to return during that generation, in the clouds of heaven, to judge the quick and the dead. It is scarcely possible in either case to separate these opinions from the teacher, and to set the error aside as a later reverie of some disciple. In both cases we see that it must have entered into all the original teachings of the leaders, indeed supplied the framework for their discourses, to which their most beautiful and enduring maxims were only subordinate and incidental. The phrases to which we most cling for consolation were but their collateral teachings, obiter dicta, far less important to them than the stupendous drama in which each thought himself created to take part. Absorbed in this grand expectation, neither habitually legislated, it would seem, for an ordinary condition of life; both ignored home and family ties, and taught an ascetic rather than a human virtue. Hence a predominant effect of sobriety in their teachings; they begin with the fact of human pain, not with the fact of human joy. It is a relief to turn sometimes from both these solemn temples to the sunny life and death of Socrates, utterly refusing to distrust the ruling Power of the Universe, or to believe that anything can be otherwise than well.

The human race has never got beyond that stage of progress, it seems to me, where any single human channel of religious life will suffice, even though it be the highest. In the vaster relations of modern existence we need them all. The career of man has grown large, conscious, cultivated, varied, full. He needs India and Judea, Greece and Rome; he needs all types of spiritual manhood, all teachers. The Buddha of whom I have spoken is but a single teacher, and we must take him for what he is. We do not ask, is Milton Shakespeare? It is enough that he is Milton.

But they celebrate Buddha's birthday in the land that holds his faith, as if he were the only one. Mrs. Leonowens was asked by a friend of hers, high in rank among Siamese women—"Do you wish to see how I keep the birthday of my Buddha? Come to my home to-morrow." She went; and there in a beautiful garden and arrayed as for a festival, sat the noble lady and the numerous women of her household. They were all dressed in white, and garlanded with flowers. A beautiful bouquet awaited the guests. Presently the outer gates were thrown open and other white-robed attendants came thronging in, each bringing some poor beggar woman from the streets, to the number of a hundred. Each was seized by larger girls, disrobed of filthy clothing, bathed bodily in the bathing ponds of the garden, and then dressed in white robes, put on by the hostess's own hand. The guests were then seated at table, waited upon with all the ceremonial due to the King; then to each was given a little basket of money, and they went forth from the celebration of their Christmas Day.

It is recorded that King Asoka, or Ashoka, whose edicts I began by reading to you, devoted his best efforts for years to finding the body of Buddha. At last, by the aid of a priest more than a hundred years old, he found the secret tomb. "On touching the bolt, the door was suddenly opened, when to the great surprise of all present, the lamps that had been lighted 218 years ago were found burning and full of oil; the flowers, without the least sign of withering, were as fresh and beautiful as those in the gardens; the smell of the perfumes seemed even to be more exquisite than that of new ones." More than two thousand years have now passed, and we are opening this tomb again; the lights still burn, the flowers are still fresh, the perfume of that noble life yet remains immortal.

A NEW PROFESSION.—Law, theology and medicine can no longer claim to be the only professions. The accomplished teacher and the successful editor require as careful a preliminary training, and have need of as extensive information, as members of any one of what were formerly called the "learned professions."

Two generations ago, the minister was the universally wise man of the community; now he has come to be confined to a limited and special field. His former place is filled by the journalist more than by any other man. Then, what the Rev. Doctor said was looked on as the last resort in any case; now, the widely influential editor has a greater dominion than the member of any other profession.

Broad is the field opened to the press of coming days. Able, cultivated men must be sought to conduct it. If, occasionally, a man of genius comes from the composing-room and shows himself suited for the editor's sanctum, it is no proof that from the ranks of type-setters all editors must be obtained. A special and a thorough education is needed for this profession as much as for any other; and we rejoice that the day of schools of journalism has come.—Williams (College) Vidette.

With many readers brilliancy of style passes for affluence of thought; they mistake buttercups in the grass for immeasurable gold mines under the ground.—Longfellow.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the Opera, in the new Express Building on St. Clair Street, opposite the Warehouse Opera House, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

RECEIVED.

- THE ART OF BEAUTIFYING SUBURBAN HOME GROUNDS OF SMALL EXTENT, ETC. Illustrated by upwards of Two Hundred Plates and Engravings. By FRANK J. SCOTT. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 90, 92, and 94 Third St. 1870. Royal 8vo. Bevelled Boards. pp. 618. Price, $8.00.
- RECOLLECTIONS OF PAST LIFE. By Sir HENRY BOLLAND, Bart., M.D., &c., President of the Royal Institution of Great Britain: Physician-in-Ordinary to the Queen. New York: D. Appleton & Co., 641 and 661 Broadway. 1872. 12mo. pp. 319.
- LEGENDS OF THE PATRIARCHS AND PROPHETS AND OTHER OLD TESTAMENT CHARACTERS, from various sources. By the Rev. S. BERING-GOULD, M.A., Author of "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages," "The Origin and Development of Religious Beliefs," "In Exile in Israel," etc. New York: Macmillan & Co. (Holt & Williams). 1872. 12mo. pp. 386.
- SHORT STUDIES ON GREAT SUBJECTS. By JAMES ANTHONY FREEMAN, M.A., late Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford, Second Series. New York: CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co. 1872. 12mo. pp. 472.
- RADICAL PROBLEMS. By C. A. BARTOL. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS. 1872. 12mo. pp. 407.
- THE TOMORROW OF DEATH; OR, THE FUTURE LIFE ACCORDING TO SCIENCE. By LOUIS FOUCHER, author of "Trinitarianism," "Earth and Sea," etc. Translated from the French by S. R. CROCKER. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS. 1872. 12mo. pp. 395.
- THE INFINITE AND THE FINITE. By THEOPHILUS PARSONS. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS. 1872. 12mo. pp. 146.
- SAPPHO; OR THE MENTAL CONSTITUTION. By ARTHUR MERTON. [Philadelphia.] Published by the MERTONS. 1872. 16mo. pp. 1-6.
- THE LAST TRIAL FOR ATHEISM IN ENGLAND. A FRAGMENT OF AUTOBIOGRAPHY. By GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. Fourth Edition, Revised. London: TUCKERMAN & Co., 60, Paternoster Row. 1871. pp. 121.
- THE PRINCIPLES OF SECULARISM ILLUSTRATED. By GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. Third Edition, Revised. London: Book Store, 222, Strand; AUSTIN & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street. 1870. pp. 80.
- SECULARISM, SCRIPTURISM, AND ATHEISM. Verbatim Report of the Proceedings of a Two Nights' Public Debate between Messrs. G. J. HOLYOAKE and C. BRADLAUGH, held at the New Hall of Science, 142, Old St. Paul's, City Road, London, on the evenings of March 10 and 11, 1870. Mr. AUSTIN HOLYOAKE in the Chair. Revised by, and Published with the Consent of, both Disputants. London: AUSTIN & Co., 17, Johnson's Court, Fleet Street, E. C. 1870. pp. 77.
- A ZULU'S ANSWER TO DR. CHURCHING. The Colenso Controversy: the Views of the Kaffir involved in it: the Missionary Meeting at the Bottom of it. A Reply to Dr. Churching's "Moses Right; Colenso Wrong." By A. LONDON ZULU (G. J. HOLYOAKE). London: FREDERICK FARSHAH, 222, Strand, W. C. pp. 60.
- THE LOGIC OF LIFE, DEDUCED FROM THE PRINCIPLES OF FREE-THOUGHT. By G. J. HOLYOAKE. Eleventh Thousand. London: AUSTIN & Co., Johnson's Court, E. C. 1870. pp. 16.
- THE LOGIC OF DEATH: OR WHY SHOULD THE ATHEIST FEAR TO DIE? By G. J. HOLYOAKE. One Hundred and Fifty-Ninth Thousand. London: AUSTIN & Co., Johnson's Court, E. C. 1870. pp. 16.
- THE LIMITS OF ATHEISM: OR WHY SHOULD SCRIPTURE BE OBLIVIOUS? By G. J. HOLYOAKE. HOLYOAKE & Co., Booksellers and Publishers, 141 Fleet Street. London. 1861. pp. 16.
- THE REASONER. A Secular and Co-operative Review. Edited by GEORGE JACOB HOLYOAKE. [Four numbers, Oct. Nov., Dec., 1871, and Jan., 1872.]
- BUREAU CORDA: Annual Address to the Ladies' National Association, by JOSEPHINE E. BUTLER. Liverpool: T. BAKER, Printer, Cook Street. 1871. pp. 45.
- WORDS AND DEEDS: OR MEDICAL VERTUOUS IN ENGLAND. An Essay by Mrs. HUME-ROBERTS. Manchester: A. BEE, WOOD & SON, Printers and Publishers, 55 & 58, Oldham St. London: T. W. GRATTAN, Publishers, Amen Corner, Paternoster Row. pp. 16.
- SOUTH-PLACE CHAPEL, FINSBURY. Report of the Committee for 1871.

PUBLISHERS'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the Fortnight ending March 24th.—D. T. Howell, $2; C. G. Clark, 10 cts.; Jno. C. Myers, 15 cts.; H. R. Boynton, $1; Minnie G. Fawcett, $1; Newton Littlefield, $2; R. H. Howard, $2.50; Lydia Hinkley, $4; Jno. Swanck, 25 cts.; N. A. Root, 50 cts.; James Munroe, $1; Alex. Cole, $4; Frank S. Billings, $4; H. Williamson, 15 cts.; Thomas Tasker, $1; Geo. A. Brown, $2; E. S. Pier, 10 cts.; M. J. Green, 10 cts.; N. Smith, $1.75; Samuel Merdeth, $1; Thos. H. Hagard, $1; H. L. Green, 25 cts.; J. Sherman, 10 cts.; Mrs. Francis Wason, $5; Bonnet Allen, $2; Thomas Hall, $2; E. Bryant, $3; A. T. Lilly, $2; Mrs. Nina Moore, $2; H. Damon, $4; Wm. Ganshorn, $1; J. Cooper, $2; Fred. A. Pales, $2; Geo. A. Foster, $2; Leander Withler, 75 cts.; Mrs. C. B. Richmond, $15; A. B. Brown, $2; Mrs. Helen E. Hall, $2; C. A. Nara, $2; Agnes Clement, $2; Miss M. Chamberlain, $2; A. G. McVey, $2; H. A. Mills, $1; H. L. Green, $2.75; Anson Stambaugh, $1.50; L. O. Root, 50 cts.; Thos. S. Mann, 25 cts.; A. G. McVey, 10 cts.; Rev. Sam'l. Johnson, $1.25; Z. L. Hungerford, $3.00; Chas. Zeigler, 10 cts.; Mrs. C. Stratton, $2; Lou N. Cleveland, 20 cts.; C. W. Hastings, $1; H. L. Green, $1.75; Kelly W. Prater, 10 cts.; Lizzie Emerson, $2; Wm. T. Adams, $2.50; J. F. Schmidt, 25 cts.; Jas. Singer, 75 cts.; Ernst Prusag, 50 cts.; A. Kehrer, 15 cts.; J. Henry Clark, $5; Phoebe B. Dean, 25 cts.; Max Pracht, 50 cts.; Rob. Swander, 10 cts.; Julius Schnizer, $1.30; Jas. Parton, $2; M. C. Halling, 50 cts.; Jno. Bower, 25 cts.; J. H. Green, 10 cts.; H. S. Mowry, 5 cts.; H. S. Burton, $2; J. McMinn, 10 cts.; L. M. Thornton, 15 cts.; Rob. R. McLeod, $2; Chas. L. Gould, $2; W. T. Adams, $2; E. W. Weir, $10; W. O. Crosby, 50 cts.; T. Magee, $5; Morris Einstein, $2; Jas. C. Boyden, $5; H. L. Green, $1; Mrs. C. S. Miller, $5; P. Pillsbury, $1; Geo. F. Whitfield, for Robinson, $2; Frances Wason, $2; Thos. B. Ash, 25 cts.; H. B. Clark, $2; Wm. West, 10 cts.; H. T. Campbell, $2; S. B. Ball, 10 cts.; H. Lockwood, 10 cts.; Jno. T. Sargent, $2; H. L. Green, $4.75; D. Muncey, 10 cts.; Mrs. Dr. Bowdler, $2; C. A. Nara, 10 cts.; 10 cts.; C. B. Haskett, $1; Henrietta Hyde, 10 cts.; H. Le Roy Bacon, 50 cts.; H. Camp, $1; Valentine Ludwig, 10 cts.; S. Mitchell, 25 cts.; J. O. Ford, 65 cts.; J. B. Hitchcock, $1.50; Judge Douglass, $2; C. B. Lynn, $1.50; C. D. Martin, $1.50; A. Vogle, 10 cts.; J. Andrews, $1; J. W. Scott, 20 cts.; Chester Freebee, 60 cts.; C. W. Newton, $1.50; D. S. Gardner, 50 cts.; Oscar Clute, 65 cts.; F. Lassar, $2; Mrs. C. H. Blake, 10 cts.; J. M. Holmes, 35 cts.; H. L. Green, $2; Wm. H. Hamlin, 15 cts.; Frank S. Billings, 10 cts.; Geo. Sieberknecht, $1; J. M. Hall, $1.40; A. L. Munroe, $2; Geo. W. Park, $2; Thos. Tasker, 60 cts.; J. D. Zimmerman, $1.60; W. C. Oliver, 10 cts.; Allen Greenwell, $1.63; J. C. Allen, $1.45; P. R. Johnson, M.D., 25 cts.; C. C. Warren, $1; A. P. Stevens, 60 cts.; J. Horton, 60 cts.; Dyer D. Lum, 25 cts.; Chas. Bladedell, 25 cts.; R. F. Townsend, $2; M. H. Leibel, $2; J. D. Farling, 50 cts.; A. H. Carpenter, $2; R. L. Toled, 50 cts.; Geo. W. Jones, 50 cts.; S. C. Eastman, $2; Roys Printing Co., $20; P. H. Bateson, 50 cts.; —, $20.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

The Index.

ACKNOWLEDGE on last page, Five Hundred Shares, $50,000
THOMAS MUMFORD, New Harmony, Ind.	One	100
D. AYRES, JR., Brooklyn, N. Y.	"	100
MRS. L. E. BLOUNT, Evansville, Ind.	"	100
—, Defiance, O.	"	100
—, Bryan, O.	"	100
J. T. BRADY, Sabotha, Kan.	"	100
—, Northampton, Mass.	"	100
MAX FRACHT, Cincinnati, O.	"	100
—, Boston, Mass.	"	100
H. HETTERMANN, Toledo, O.	"	100
C. FOLSON, Zanesfield, O.	"	100
S. C. EASTMAN, Palmyra, Mo.	"	100
S. C. MARTIN, Indianapolis, Ind.	"	100
L. T. IVINS, Detroit, Mich.	"	100
E. W. MENDELAUGH, —, —	Two	200
A. FOLSON, Boston, Mass.	"	200
W. F. HEIKER, Dayton, O.	"	200
HENRY COIT, Sleep's Bridge, N. Y.	One	100
BARUEL COIT, Worcester, Mass.	Two	200
CHARLES NASH, Hornellsville, N. Y.	One	100
—, Osborn, O.	Two	200
S. F. WOODARD, Mt. Carroll, Ill.	One	100
H. A. MILLS, Dover, N. H.	"	100
J. W. BARELLETT, Taylor's Falls, Minn.	"	100
OSCAR ROOS, S. E. SETH S. MILLER, Geneva, N. Y.	"	100
JAS. R. STONE, Cincinnati, O.	"	100
		$53,300

"What we want is to make our Constitution conform to the religious spirit of the nation. If there is to be a fight, let it come. Christian men will never relinquish their belief without a terrible struggle."

That is the temper of this movement—earnest, determined, conscientiously fanatical, opposed with deadly hostility to the secular principles of the American government. But it is the temper that has marked the Christian Church from the very beginning; and, we repeat, it has the logic of Christianity behind it. If these men follow out that logic, they will not stop till they have gone clean over to the Romish theory of Church and State. Logical as far as they go, they have not yet gone far enough; but they have shown to every clear-sighted liberal that the logic of Christianity and the logic of freedom are at deadly feud. Which shall conquer?

MORE PETITIONS.

The following lists of signatures to the protest against the Christian Amendment have been received since our last issue:—

Mr. D. S. Cadwallader, Philadelphia, Pa., sends three hundred and thirty-eight names; Mr. C. L. Roberts, Yates City, Ill., three hundred and nine; Mr. J. H. Maln, Nebo, Ill., ninety-seven; Mr. Wm. H. Bradbury, Richmond, Ind., forty; Mr. E. H. Brown, Norway, Me., forty-three; Mr. Chas. Peck, Charlemon, Mass., twenty-nine; Mr. Lewis H. Kahn, Danville, Ill., ninety-seven; Dr. S. B. S. Wilson, Olathe, Kan., one hundred and ten; Mr. W. A. Kelley, Waukegon, O., sixty-eight; Mr. J. Schönberger, West Prairie, Wis., sixty; Mr. D. Sandman, Barre Mills, Wis., sixteen; Mr. W. C. Myers, Tiffin, O., one hundred and ten; Mr. M. R. Robinson, Salem, O., thirty-one; Mr. Curtis Votaw, Winona, Minn., twenty-nine; Mr. R. F. Townsend, Tipton, Iowa, twenty-five; Mr. Nelson Petter, Highland Grove, Iowa, fifty; Mr. W. E. Lukens, Rock Falls, Ill., seventy; Mr. Harrison Sprague, Tekonsha, Mich., one hundred and thirty-six; Mr. J. Sedgbeer, Painesville, O., fifty-eight; Mr. J. R. Buell, Indianapolis, Ind., forty; Mr. R. W. Holton, Leighton, Iowa, eighty-eight; Mr. Marc Thrane, Chicago, Ill., fifty-nine; Mr. E. A. J. Lindsley, Cherry Valley, Pa., twenty-six; Mr. R. Sauerbering, Mayville, Wis., ninety; Dr. M. B. Jarvis, Canastota, N. Y., sixty; Mr. Wm. S. Graves, Oberlin, O., thirty-one; Mr. J. Chappellsmith, New Harmony, Ind., one hundred; Mr. G. W. Kates, Covington, Ky., thirty-three; Mr. Cyrus Peirce, Bristol, Pa., fifty; Mr. W. J. Davis, Linesville, Pa., thirty-two; Mr. D. Newcomb, Kenton, O., thirty-four; Mr. J. W. Scott, Morrill, Kan., forty-four; —, Toledo, O., fifty-five; Mr. C. Hinze, Forest, Ill., forty-three; Mr. J. B. Watkins, New Bedford, Mass., fifty-six; Mr. Henry Aphorpe, Ashtabula, O., twenty-one; Mr. Wm. Barnes, Junius, N. Y., one hundred.

The number of names thus far acknowledged in THE INDEX is over TWENTY THOUSAND. Can we not make it One Hundred Thousand by the first of May? All the printed petitions required will be gratuitously furnished on application. For once, let us prove that the liberals know how to work together. A single great protest will strengthen the liberal cause in more ways than one, by showing the unity of spirit that lies out of sight under superficial differences. Roll up the list!

Commenting on a sermon by Rev. Dr. Bellows, in which a stout protest is made against the granting of subsidies to any sect or sectarian charity, the Present Age very pertinently says:—

We would ask the reverend speaker if his church is not indirectly receiving an annual subsidy from the government of the state in which he lives, to just the amount of tax which should be assessed upon the property belonging to his church according to its true value. The poor man who owns personal property of the value of $500—perhaps invested in a horse and dray—by the labor of which he gains his daily bread, must pay taxes from his hard earnings to the utmost farthing, while the church property worth half a million, within a stone's throw of his humble residence, goes untaxed. Dr. Bellows, what is this if not "subsidies and favors," and will you aid in having it "discountenanced and forbidden by public opinion and made impossible by statute?"

No NAME.—If the person who sent $1.00 for INDEX TRACTS in a letter dated "Madison, Georgia, Feb. 26, 1872," will send his or her name, the order will be filled. No signature was appended.

SPECIAL NOTICE.—No more copies of the bound volume of THE INDEX for 1870 (Vol. 1) can be furnished. They are all disposed of.

Zion's Herald has some "happy" lines by Dr. King. They ought to feel "miserable."

NO SCIENCE WITHOUT INTUITION.

BRISTOL, England, Feb. 20, 1872.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—In your too generous introduction of me to your readers (January 13th), you unawares give me a text to write on, by telling them that I incline to Intuition rather than to Science. Nay, but I insist that without Intuition there is no Science; and that the earliest accurate science, which also is regarded as typical, namely geometry, is manifestly built upon axioms furnished by Intuition. Such axioms are, no doubt, ultimately verified and justified by the harmony of the science within itself: for we do not easily believe that falsehood could forever escape self-contradiction. Nevertheless, the agreement of Human Intuition concerning these axioms sets us quite at rest concerning their truth, from the outset of the study. Archimedes also founded his science of Mechanics on an axiom, as did Newton his enlargement of the same science; and though experiment is used to confirm these axioms,—or, as they are called in Mechanics, laws,—yet (so convincing is Intuition) few and superficial experiments suffice. Experiment did not laboriously discover the laws; they were suggested by Intuition, and are only confirmed by experiment. In Morals also no science whatever is possible, without the decisive judgments of Intuition; and as for Religion, without it we are atheists. To claim to get rid of Intuition, is to claim to dispense with a belief in God. I beg a short space to justify these assertions.

Morality pronounces upon the Right and the Wrong, words which frequently appear to be relative; for the higher Right claims our obedience in preference to a lower Right, and to pursue the lower when the higher calls us becomes a positive Wrong. But what is to be esteemed higher and what lower, is decided by Intuition,—by an inward judgment; as in the question whether to pursue a selfish good, or to pursue a general good, be the better and nobler. The agreement of mankind in the primary intuitions needful to Morals gives us full confidence in their certainty, and it is only by appealing to these intuitions that we can confute any audacious defier of moral rules. A single gross instance will make this intelligible. A Roman glutton of the first century lived to eat; hence after a banquet he took an emetic to enable him to eat again. No argument which urges that this will undermine his health touches the moral question. He may reply that he willingly takes his chance. The immorality consists in treating his stomach and palate as given him for the sake of carnal pleasure primarily, and not for nutrition. But the intuition of mankind teaches us all that nutrition is the main object, and that to use the organs simply for carnal pleasure is an abuse and an immorality. Those who reject Intuition become logically helpless against the urgent pressure of a kindred vice, in which the sexes are concerned. The question, therefore, is one of pre-eminent practical importance.

As to the basis of Religion, it is only by Intuition that we discern Design and Mind in the universe. I think I need say no more, as your readers may dislike metaphysics as much as we in England do. The simpler and the less scholastic metaphysics can be made, the better in my judgment.

I am respectfully yours,

FRANCIS W. NEWMAN.

[Our language was—"inclining to the intuitional rather than to the scientific school of Free Religion." We thus referred to the special, not to the general, signification of the word Intuition, as explained in our Boston lecture for 1871, in THE INDEX No. 68. In this lecture we said that Science "will so extend and enlarge the common conception of experience, that it shall cover the entirety of human consciousness, as well as the mere contact of this consciousness with the outer world, and thus include whatever mental phenomena the word Intuition really stands for. Not as a special faculty cognizant of special objects (i. e. God and Immortality, immediately cognized), but only as a universal element in every possible act of knowledge, can the word Intuition properly be used." It is thus manifest that Prof. Newman has misunderstood the reference we made to his philosophy of religion, the accuracy of which, as intended by us, is strikingly confirmed by the above letter.

We should be sorry to believe that "It is only by Intuition that we discern Design and Mind in the universe." Our recent Boston lecture is an attempt to show that Mind is discoverable in Nature by strict induction, combined with the use of hypothesis as sanctioned and legitimated even by physical science. It is our own conviction that the permanence of the idea of God in the human mind depends absolutely on the substitution of the scientific method for the methods both of Christianity and of Intuitionism. —Ed.]

CHRISTIANITY AGAIN.

A writer to the Liberal Christian, at the close of a sufficiently acrid report of my lecture, "Three Studies of Christianity," said aptly that the lecturer would have done better justice to his whole theme, if he had in a fourth study described the Christianity that is to be. As what is to be is non-existent and cannot therefore be described, the lecturer was not disturbed by the remark, except in his gravity, which for an instant relented into a smile. Robert Collyer, more sanguine and prophetic, undertakes the needed supplement by telling how, in Lucerne last summer, he heard a Scotch Presbyterian, a minister of the Free Kirk, in the Roman Catholic Cathedral of St. Mary, preach a sermon on "The Example of Christ," that was in every way acceptable to him and to a Baptist brother who accompanied him. It must have been a remarkable sermon; perhaps Mr. Collyer's genial presence inspired the preacher. We will not suggest the possibility that his genial mind made the sermon seem better than it was. We will suppose that any of the rest of us would have heard it sympathetically, had we been there. Nineteen people, including the sexton, in a church that would hold two or three thousand, do not indeed make a Christianity. Would it have been a new Christianity, had the nineteen been nineteen hundred, and all in cordial consent with the minister's broad gospel?

The question is whether Christianity remains Christianity, when its characteristic features are taken away. The Roman Catholic Cathedral welcomes the Presbyterian minister with his plain desk, his hymn, Bible and sermon. That is a sign that Romanism ceases to be Romanism. The Presbyterian minister delivers a sermon that delights a Unitarian. By that token Presbyterianism resigns its peculiarity. The Baptist brother sympathizes; he therefore surrenders his peculiarity. The Unitarian is a "Liberal Christian" of the broad school, whose dogmatical peculiarity it would be hard to discover. Behold Christianity reduced to its lowest terms. This is the minimum, the last degree of attenuation. Is the final dilution the highest potency? Is Christianity increased or diminished by the operation? In other words, is Christianity most Christian when there is most Christ in it, or when there is least? Is the play of Hamlet most complete with the Hamlet or without it?

To some of us it will seem as if Mr. Collyer's study was not of Christianity so much as of the something that is to succeed Christianity,—that is, the religion of faith in human nature, the natural religion of the good heart, a religion unecclasiastical, undogmatical, unsectarian, spiritual.

Such religion is not entitled, by any definition, even the liberal Unitarian's, to be called "Christian." If we reduce Christianity to "Love to God and Man," we reduce it to the common substance that all religions share. Justice, kindness, brotherly love, are human attributes, not "Christian" particularly. We might omit them in their human sense, separated from their dogmatical elements, and the religion, though shorn of its most touching, sympathetic and attractive features, would still exist and might still flourish. But if we could eliminate the dogmatical element, leaving only the ethical and sentimental, the sects would disappear, the grand churches would crumble, the liturgies would become a dead letter, the prayers would cease, the institutions would decay, the establishments would be disestablished. In a word, the Christ would be dropped. Jesusism is not Christianity. The sermon on the mount is not Christianity. The beatitudes are not Christianity. These are found in all religions. They come, word for word, from Judaism. Something quite as good, if not precisely identical, is found in the Chinese and Burmese Buddhism. They do not constitute the peculiarity of these faiths, but are accessory and subordinate parts,—religion, but not the religion.

The author of the "Three Studies" might have made another, several others. He might have made a study of Unitarianism; but microscopical studies, though interesting and instructive, are not well adapted to general audiences.

O. E. F.

JUDICIAL SWEARING.

The Boston Transcript recently contained the following account of a case of commitment to prison of a witness who is a Catholic, for refusing to take the oath in the manner prescribed by Massachusetts law:—

A case in which the law requiring Catholic witnesses to be sworn on the Holy Evangelists came up in the session of the grand jury yesterday afternoon, which will be most likely to bring this question to the test.

In a case which was under the consideration of the jury, a witness was called who is a Catholic, and on being required to take the oath on the Bible flatly refused.

Judge Lord, who was holding court in the civil session, was called in and assumed his seat on the bench, thus transforming the session of the jury into open court.

The contumacious witness was again called to the stand, and required to take the oath in the form prescribed, which he again refused to do.

Judge Lord then asked him if he was not a Catholic, to which he assented. He then asked his reason for refusing to be sworn in the form prescribed by law, when the witness replied that he considered the Protestant form of oath equally sacred and binding upon him, and refused to submit to what he considered an unjust discrimination.

The judge endeavored to persuade him to reconsider his resolution, telling him that Catholics in high official circles had not refused under similar circumstances, and that the law left him no alternative if the refusal was persisted in.

The witness, however, remained firm in his refusal, and was accordingly committed to jail, in accordance with the statute law, where he now remains.

In committing the witness Judge Lord informed him that, whenever he felt inclined to comply with the order of the court, he would be released from confinement.

As the case now stands, the witness must either back down or suffer an indefinite term of imprisonment. But probably the next move will be by the friends of the prisoner to bring him before the Supreme Court on a writ of habeas corpus, when the question will probably be definitely settled in regard to the legality of this requirement.

We are very glad that a test case has occurred which is likely to draw the attention of the public to the inconsistencies and absurdities of the system of oaths or judicial swearing. It is a part of the old scheme of superstition which teaches that it is not the offence against truth which is damaging to the soul, but the irreverence towards the God whose name is invoked to endorse the truth. Undoubtedly this form does impress some superstitious minds with a fear of some awful penalty, which forces from them a verbal confession which they would not otherwise have made. Sometimes it goes farther, and wrings from them avowals which are not true, so confused does the mind become. We know how the old tortures made many a witch confess to the crime which had no real existence.

A lawyer told me very recently of an instance in which even the superstitious fear of the consequences, not the fact of telling a lie, made a witness give on the stand directly opposite testimony to what he had privately and without compulsion affirmed to be true. In the interval he had become converted, and his minister, giving him the ecclesiastical version of the case, said, "You know you wouldn't want to have told a lie."

If we could only have the simple principle of the five commandments of Buddha impressed upon us all, how unnecessary would be all this machinery of oaths and superstitious fear! This code says:—"Thou shalt not by act or word cause another to believe that which is untrue." It seems to express as concisely as possible the whole duty of truth, not only in its negative but in its active form, since we may construe it so as to hold him guilty who even by neglect in investigation or statement gives a false impression.

It is curious that Christian nations claim that the oath is the basis of all government, when, if the New Testament gives any command explicitly, it is, "Swear not at all." The reasons given for this injunction seem as weak as the injunction is excellent; and I have always suspected they were either interpolations of some meddling commentator, or else evasive replies to the cavils of his questioners such as Jesus often employed. The original command is like the clear authoritative idealism of Jesus; the reasons assigned tickle the ear and fancy, but are not arguments. How little power the oath has to control the conscience is shown by the common jokes about custom house swearing.

In this case, as appears in the report, the Catholic seems to have sustained a manly attitude. He acknowledged the obligation to speak truth, and if that would not bind him, it seems childish in the court to insist upon a special ceremony. We hope the case will come to a trial, and that the whole question of the utility of oaths will be fully discussed.

Z. D. C.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

TWO PLUNGES FOR A PEARL (D. Appleton & Co.) is a story by Mortimer Collins, with illustrations. To glance at the pages is quite a temptation to plunge into novel-reading, with a fair prospect of being rewarded with a pearl; but it is a temptation which only those happy mortals should yield to who have no INDEXES to edit.—Price 75 cents; for sale by H. S. Stebbins.

JUNIUS UNMASKED, OR THOMAS PAINE THE AUTHOR OF THE LETTERS OF JUNIUS AND THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE (John Gray & Co., Washington) is an ingenious attempt to prove an improbable hypothesis. Mackintosh, Brougham, Macaulay, Lord Mahon, Lord Campbell, and other well qualified critics, have pronounced Sir Philip Francis to be the real Junius. They knew more on the subject than most men; but the anonymous author of "Junius Unmasked" thinks he knows more than they. He may be right. We do not care either to endorse or to dispute his claims. The question of the authorship of Junius is one of the permanent puzzles of literature, which will probably never be solved; but to us it possesses no more interest than the other celebrated question—"Who struck Billy Patterson?" Our author, however, is bound to prove Thomas Paine the author, not only of the letters of Junius, but also of the Declaration of Independence. It remains to prove him the author of the Iliad, the Bible, Magna Charta, Mother Goose, and George Francis Train, and he may be rescued from oblivion. But it having been demonstrated that Lord Bacon wrote Shakespeare, we respectfully suggest it is now well to demonstrate that Thomas Paine wrote Lord Bacon, by way of killing time on his tedious voyage to discover America. (Whoever desires to read a summary of the new evidence in favor of the claims of Sir Philip Francis, will find it in Old and New for April.)

THE NEW VIEW OF HELL, SHOWING ITS NATURE, WHEREABOUTS, DURATION, AND HOW TO ESCAPE IT (J. B. Lippincott & Co.) is just the book we have all been waiting for. There is no longer any excuse for ignorance on this solemn subject. Mr. B. F. Barrett knows all about it, because Swedenborg has told him; and doesn't Swedenborg know? But discreet and sober men will shake their heads at the imprudent publication of his knowledge, for hell is stripped of all its usefulness as a rod in pickle for the naughty. It turns out that nobody goes to hell but because he wants to, or stays any longer than he wants to; which is a very comfortable arrangement. The brimstone is all burned out; and the poor devils who belong to the place—we beg pardon, to the "state"—find the climate quite endurable. In fact, the rascals rather like it; and if they curiously go to heaven for a temporary change, they are as glad to get home again as a sculpin is when tossed back by the fisherman into the sea. Now what will become of the "dear people," if this sort of thing is encouraged—if books are allowed to be printed which sap in this deplorable manner their faith in a fiery hell, and a horned Satan, and the other blessed and precious realities of their most holy religion? It is greatly to be feared that the unsophisticated multitudes will imitate the "scallawags" who, on the approach of cold weather, not liking to work and having no cash in pocket, commit some peccadillo for the purpose of being sentenced to the House of Correction and boarded for the winter. It is dangerous to turn punishment into a reward, or to make physic so syrupy as to tempt the palate. If there must be a hell, let it be a good hot one—a genuine orthodox lake of fire, with fends and pitchforks and chorus of howls and yells. That will do good, and frighten people into paying their pew-taxes with regularity. But this saccharine sort of retribution is foolish business. When once the idea that natural law entails necessary consequences of pleasure or pain on all human conduct has been clearly grasped, the whole notion of "rewards and punishments" is dissipated; and the fiction of "hells" and "heavens" goes with it. Swedenborg has discarded the reality, but kept the name; and Mr. Barrett keeps up the pleasant but silly pastime of pouring new wine into old bottles.

SHORT STUDIES ON GREAT SUBJECTS (Chas. Scribner & Co.) is a second series of addresses and essays by the historian Froude. Here is the interesting paper on "Calvinism" in which the historical alchemist seeks to transmute the leaden dogmas of the past into golden truths for all time—with the success which attended the efforts of a less transcendental alchemy. Here also are papers entitled "A Bishop of the Twelfth Century," "Conditions and Prospects of Protestantism," "England and her Colonies," "The Merchant and his Wife," "On Progress," "Education," etc. The concluding essay on "Scientific Method Applied to History" is one of the most valuable. It contains a few pages on modern Spiritualism which ought to be read by every one interested in that subject; and unpalatable as they may prove to those who have "made up their minds" to accept Spiritualism, they nevertheless present views that must be answered before the more sceptically inclined will be converted. From this same essay we extract the following useful passage:—

"Every one who has been at an English public school must remember the traditions current of the famous boys of a generation or two past: how one fellow had cleared a rail in the high jump, which he walked under with six inches to spare; how another had kicked the football clear over the big elm tree; how a third had leaped the lock in the canal; and a fourth had fought a bargee twice his own weight, flung him over the bridge parapet into the river, and then leaped in after him to save him from being drowned. The boys in question were really at the school, for their names are cut in the desks or painted on the school walls. But examine closely, and you will find the same story told of half a dozen boys at different schools. Each school has its heroes. The air contains a certain number of traditional heroic school exploits, and the boys and the exploits are brought together. We have here the forces at work which created the legends of Theodoric and Charlemagne, of Attila or our own Alfred."

"In the same way those who mix with the world hear anecdotes of distinguished people, witty sayings, prompt repartees, wise political suggestions, acts of special beneficence. The wit, at the beginning, of course was the wit of somebody,—some human lips made the joke or spoke the sarcasm,—in some human heart originated the act of charity; but so long as these things are trusted to oral tradition, they are treated as common property. The same jest is attributed to half a dozen people. One great man is dressed with the trappings of many small ones. There is no intention to deceive; but memory is treacherous. The good things are recollected easily, while their lawful owner's name is no less easily forgotten. Conversation distributes them erroneously, but in good faith, according to the imaginative laws of association."

"This is the process which built up the so-called histories of the early lawgivers, of Solon and Lycurgus and Numa; of Confucius and Menu; of Socrates and Pythagoras and Solomon; of every statesman and philosopher who committed his teachings to the memory of his disciples, and left posterity to construct his image after its own pleasure."

Such thought as this has an obvious application to the fame of Jesus, although Froude is too non-committal to apply it directly to his case; and it well illustrates the superiority of modern criticism over the bitter and violent accusations of fraud by which coarse forms of free thought seek to explain the incredible stories of the gospels. The world is learning that it is not necessary to be unjust in order to be free.—Price $1.50; for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo, who has a new advertisement on our last page.

The Evangelical Christians of the country are vigorously pushing the work of organizing their forces outside of the churches. The Young Men's Christian Associations are an instance in point. A "Laymen's Institute" held its third annual session in this city on March 4, at which Rev. R. B. Pope (Methodist), in his opening address, is reported to have said among other things:—

"We are not here tonight for doctrinal discussion. Infidelity has assumed a definite shape, and we are to combat it If you depend on argument, there are infidels in this town that can out-argue you all. If you stand on your own platform, these men may be won over. The foolishness of God is wiser than the wisdom of men."

It seems that the churches are girding their loins to "combat infidelity," yet not by "argument"—that being a weapon they cannot wield. They place greater reliance on the "foolishness of God," with which, it must be confessed, he plentifully inspires all those servants of his who expect to "win over infidels" without "argument."

"Dost thou for humility's sake lie?" says Augustine; "know that God doth not accept thy lying humility."

This would be a good motto to hang up on the wall at every prayer-meeting. It might stop some of the insincere self-lander of the grovelling saints.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

METHODIST SCANDAL.

BY REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE.

A horrible story of vile practices by a Methodist divine in Baltimore has lately made the rounds of the press. We do not deem it just to reproduce it here, to point a moral, because it rests upon testimony which we are not in a position to examine. It is more to our purpose to take our text from some facts which are within our personal knowledge, or are before us on indisputable evidence.

Some years since a brilliant Methodist clergyman in one of our great cities, a man of great repute as a preacher, and of the most successful ministerial labors, was found to be a regular visitor to a house of ill-fame. He was detected by some of his parishioners and confessed that such had been the case. He explained how the state of his nerves had been a temptation to him, the labors of the Lord's house driving him to the pleasures of the Devil's house. The matter was not made public, but excuses were found in the sinner's state of health to send him abroad, under a weight of motives never to do so again. After a time the man returned to important professional work, in a position of distinction, though he has since turned gradually aside to secular life. His name, of course, we have never mentioned, and never expect to mention. We simply point to the fact of such a circumstance within Methodist limits.

One day not very long since we chanced to meet a gentleman who was then, and perhaps is now, prominently connected with the official administration of some important secular business of Methodism in the Northwest, and we spoke of an experience which we had had not very long previously with a leading Methodist clergyman, who was for many years in high official position. To our utter astonishment this reply was made to us: "The Methodists of this region take no stock in Dr. —; he is an unprincipled, unscrupulous fellow!" Yet he had been for many years in high official position, and was ambitious of a Methodist bishopric.

Our experience just alluded to was this: We had become obnoxious to Dr. — in consequence of what he, quite erroneously, supposed to be our radical influence in a prominent daily paper. He set himself the task of denouncing us from the pulpit. Happening to meet one of the editors of this paper on Saturday, he stated his purpose, and mentioned in particular a recent editorial on science and theology, which he laid to our charge. In consequence of this avowal, word was sent to him by the editor-in-chief of the paper that the article in question was not from our pen, but had been sent in from outside the office by an Orthodox Minister. This was damaging to a sermon already written; because to go on and make the statement denunciatory of us, which had been made a chief part of the sermon, would be to tell a lie in the pulpit. Dr. —, however, did not stick at that. He gave his facts just as he had guessed at them, after he knew that his assertions were wholly false. We were not surprised to learn that he was very commonly regarded as "an unprincipled and unscrupulous fellow," but we did wonder that he should be continued in high position when his character was well known. We may add that we used often to hear this divine mentioned as a man who had an uncommon relish for hearing and telling "smutty" stories, the parables of indecency and unchastity which serve foul imaginations as exercises of lust.

In reading a new life of John Wesley recently, we marked the terms in which some of the first forty of Wesley's lay preachers were spoken of. One was "extremely popular as a preacher; but haughty, revengeful, hewlstrong, and unmanageable; a great favorite among the London young ladies; but a maligner of the two Wesleys; expelled in 1774, but taken back on declaring, before many witnesses, that the slanders he had propagated against Wesley and his brother were grossly false." Another was "expelled from the Methodist connection in 1750, after which he became a clergyman of the Established Church, and died, we fear, a drunkard, at Halifax, in 1770." A third was "one of Wesley's most courageous preachers, though somewhat vain and stubborn; then a farmer and a fibber, and, for a long series of years, an impoverished vagabond." On the very next page to these facts occur two significant statements, one that "already some of Wesley's people began to profess Christian perfection," and the other that "the society at Bristol [one of the two most important societies founded by Wesley] was not so perfect as it should have been, many of the members crying out 'Faith, Faith! Believe, Believe!' but making little account of the fruits of faith, either of holiness or of good works."

These are but single illustrations of a scandalous aspect of Methodism. It has so much to do with excitement, the tendency of which is sensual, and with mere sentimental outbreak, which savors more of a pious, not to say impious, theatre than it does of practical goodness, that it opens a very wide door to dreadfully unregenerate pretenders. And not merely its conversions, but its ministrations are so much on this plane, that a mouthing and bellowing cheat finds little in his way so long as he keeps up decent appearances. The clergy are not brought directly under the judgment of the congregations, but are provided for by the bishops. If a congregation gets a doubtful man, they quietly put up with him until the end of the year, when the bishop finds him a new pasture. Thus the system decidedly favors toleration of bad men, men of all degrees of badness, and there is much reason to fear that as a system Methodism is every year becoming more and more rotten within. A lust of power, of Methodist bigotry, is engendered in it, and after this inevitably come other lusts of the flesh. Every one knows that New York Methodism has a Theological School built with the money of one of the magnates of the Den of Thieves, Mr. Drew, and that the Book Concern there has furnished a huge scandal the past year. These are conspicuous signs. There are many others which meet every critical observer, and which plainly show that, with all its merits, the Methodist body has in it a good deal of bad blood.

TOO MUCH PEPPER.

CHICOPPEE, Mass., Feb. 24, 1872.

MR. EDITOR:—

Will you give me a little space in your paper, which has so many good things in it that I can hardly have a heart to find a word of fault? But somehow the matter presses upon me. The expressions of impatience towards Unitarianism that quite often meet my eye from the editorial pen, have struck me as inconsistent with the catholic character of THE INDEX. I notice in this week's issue these sentences: "The plain fact—plain to all but these so-called Liberal Christians! which, like Quilp's boy, stands on its head and looks in at the window with its heels." Again, speaking of the departure of Mr. Hepworth from Unitarianism, you say:—"We are inclined to show no mercy to the inconsistencies, contradictions, and follies of the mongrel theology he has abandoned." In this connection you say—"low as is our estimate of Unitarianism, &c."

The complaint on my part is, that such expressions are not liberal enough. They seem to indicate a petulant spirit, or at the least petulant moods.

You must know that all of us cannot at once take a bee-line for Free Religion as you have done. My own experience, if I may speak of it here, has been such that I can well understand why very many, in fact almost all, Unitarians remain in the denomination. In ten years I have grown from Conservative Universalism to Radical Unitarianism. During this time I studied three years in the midst of opportunities for rapid development in the Divinity School at Cambridge; and in other ways have not neglected the means of grace and growth. Still I am not yet disposed to leave the Unitarian denomination; neither does it seem to me that I have struck the unnatural attitude of "Quilp's boy"—allowing that it is thus with Liberal Christians, or Unitarians. One still hopes for them, when he remembers that you regained your feet after an attempt to maintain your equilibrium in this peculiar position. Be patient while others are performing these theological gymnastics. You know that Quilp only made matters more unpleasant by "punching" the head of that very human boy. Leave us a little longer to gaze around our enclosures; only keep the bars down, and when the feed gets short and dry, we will of course go over to the pastures large and green of Free Religion.

Hoping that I have touched a matter of interest to many,

I am cordially yours,

ROBERT R. McLEOD.

[We hasten to print the above kindly remonstrance, though scores of long-delayed communications have a prior claim. Our friend must not mistake our impatience with Unitarianism for impatience with Unitarians. It is the confusedness, the contradictoriness, the self-stultification of Unitarian thought that we find it impossible to respect; and the cause of good thinking requires an unsparring treatment of such faults as these. No other course will let in the daylight. But for Unitarians as men and women we have nothing but the kindest sentiments; and we fully appreciate the circumstances which embarrass many of them in getting out of the intellectual fog that surrounds them. Our criticisms of Unitarianism are due to a feeling which Epictetus well expresses, as translated by Col. Higginson:—"To a reasonable creature, that alone is insupportable which is unreasonable." We feel under no obligation to treat unreason with respect.—Ed.]

PAINE CELEBRATION.

Thomas Paine's birthday was this year celebrated to the Scandinavian Free Thinker Societies in Chicago, Ill., and Lawrence, Kansas.

The society in Chicago had a grand festival in the Turner Hall on Milwaukee Avenue. The hall was gaily decorated with flags and garlands; in the background was placed a transparency, painted by Mr. Norbo, representing the age of reason triumphing over the age of faith. Several speakers arose and spoke in honor of the day.

Mr. Jacob Johnson described Thomas Paine's merits, and spoke of the problematic origin of the Bible and its pernicious influence on mankind.

Dr. Paoli pictured the priestcraft of all ages and its pernicious influence even in our times; but he rejoined at the great progress free thought had made during the last few years, and not least among the Scandinavians, which was best shown by the fact that there were this evening about four hundred ladies and gentlemen gathered to celebrate the memory of the man who wrote the "Rights of Man" and "Common Sense."

Mr. John Klug spoke of the Internationals, who have now two Scandinavian sections in Chicago. He explained the tendency of this mighty organization; that it was not a society for manslaughter and conflagration, neither was it the aim of the society to abolish the rights of property, marriage, and all religion, nor to introduce free love and community in goods, as the "friends of order" will have it to be; but it was an organization on the basis of a just equality. The aim was, in short—"Peace on earth and good will to men."

Mr. M. Thrane spoke of the untenability of the Bible in this age of civilization, and proved that the age of faith was now struggling in its last convulsions.

After the speeches a little comedy, "The Hypocrites," written for the occasion by M. Thrane, was played. Its tendency was to ridicule those "pious Christians" who worship Mammon under the name of Christ. The incessant laughter and applause of the audience showed sufficiently that the play took.

The festival ended with a grand ball which lasted till four o'clock, and all agreed that they had passed an agreeable evening.

The festival in Lawrence was opened with a long speech by Mr. F. H. Hellstrom, in which he in detail described Paine's whole life, showed this man's great services to all mankind and especially to the United States. He showed that the memory of Thomas Paine ought to be sacred to every honest man and woman for the active part he took in the foundation of the American Republic. After a song written for the day by Mr. Isidor Kjelberg had been sung, the day closed with a dance and other festivities.

NORTHMAN.

"SPIRITISM AND SPIRITUALISM."

WELLESLEY, Mass., Feb. 16, 1872.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Dear Sir,—I wish to ask through your columns, "Will the Rev. Edward C. Towne please inform us what is meant by his article headed 'Spiritism and Spiritualism,' published in your issue of the 10th inst?"

Admitting, as he does, the fact of direct communication between the world of mortals and the world of spirits, both in the "inside" and in the "outside of Spiritualism," he yet exclaims, "We do not at all believe in Spiritualism, or dealing with spirits through material signs."

How are we to reconcile these two positions? If Spiritism, as he sneeringly terms it, consists in dealing with spirits through material signs—in "phenomenal manifestations" addressed to our outward senses, as are the objects in this world of matter; and if this "outside of Spiritualism," these phenomenal manifestations, be "veracious and legitimate," as he confesses, what, in the name of common sense, is it that he does not believe?

Suppose it is a low, or to use his own sweeping expression, "the lowest possible method of faith, what then? Shall we neglect the every-day demands of Nature, because they refer to the material instead of the "non-material aspects of matter?" When he admits that this "outside of Spiritualism," "these phenomenal manifestations," rest upon the firm basis of fact, he admits all that the Spiritualist claims,—all that the sceptic demands shall be proved. Why, then, this repugnance to an admitted fact? Does he manifest the same hesitancy in admitting that he lives in a world of matter? Or, having admitted it, does he then contend that it is only a "miserable delusion?" Not at all! But why not? Is it because the numerical strength of those who admit it renders it "respectable?" Or is it because he is frightened by the fact that the female, or, to use the elegant expression which his "cultured thought" supplies, the "petticoat" element of the country has, in the freedom of this "method of faith," been permitted to take its place side by side with such skillful connaisseurs of culture and respectability? And is it because, further, in view of this fact, he has concluded that it cannot "have any place among respectable methods" in "the future?" In all candor, is there nothing humiliating in such a position as this?

Mr. Abbot, I am not a Spiritualist. Not by any means because it is not a "respectable method" nor yet because it is "the lowest possible method of faith," but for the simple reason that I have never had sufficient evidence that even this "outside of Spiritualism" rests on the basis of fact; how much less, then, the "inside of Spiritualism" which gives no "sure mental sign" "even to the mind influenced?" Will the Rev. Edward C. Towne, then, say to me,—"Veracious and legitimate it may be, but it is not a respectable method, therefore by all means shun any investigation which may possibly result in your accepting it?" Is truth less truth that is not accepted by "respectable minds?" And because it is not a "respectable method of faith" today, is he morally certain that it can never become such? If such had been the paltry reasoning of Newton, or Harvey, or Laplace, or Franklin, or Fulton, and of a host of others who have in their turn been subjected to this cross-fire from "respectable minds," where would have been the science and the civilization of to-day?

Yours for Truth, "respectable" or not "respectable."

ELIZABETH M. F. DENTON.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, OR REPRESENTATIVE PARAPHRASES FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," writes in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but "subsequently authorized to be used:—I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admit them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents concepts of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the system of Foreign Missions. Fall of Missions, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve Copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath", by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education", by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single Copies, Five Cents; Twelve Copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at This Index Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO.

SOW THE SEED!

THE "IMPEACHMENT OF CHRISTIANITY," published in the first number of the third volume of THE INDEX, has been electrotyped, and an edition of Ten Thousand Copies has been printed in the form of

A Cheap Tract for Gratuitous Distribution!

It is intended to circulate One Hundred Thousand Copies during the current year. In order to accomplish this purpose, we must rely upon the co-operation of our active sympathizers.

☞ Packages of these TRACTS, containing any desired number of copies, will be mailed to any address on receipt of enough money to defray postage, and whatever additional sums, large or small, the generosity of distributors may prompt them to add.

Of course, money will be needed to carry out our intentions; but we urge every one who believes that THIS TRACT WILL DO GOOD, and who is willing to distribute copies of it, to send in an order at once, even if unable to donate more than the simple postage and the time required for distribution. Do not hesitate because you cannot give more. We are convinced more than ever by the character and objects of the late Cincinnati Convention, that such plain speech as this TRACT contains is greatly needed at the present time. In the name of Christianity,

A most Dangerous Attempt is now Making to Subvert the Religious Liberties

of the American People; and the mighty magic of that name is still powerful over multitudes even of otherwise liberal minds. Let the world learn that the protest made against Christianity is not made by hatred of Goodness and of Truth, but rather by a love for these that can no longer be satisfied with shame. He woefully misjudges this Tract who thinks it has no higher aim than to "make a sensation." It was meant to tell needed truth so plainly that it must be heard. And it will be heard. All we ask is—give it a chance.

☞ Address your orders to THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice President.
P. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ASA K. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN CONE, " "
EDWARD BISSELL, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo, O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	" "	Fifteen "	1,500
C. CONE,	" "	" "	1,500
EDWARD BISSELL,	" "	" "	1,500
F. E. ABBOT,	" "	Forty "	4,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	" "	Ten "	1,000
GULDO MARK,	" "	" "	1,000
E. P. BASSETT,	" "	" "	1,000
H. E. HOWE,	" "	Three "	300
W. C. FISK,	" "	" "	300
J. M. RITCHIE,	" "	" "	300
V. KEEN,	" "	" "	300
ALANSON WOOD,	" "	" "	300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	" "	Five "	500
J. G. BOWMAN,	" "	One "	100
JOS. E. MARX,	" "	" "	100
C. ACHARD,	" "	" "	100
ASA K. BUTTS,	New York, N. Y.,	Thirty "	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport, R. I.,	Two "	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin, Pa.,	Five "	500
GEO. HODDLY,	Cincinnati, O.,	Two "	200
MISS A. HALL,	Defiance, O.,	One "	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Northampton, Mass.,	" "	100
J. SEDGWICK,	Tonica, Ill.,	" "	100
CARL POST,	Falmesville, O.,	" "	100
HENRY MILLER,	Monroe, Mich.,	Three "	300
L. R. SUTHERLAND,	Sacramento, Cal.,	Five "	500
J. L. WATSON,	Cincinnati, Mass.,	One "	100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Croydon, N. H.,	" "	100
J. E. BUTTON,	Olathe, Kan.,	" "	100
S. I. DUKKE,	" "	" "	100
J. M. RADLEY,	" "	" "	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence, Mass.,	Ten "	1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill, " "	Two "	200
JOS. F. BARNETT,	Boston, " "	" "	200
E. W. WEIR,	La Grange, Ind.,	" "	200
FRANK PRATHER,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
F. F. DIMMORE,	Wellsville, Kan.,	One "	100
J. T. DICKINSON,	New York, N. Y.,	Two "	200
W. J. POTTER,	Middlefield, Ct.,	Fourteen "	1,400
G. CLATTE,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
W. C. GANNETT,	Kendallville, Ind.,	" "	200
MISS M. C. PERKINS,	Boston, Mass.,	One "	100
MRS. S. EMERSON,	Dover, N. H.,	" "	100
MISS E. EMERSON,	" "	" "	100
W. H. DOWNES,	Birmingham, Ct.,	" "	100
B. B. SMITH,	Lansing, Mich.,	" "	100
B. B. SMITH,	Warren, Pa.,	" "	100
W. C. RUMBLE,	Asaca, N. Y.,	" "	100
WM. CLARKE,	Toledo, O.,	Three "	300
C. L. SMITH,	" "	One "	100
J. N. LYMAN,	" "	Twenty "	2,000
L. G. FELCH,	Cincinnati, " "	One "	100
A. FOLSON,	Monroe Centre, " "	" "	100
L. O. BASS,	Boston, Mass.,	Three "	300
S. E. SEWELL,	Colebrook, Conn.,	One "	100
ELIUD WRIGHT,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
R. B. WARD,	Detroit, Mich.,	Twenty "	2,000
A. D. WILE,	Dayton, O.,	One "	100
S. S. BOKER,	Kookuk, Iowa, "	" "	100
WM. JONES,	Peekskill, N. Y.,	" "	100
S. H. DAME,	Oskaloosa, Iowa, "	" "	100
J. H. YORK,	Dover, N. H.,	" "	100
JOS. HAYES,	" "	" "	100
G. P. FOLSON,	" "	" "	100
"A FRIEND,"	" "	" "	100
MRS. H. E. PERKINS,	" "	Two "	200
O. O. O.,"	Boston, Mass.,	One "	100
WILLIAM GREEN,	Orange, N. J.,	" "	100
"A FRIEND,"	Lowell, Mass.,	" "	100
D. B. STOKES,	Stratford, Conn.,	" "	100
MRS. F. W. CHRISTIAN,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	100
C. W. FARGOT,	Kelley's Island, O.,	Two "	200
EDW. M. DAVIS,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	One "	100
MRS. LUCRETIA MOTT,	" "	" "	100
MRS. M. A. WRIGHT,	Jersey City, N. J.,	" "	100
A. S. BROWN,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
EDWIN BROWN,	" "	" "	100
R. P. HALLOWELL,	Boston, " "	Five "	500
BENJ. RODMAN,	New Bedford, " "	Three "	300
H. B. CLARKE,	" "	" "	300
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo, O.,	Six "	600
M. L. HOLBROOK,	Houlton, Me.,	One "	100
W. B. BOUGHTON,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	" "	" "	100
E. G. BUNKETT,	Webster, Mass.,	Two "	200
J. E. FOLLETT,	Winona, Minn.,	One "	100
JOS. WARBASSE,	Newton, N. J.,	" "	100
T. M. LAMB,	Franklin, Pa.,	" "	100
W. H. DYRE,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
W. H. SPALDING,	Palmyra de Chion, Wis.,	" "	100
LOUIS BELMORE,	Duluth, Minn.,	" "	100
LEWIS KURTZ,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	Two "	200
SAM'L WARBASSE,	Angusta, Kau.,	One "	100
W. L. KATSE,	La Fayette, N. J.,	" "	100
W. EMERSON,	Amesbury, Mass.,	" "	100
H. H. HOBBS,	Boston, " "	" "	100
MISS I. THOMSON,	Dover, N. H.,	Two "	200
BENJ. HALLOWELL,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	One "	100
MRS. M. R. VAN RENSKLAER,	N. Y. City, " "	" "	100
R. B. STONE,	Aberdeen, Miss.,	" "	100
WM. ROTCH,	Fall River, Mass.,	Two "	200
MRS. J. WHITAKER,	New Bedford, " "	Five "	500
S. H. ROYCE,	Kerhonkson, N. Y.,	One "	100
MRS. R. D. FRANCIS,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	Two "	200
CHAS. BONNALL,	Salem, N. Y.,	One "	100
G. H. BRIGGS,	Salem, " "	" "	100
J. T. CLARKSON,	Amesbury, Mass.,	Two "	200
C. W. NEWTON,	Castleton, Ill.,	One "	100
HENRY KIK-T,	Toledo, O.,	Two "	200
OTTO KLEIN,	" "	One "	100
H. G. NEUBERT,	" "	Two "	200
A. HUNKET,	" "	One "	100
TOLEDO PRINTING CO.,	Detroit, Mich.,	Thirty "	3,000
T. K. PECK,	Co., Toledo, " "	Thirty "	3,000
	Westminster, Ct.,	Two "	200

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 29 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX.

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

NEW BOOKS BY MAIL!

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Bookseller and Publisher,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

Will send the following NEW BOOKS by mail on receipt of the publisher's price:

"LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF RELIGION," by Max Mueller.....$3.00
"RADICAL PROBLEMS," by Dr. C. A. Bartol.....$2.00
"THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH," by Louis Figuer,.....$1.75
"THE DEBATABLE LAND," by Robt. Dale Owen.....$2.00
"SHORT STUDIES ON GREAT SUBJECTS," (Second Series), by Froude.....$1.50
"THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST"—An Examination of Lidon's Bampton Lectures.....$2.00

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

ITS GOD, ITS BIBLE, INCARNATION, REGENERATION, IMMORTALITY, PROVIDENCE, MORAL INSPIRATIONS, AND LAWS.

THE first two of these Essays will appear in The Radical for APRIL.

M. D. CONWAY contributes to the same number—

"The Theist's Problem and Task,"

and JOHN W. CHADWICK—

"A STUDY OF VOLTAIRE."

This series of Essays by Mr. FROTHINGHAM are among the best of his writings, and furnish a very important feature in The Radical the present year, sketching as they do in the ablest manner the outlines of the New Radical Religion.

Now is the Time to Subscribe!

$3 a Year; Single Copies, 30 Cents.

Address THE RADICAL,
116:1f 25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $3.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 30 cents for a Specimen Number. 75:1f

JUNIOR UNMARRIED, or, THOMAS PAINE the author of the "Letters of Junius" and the "Declaration of Independence." DEMONSTRATION. Royal 16mo. pp. 324. Price, $1.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address JOHN GRAY & CO., P. O. Box 689, Washington, D. C. 113:2m

Back Numbers of the Index!

IT is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, none of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS A DOZEN!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, MARCH 23, 1872.

WHOLE No. 117.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonise it with the Bible. It recognises no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilised world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which had no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, J. VERA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWBURY (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.

P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

EXPLANATION.

It is with the greatest regret that we find it impossible to publish this week the tenth lecture in the Boston Horticultural Hall series, by Mr. Potter, on "The Positive Contents of Rationalism in Religion." The lecture was mailed in two parts, of which the first has failed to arrive; and there is ground for apprehension that it is lost. If it can be recovered, the whole lecture will be published as soon as possible. As this is the first disaster of the kind which has happened since THE INDEX was started, we shall hope for the generous indulgence of our readers.—EDITOR.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

The Doctrine of Jesus Concerning God.

A SERMON BY THE REV. CHARLES VOTSEY, PREACHED AT ST. JOHN'S HALL, LONDON, NOVEMBER 26, 1871.

"After this manner, therefore, pray ye: Our Father who art in Heaven, hallowed be thy name." MATTHEW, vi. 9.

We come now to the consideration of Jesus of Nazareth as a teacher of religion, and will endeavor to answer the question—"What did he teach about God?"

Once more I will repeat the caution respecting our regard for his authority. However much we may find ourselves in agreement with his teaching, we absolutely refuse to accept him or any other great teacher as our authority and guide. We form our religious belief for ourselves, just as he did, adopting or rejecting at pleasure the different views presented to us; and we are led by our own minds, consciences and hearts to embrace what seems to us the noblest and purest conception of what God is. But we have a double interest in pursuing this inquiry—on the one hand to discover the highest development of the old Hebrew monotheism as it presented itself in the teaching of the Nazarene, and on the other to contrast this pure and simple and cheering belief of his with the creed of Christendom.

It is astonishing to find how very little theology there is in the sayings of Jesus as recorded in the first three gospels. Excepting that baptismal formula at the end of Matthew, which it is most unlikely that Jesus ever uttered, we never find him speaking of God except as one individual Being. There is not the faintest allusion to any number of Persons in the Godhead, to any "Logos," or "Eternal Word," or "Eternal Son." On more than one occasion the Holy Spirit or Holy Ghost is alluded to. In Luke's version of the Sermon on the Mount, we find this term "Holy Spirit" taking the place of the "good things" recorded by Matthew.

He is recorded to have said something about casting out devils by the spirit of God, and on the same occasion to have said that blasphemy against the Holy Ghost was a sin which could never be forgiven. When and where this phrase "Holy Ghost" was first used and what it meant, it is impossible to say and useless to inquire. We only know that the pure monotheism of the Jew did not prevent the prophets and psalmists from using this term. The Spirit of God and the Holy Spirit are terms several times repeated in the Hebrew scriptures, and I do not think it will be questioned for a moment that on their lips these phrases were purely poetical and had no reference to a composite Godhead. Ask the Jews of today, who ought to know best what their own sacred books mean, and they will tell you invariably that this phrase was used to express the Divine action on the hearts of men. Desires after holiness, devotion to duty, strict integrity of heart and tongue, and the like, were all manifestations of a Divine influence which they spoke of under a metaphor singularly appropriate, namely the air, which was at once invisible and yet perceptible, life-sustaining and yet irresistible when in violent motion. None of the Jews ever dreamed that the Spirit of God was another God, nor ever intended to convey the idea that the two were really distinguishable. Had our Athanasian views about the Holy Ghost been familiar to Jesus, he could not possibly have ignored the Holy Ghost as an object of worship equal with the Father in his own prayers and in the prayers which he taught his followers to use. Moreover, what he is said to have said about the unpardonable sin of blasphemy against the Holy Ghost is capable of a rational explanation perfectly consistent with his belief in the absolute oneness of God; and at the same time is fatal to the Christian theory of his own equality with God. The Jews had been attributing his cure of diseases or "casting out devils" to the power of Beelzebub, whereupon he says it is an awful blasphemy to attribute a good work to an evil spirit; that if they liked to blaspheme him, they might do so with impunity, but it would be an offence never to be forgiven if they blasphemed the Holy Spirit by which all good works were performed. If therefore this text be claimed by Trinitarians as a proof of the personality of the Holy Ghost, it cuts the ground from under their feet as regards the co-equal Godhead of Jesus. And if the three Gods are only one God, how can one blaspheme the Holy Ghost without blaspheming the Son, and how can one blaspheme the Son without blaspheming the Holy Ghost?

Of theology proper there is indeed a scant supply in these Synoptic discourses. The most dogmatic speeches on record, which I shall proceed to quote, are in fatal contradiction to the Christian creeds. In Matthew, xix. 16, 17, we read: "And behold, one came and said unto him, 'Good master, what good thing shall I do that I may have eternal life?' And Jesus said unto him, 'Why callest thou me good? There is none good one, that is God. But if thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments.'" According to Orthodoxy, all the time Jesus was saying these words, he knew himself to be God Almighty; but we will leave any candid mind to say whether or not these words of Jesus could have taught the doctrine of his own Godhead to the humiliated inquirer. So far from it that he implied rebuke to the inquirer for having even called him good.

Surely, here was a chance for him to preach the articles of the Christian faith. A man who had led a blameless life and was struck by the moral excellence of Jesus wished to hear from his own lips the terms on which he could obtain eternal life. Instead of reciting to him the doctrines of the Athanasian creed, or of the Nicene creed, or even of the Apostles' Creed, instead of preaching to him the doctrines of the Atonement, or the Sacramental theory, Jesus denies his own share in Godhead altogether; he will own that "none is good save one, and that is God," and tells his friend,—"If thou wilt enter into life, keep the commandments."

The young man in his simplicity replies: "All these I have kept from my youth up; what lack I yet?" Now was the time to say to him,—"Ah, but you have not on the robe of imputed righteousness; your keeping the commandments has only been partial and up to the light you had. The first and great commandment is—Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved;" or in the words of John—"This is his commandment, that we should believe on the name of his only begotten son." You are trusting in your own righteousness and not depending on the perfect righteousness of Christ." Now would have been the moment to say to this earnest inquirer what has been preached for ages in some of the Christian churches as the pure gospel, and which is expressed with a horrible vigor in the following verses—

Nothing either great or small,
Nothing, sinner, no!
Jesus did it—did it all
Long, long ago.
Weary, working, burdened one,
Wherefore toil you so?
Cease your doing; ALL was done
Long, long ago.

Till to Jesus' work you cling
By a simple faith,
"Doing" is a deadly thing;
"Doing" ends in death.
Cast your deadly "doing" down,
Down at Jesus' feet;
Rise in him, in him alone
Gloriously complete!

Just compare these verses with that in the Sermon on the Mount: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of Heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven." Was there a word in the whole of this discourse of Jesus with the rich young man to justify such a doctrine as these verses contain? No, just at the turning-point in his life, as it were, when that young man was solemnly asking his road to heaven, Jesus, the so-called Founder of Christianity, makes answer: "If thou wilt be perfect, go and sell all that thou hast, and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven; and come and follow me."

I make no further comment on this reply, but to press home the unanswerable question—"What authority in these sayings of Jesus have the Christians for their doctrines?"

One more dogmatic discourse is worthy of our especial notice. You will find it in Mark, xii. 28, 29, 30:—"One of the scribes, perceiving that he answered well, asked him,—Which is the first commandment of all?" And Jesus answered him [not by the words of the Decalogue, but by quotation from Deuteronomy],—"The first of all the commandments is, Hear O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord, and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength. This is the first commandment, and the second is like unto it, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. There is none other commandment greater than these." Now if Jesus spoke these words (and the churches teach us to believe that he did), what insolence it is for them to claim on the authority of Jesus our acceptance of the Athanasian creed, which says—"Whosoever will be saved, before all things it is necessary that he should hold the Catholic faith, which faith except a man keep whole and undefiled, without doubt he shall perish everlastingly." How dare they, in Christ's name, place not only on a level with, but above the two great commands the necessity for Baptism, sacramental grace, a belief in the Trinity, Incarnation and Atonement, Justification by faith and the repudiation of good works as being not pleasing to God, if done before justification or without the grace of Christ (whatever that may mean) and as having without doubt the nature of sin. They blame us for discarding the authority of the New Testament, yet they practically discard it whenever they please, while professing to submit to its every letter.

Had only the teachings of Jesus come down to us, we should never have heard a word about Christian doctrines—never a word about the "original righteousness" of Adam—never a word about his fall, nor a word about the original sin which all his posterity have inherited—never a word about God's immutable curse, nor of our redemption from it by Jesus' death. Those ill-starred words—"He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned,"—once attributed to Jesus, have, alas for Orthodoxy! been condemned by the critics as having formed no portion whatever of the oldest extant MSS. Even that slender prop has been snatched away, and the poor old fabric of Orthodoxy is tottering to its fall.

So far we have failed to discover anything in the sayings of Jesus to justify even one of the great doctrines of Christianity. We will now turn to those frequently repeated expressions about God which reveal to us his own religious feeling and belief, and which are only consistent with the purest monotheism.

A few of his parables, such as that of the lost sheep, the lost piece of money, and the lost son, and the Sermon on the Mount, are the most prominent among the religious discourses of Jesus. And from these we can draw but one inference, namely, that Jesus himself was deeply imbued with the true filial spirit towards God. God was more to him than mere Jehovah. The phrase, "God of hosts," translated by one of our Bishops into "God of battles," as far as we know, never fell from the lips of Jesus. Nothing that could cast a shadow over the infinite tenderness and friendliness of God entered into his conceptions of Deity. The name which above all others he loved to use, in speaking of God to men and in addressing God in his own prayers down to his latest breath, was "Father." I am speaking now more especially in reference to the Sermon on the Mount and the three parables alluded to. I do not deny that among other recorded sayings and discourses this image is clouded over and disguised by threats of eternal vengeance and by traces of partiality, which is only another name for injustice. But the whole tone of the passages under consideration is so unmistakably tender and lofty as to leave upon the mind the most exalted conception of God's friendliness and fatherliness that we have hitherto heard of. Even if he said those other things, this at least was his best, his highest mood.

We must remember that he had around him a multitude variously composed, from Galilee, Decapolis, Jerusalem, Judaea and from beyond Jordan, and that he addressed these various peoples all in the same strain, without marking any distinction between Jew and Gentile. Every reader of the Bible will remember how to this mixed multitude he kept on repeating the phrase—"Your heavenly Father," and reminding them at every turn that they were all God's children and unspeakably dear to their Father in heaven. To the perfidious Pharisee who paraded his religious observances he says: "When thou prayest, enter into thy closet, and when thou hast shut thy door, pray to thy Father in secret, and thy Father who seeth in secret shall reward thee openly." To the anxious hoarder of riches and to the care-worn poor he says: "Take no thought for the morrow. Take no thought for your life, saying—what shall we eat? or what shall we drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed?" For your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things." To those who doubt the friendliness of God he says: "What man is there among you whom if his son ask bread, will he give him a stone?" "If ye, then, being evil, [i. e. taking them at their word,] if ye, then, being evil, know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more will your heavenly Father give good things to them that ask him?"

Whatever be the wisdom or the reason of these sayings, they indicate that Jesus represented God to that mixed multitude as a kind and tender Father, accessible to all alike, evil or good, Pharisee or publican, Jew or Gentile, and enforced the return of good for evil in these words—"Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, that ye may be the children of your Father who is in heaven; for he maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust." He spoke as one who himself had learned in the discipline of life the exceeding preciousness of the heavenly Father's care,—who had seen in him everything to love and to trust to, every promise of hope for the future.

In the three parables named, we find the most pure and simple gospel which has ever been preached to men who were suffering either from excessive self-reproach or from the infamous threats which priests had uttered to terrify their slaves. Is a soul lost? Then God will never rest till it is regained. Why, even the shepherd would leave a whole flock in the wilderness to seek and to save the one sheep which had gone astray. Even the thrifty housewife will not rest till she has found the coin which rolled so perversely out of sight. Will God, then, lose a single soul that has wandered from the right way? Is not the love of the Father in heaven for his erring child something greater than that of the shepherd for his sheep, or of the poor woman for her bit of money? But this is not all. The lesson has yet to be brought home through the highest affections which belong to humanity, and so Jesus tells the story of the lost son—the son not lost by accident, but by his own waywardness, self-indulgence, degraded habits, whom his earthly father never forgets, never ceases to love, and will welcome with fondest embraces, should he ever return trusting to the old tie of natural affection. He lets his son depart, foreseeing all his debasement, and waiting sadly and patiently for the evil to work its own cure. When the day comes for repentance, the son retraces his steps. Before he can get near his old home, he rushes into his father's arms; before he can speak a word of his confession, his lips are sealed by his father's kisses, and instead of justly earned reproaches the prodigal hears nothing but the utterances of his father's joy—"It is meet that we should make merry and be glad, for this my son was dead and is alive; was lost, but is found." How it was that he did not first sacrifice on an altar the eldest son who had never done anything wrong, is for orthodox Christians to explain. I only say that, as far as I understand it, this parable is the Gospel—the only view of God worthy of the same of "God's spell," or God's message. For it is the word of love and forgiveness which he speaks through every human heart, that God is indeed a Father, not only to the good, but also to the evil.

Can we wonder, then, that, if this was the tone of Jesus in speaking of God, he should have taught all men to pray as their first prayer—"Our Father, which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name?" If there be a God at all to whom we owe all the finer feelings of our nature, and our instinctive aspirations after goodness, and our greatest and most unselfish affection, then the only name we can give to that God is the name of Father, "Father in heaven," to express our confession of the naked poverty of our highest conceptions and of our feeble language to express the whole truth. But still "Father," because it is the highest title—the name which is above every name—the expression at once of all that is just, impartial, constant, unwearied, self-sacrificing, tender and loving.

I cannot pray this simple prayer, I cannot utter this brief but comprehensive Te Deum without all my antagonism, being excited, and my indignation roused against the Christian doctrines beneath which it has been so long buried. The words, it is true, are still babbled in Christian churches; but they are denied, trampled on, and defamed by the various schemes of redemption and doctrines of atonement which have invaded the sanctuary. The more angry that men are because I will not call Jesus Lord, Lord, because I will persist in showing that he was only a man like ourselves, the more it delights me to show that these discourses and parables of his which no tampering or artifice can ever put out of sight, prove him to have been no Christian at all, but a Theist, a Jewish Theist, and that he learned his pure monotheism from his mother's lips, and from the Hebrew scriptures; and that because he believed in earnest what others around him only said they believed, and acted out kindness, instead of only talking about it, he grew up to know that God was in very truth the common Father of all mankind, and would act a father's part towards every child of man.

I would conclude this morning by calling your attention to a very powerful attack made upon the "Christian Evidence Society" by Thomas Scott, Esq., of Ramsgate, not only published, but written by him. The pamphlet is entitled—"The Tactics and Defeat of the Christian Evidence Society;" and I earnestly recommend my hearers to read it themselves and to get as many as possible of their Orthodox friends to read it too.

I will close with a short extract from the work itself [pp. 8-9]:—

"The so-called 'Infidel' may turn round on the self-styled Christian advocate and say, 'I am a truer Christian than you are. I have really a Gospel to preach to you and to all men, the very Gospel which Christ preached. I believe that all things are the work of an Eternal Mind or Spirit, to which my mind or spirit stands in a definite relation. I believe that this Eternal Mind or Spirit is absolutely just, true, and loving; and I cling to all the consequences which are involved in this conviction. I believe that, as life will be to bring us to our highest good, in other words to bring our mind into perfect conformity with his Divine Mind, so also life has the power to do this: that this Power and Will are bringing about the perfect vindication of his justice, and that his justice and mercy are synonymous terms. I hold that, whatever be the origin or descent of man, God has never been absent from any of his creatures; that from the first dawnings of his sense He has been educating and training men, by a long process indeed and a painful one, through the indefinite series of ages, until they have reached their present state, and that He will continue his work in the long series of ages yet to come. I believe that because we live in this now, we shall continue so to live after we have undergone the change which we call death; that the denial of this cuts at the root of all love; for what is the meaning of growth in the knowledge of God, what is the meaning of patience, forbearance, truthfulness, unselfishness, if the wheels of a steam engine may and all my concern with them at any moment, or if I may escape from my duty by throwing myself into the sea? I need not go further. I have said enough to show you that I am not an Infidel, and, as I think, to show you that my faith is vastly higher, and is far more nearly and really the faith of Christ, than is yours."

PAINT.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

The two essays of my esteemed friend R. P. Halliwell, on "The Grounds of Faith in Democracy" (February 17th), and "The Higher Law" (February 24th), contain much with which I sympathize, and also contain not a little that somewhat astonishes me. As an example of the latter may be mentioned his cheerful statement that American democracy is based on the idea of the divine in man,—superior therefore to criticism. On reading this, I could but exclaim,—How long that old, old story lasts! How many times, and through what a succession of ages, has it been a little patched up, and passed off for new! From time immemorial every kind of social institution has been supposititiously invested with a divine sanction. Each and every one of them has been announced as based on the idea of God in man, or God with man, or somewhat of the sort. Here it is God in a particular family, endowing it with authority without regard to character and quality; there it is God in a special class, an entailed priesthood or hereditary aristocracy, again without respect to character; elsewhere it is God in all and sundry, still with the same dogged indifference to personal worth and functional use. Occasionally a resolute eye looks hard at the institution so complimented, to see what it really is in act and effect, and how mingled of true and false principles, just and unjust practices. Straightway the devotees, interested and disinterested, rush forward to plaster and paint it over with the name of God, thus protecting it against the approach of criticism. My friend plays his part in this pretty game, and does it with exceeding good countenance. Those of his kith and kin who have somewhat lost faith in their own trick might with profit sit at his feet, and learn their art anew.

I admire the gravity and sense of sincerity with which he adapts and adopts the old story, because while listening to him I am entertained with a contrasting picture, which arises before my mind, as if in some way it related to my friend. It is the picture of a man in a state of habitual protest against the actual character, conduct and effects of American politics,—a man who has never been able to vote for an American President, never to approve of any administration, never to think well of any Congress as a whole, never to repose faith, or other than a feeble, intermittent faith, in any large political party,—a man, to say all in brief, who has uniformly given prompt and grateful welcome to Wendell Phillips' most terrible denunciations of American politics and politicians. Of course, this man, if there be such, cannot be the same with my friend, whom we saw just now busily swinging his censur under the nose of "divine" American democracy! No, no, quite impossible! He is not the man to "strew sugar on bottled spiders," as Emerson has it. He would never paint over just what he detests and denounces with the colors of that which he chiefly reveres. But, to be wicked, let us suppose that the man who exalts and glorifies American democracy as "divine" is the same one who has an habitually low opinion of American politics, the actual embodiment and outcome of that democracy. Would this be an extraordinary and inexplicable case?

Inexplicable, or not easily explicable, it might be; extraordinary it were not; on the contrary, nothing is more frequent than such a posture of mind,—while it is equally true that nothing else known in this world does so much to protect abuses and prevent amelioration. A pure-minded, devoted Catholic, of more than common penetration, sees the profligacy of Catholic communities, the worldliness and self-seeking of anointed officials, the practical infidelity of communicants, the secret corruption that cannot be wholly concealed, the moral decay that nothing serves to arrest; and daily, hourly, on his knees, with sighing and tears, he cries, "Oh Lord, how long?" But breathe one syllable of reproach against the Church,—how he leaps to his feet, and confronts the accuser! "Peace, profane tongue! The Church is holy, spotless as God himself; for behold, it is God with man, God visible on the earth." Verily, verily! Catholics may be base, Catholicism spotted, but the Church is without spot or wrinkle or any such thing!

What, now, to the profane mind is this Church? Simply a subjective imagination, simply an ideal spuriously imputed to an actual organization. The effect is that Catholicism may rot under him and over him, and tumble in foul rottenness upon him, and he will never be able to discover why it does so,—because, with that subjective imagination always in his eyes, he can never bring himself to inquire in a realistic spirit what the actual principles of Catholicism are. Now there are persons, and a good many of them, in our day who have a Church called Democracy, which they deify in precisely the same way, and to which in the same way they impute all the fine things they are able to imagine. In the same way, too, they cover and consecrate with it a certain actual condition, a certain social machinery, but without permitting it for a moment, nor in the faintest degree, to become responsible for the evils of that condition or the ill operation of that mechanism. Their faith in their Church soars above all touch or test of experience; if the facts do not sustain it, so much the worse for the facts. Democracy enfranchises a crowd of ignorant and inbred men, who make cess-pools of cities, and convert all the means of sustaining civilization into a means of corrupting it; who can be so blind as not to see that this is the fault of the voter, and not at all of divine Democracy? Our Holy Church is perfect; "the people" is made up of the "divine character of human nature" pure and simple; but individuals, A, B, C, and so on to the end of the alphabet, are in fault; and this, you must see, is the sole cause of all the evils we are troubled with, just as all the evils of Catholic societies are due to the personal fault of Catholics, and not at all to the Church.

Well, I do not see it. I have no divine political Church, called Democracy or whatever else, wherewith to disguise the plain facts. To me American democracy,—as distinguished from abstract or theoretic democracy—is one and the same fact with the actual political organization and action of this nation. What is the real character of this I endeavor to learn, not by any "faith," be it faith in "the divine character of human nature" or in the depravity of the same, but by vigilant, unbiased observation. So much of the "divine in man" as gets through the caucus machinery, the ballot-box, &c., getting at last into fruitful action through that medium, I gladly recognize and gratefully acknowledge; so much of the undivine in man as runs through the same channels I esteem it a duty to take equal note of; and to my mind the one and the other are in the same sense the outcome of "American democracy." I have not hitherto discovered in our average politics any conspicuous manifestation of the "divine in man." My friend, of course, does discover it with the eye of that "faith" in which he is so overwhelmingly rich; but to me it is not apparent. On the contrary it appears that the political climate here is a rather notably bad one for the said "divine in man."

The time is sure to come in America when good men will not think it a suitable thing to disguise the facts they do not like to face with "faith" and a paint of fine words. I do not object to my friend's "divine in man" or "divine character of human nature," though preferring myself to speak very modestly of such matters,—in speaking of which there is always a peril of cant; but I do and must object to his giving an enormous, factitious extension to such truth as those phrases may suggest, stretching it vastly, ludicrously beyond the measure of his own real belief, that he may thus cover a particular method in politics with some show of divine sanction. He knows that there are tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands, of voters in the United States, so undeveloped in mind and so inhumanly ignorant, as to be incapable of forming any judgment whatsoever, valuable or valueless, upon the subject matter of our politics; and he knows that men who act with large effect upon important matters of which they know nothing, act at hazard, and escape doing great mischief by mere chance, if they escape it at all. He knows that there are many voters who are morally incapable of choosing a true welfare, but distinctly prefer debased conditions,—such voters (outvoted for once only by a desperate effort) as not long ago supported known robbers for office in New York. He knows that the influence of such voters upon our politics is deleterious, and has wrought us immense mischief already. He knows that his "divine character of human nature" does not prevent the existence of such facts, and therefore that no man does an injustice to human nature by recognizing them, considering them, and trying to learn what is the true line of duty in view of them. Nevertheless he chooses to cover them with the mantle of an imaginary "divine" democracy, and to reproach him who strips off the disguise with defect of "faith." Well, Heaven grant I may be defective in that style of "faith!" "Faith" opposed to FACT is an article of which there has been quite too much in this world.

D. A. W.

CAUSATION IN MORALS.

DETROIT, Jan. 18, 1873.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

In the second count of your indictment of Christianity, published in THE INDEX of Jan. 6th, you impeach it because "it appeals to hope and fear as the supreme motives of human conduct"—Heaven being the reward of obedience, Hell the punishment of disobedience. This doctrine you treat as essentially an error. It has long seemed to me that, although subject to gross misapplication, it contained a suggestion of the truth.

1. Your position, as stated in this count, and often stated elsewhere and at other times in THE INDEX, is that morality "commands the right because it is right, and forbids the wrong because it is wrong, regardless alike of punishment and reward."

In every popular sense this beyond question states the view of all true souls. It must be a very mean one that deliberates on the question and is determined in his action by the reward or punishment that may follow. Yet, though he be ever so high and pure, is he not determined by the reward or punishment then present, without deliberation, and whether he will or no?

2. Morality does not command the impossible. Is the fact that the thing to be done is right a possible cause for doing it? The rightness of every right thing must be due to its relation to other things, man included. The reason that the true man does the right thing is because he feels this relationship. This consciousness, this feeling, or whatever it may be called, outweighs all considerations of policy or expediency—is a present possession—a beatitude—a glory. Yet it is also the best policy and the highest expediency; and no matter how far away from the actor may be every thought that we would call selfish, the fact remains that the transaction viewed from the side of economy pays, and this fact explains the philosophy of the whole movement, which without it would be beyond explanation.

3. If no inducements exist for doing right, how does the right get done? If they do exist, should we not consider them? And is not the very essence of morality involved in this question?

4. To say—"Do right because it is right"—is well, because the admonition—"Do right"—is well; but the "because it is right," while perfectly well understood as expressing the highest reason, really expresses (as a matter of logical accuracy) no reason at all. If right is done, it must be because the man doing it loves right. The moment this is admitted, we perceive a cause for the act. It becomes interestedness, only immensely exalted, differing from so-called selfish acts in degree, not in essence.

5. In the third paragraph of your second count you accuse Christianity of teaching "that the law of cause and effect does not hold in the moral world." While I think the accusation just, your own view as quoted at the beginning of this letter is (if I understand you) subject to the same criticism. For no act can be disinterested (save in the popular sense of the word), if linked in the chain of cause and effect. Neither are we within it when describing right as done because right. We must get at some cause connecting the act with the man. Right may be a fact, and a very important one, in the case; but, I submit, it is not and cannot be the cause.

I feel so fully the solemn earnestness and courage of your "Impeachment," and agree so generally with its positions, that I cannot forbear picking out what seems to me a logical defect in the otherwise solid timber of your article. To my mind you occupy, in this one position which I call a defect, ground that should be given over wholly to the opposition.

L. T. I.

[A special apology is due to the author of the above highly thoughtful letter for the long delay in its publication. We have been obliged to reserve it till a fit opportunity should occur of presenting it with the reply to which it is entitled.]

1. The position of our friend, as indicated in the italicized question at the close of the section which we have taken the liberty of numbering as 1, is that man is absolutely determined in his moral volitions by present motives; and that no "freedom of the will" exists, in any sense incompatible with this principle.

Our own position is that, while man never acts morally in the absence of all motives, he exercises real choice in deciding which motive he will obey; and that it is impossible to say that he always obeys the "strongest motive," unless that is defined to be the "strongest motive" which he actually obeys. This definition, however, involves a flagrant begging of the whole question. To assert that man always acts from the strongest motive, and then to define the strongest motive as that from which he acts, is to fall into a vicious circle. First let some universal and invariable criterion be established for determining the relative strength of motives; and then we shall be in a condition to decide whether man practically obeys in all cases the strongest of them. Until this criterion is found, we venture to think that the Necessarian theory cannot be proved.

2. "Morality does not command the impossible." Most certainly not. Does our friend admit that it commands the possible? If so, he is bound to explain this command. We hold that the admission of any command at all is the surrender of the theory he advocates; for it presupposes the very freedom of choice that he denies. One never commands an effect to follow a cause; it must follow. If moral volitions are effects of necessary causes, there is no more room for "commands" in morals than in mechanics. One might as well command water to flow down hill, as address a command to a man whose actions are all determined. The theory of determinism involves logically an absolute negation of the "categorical imperative."

Further, it is of no theoretical consequence whether a transaction "pays" or not. The conception of "policy" or "expediency" involves the admission of freedom just as much as the conception of virtue. If a man is "determined" to a certain course, he must follow it, right or wrong, pay or no pay. If the course "pays," he is in luck; if not, not. That is all that can be said. We want our friend to perceive that his theory cuts away all conception, not only of moral "commands," but of "policy" also. It is not an ethical theory in any sense; for ethics absolutely rests on the idea of human freedom.

3. We never held that "no inducements exist for doing right." But we hold that they are inducements, and not compulsions. It is the theory of freedom alone that can recognize inducements; the theory of determinism recognizes only compulsions. That is, the cause compels the effect; and if motives are causes, they compel actions. There is no escaping this conclusion.

4. The saying—"Do right because it is right"—receives but scant justice at our friend's hands. Substantially it means this:—"Do right because you perceive the obligation to do it. Whether the right will pay or not, and whether you love it or not, and whether you do it or not, the obligation to do it abides, and ought to be obeyed." The disputed saying is a recognition of the natural and absolute obligation to do right from the simple perception of it as right. The perception involves the obligation; and the fact that a man has no regard for the right does not release him from the obligation to do it. There have been men in this world who have performed great acts of virtue from the simple sense of obligation, while they felt and knew that they were blighting all their happiness in life. Such (to take an illustration from legend) was the act of Virginus in slaying his daughter to rescue her from an enforced life of shame. We regard simple moral perception of an obligation as the highest reason for discharging it; and we hold that virtue consists in freely obeying this highest reason for action, to the neglect of all lower considerations. This, we believe, is the substance and spirit of the saying in question.

5. The argument here is that every moral volition is a link in the great chain of cause and effect; and that the theory of freedom, by removing moral volitions from this chain, violates the universality of the law of causation.

It is true that we except moral volition from the category of effects, and hold that man, within very narrow limits, is a free first cause. We do not disguise the truth that our philosophical instinct would be better pleased if there were no necessity for any such exception; and we reluctantly make it because the spirit of science requires that we adapt our philosophy to facts rather than facts to our philosophy. If any adherent of the Necessarian school of thought can fully recognize all the facts of ethics, and reconcile them with the denial of human freedom, we shall be only too glad to simplify our philosophy by getting rid of a stubborn anomaly in Nature. But our friend will pardon us for saying that, of the two extremes of Freedom and Fatalism (the only logical alternatives in morals), he seems to reject one and not to accept the other. We cannot follow him in this. And we must hold the ground we occupy, until he or some other shall squarely face the difficulties we urge, and answer them. These difficulties are more fully presented in the first volume of THE INDEX, which contains some very able articles on this subject by our correspondent; and there is no attempt made in the above letter to meet them. So we seem to shoot past each other, like railway trains going in opposite directions on parallel tracks.—ED.]

There is brevity and abrupt precision in Dante. One suiting word, and then there is silence—nothing more said. His silence is more eloquent than words.—Carlyle.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the ODEON, in the new SPRING BUILDING on St. Clair Street, opposite the WINKLER OFFICE HOUSE, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending March 17th.—H. Lockwood, 10 cts.; Dr. C. H. Horch, $3.30; J. P. Barrett, $3; C. A. W. Crosby, $1; J. C. Chatterton, $2; D. Sandman, 50 cts.; M. J. Wilcoxson, 20 cts.; Dr. E. F. Hurd, 10 cts.; Chas. A. Schofield, $1; A. S. Case, $1; Samuel Weeks, 10 cts.; H. L. Green, $2; Valentine Ludwig, $2 $1; J. P. Woodward, $3; L. Green, $1; Dr. C. W. Filmore, 25 cts.; Chas. W. Buck, $3; A. G. Lawton, 25 cts.; Martin Cheney, 25 cts.; Walter F. Johnson, $2; J. M. Ozier, 50 cts.; J. P. Knowles, $2; Milton Bentley, $4.50; J. H. Main, 10 cts.; Isaac Ames, $3; T. W. Higginson, 75 cts.; H. L. Green, $1.25; F. Parson, 50 cts.; H. L. Green, $2.50; G. W. Farclot, $25; Thos. Follock, $2.00; J. A. Simons, $1.00; Sanford B. King, $1; W. Todd, $4; J. C. Allen, 40 cts.; E. W. Fosdick, $1.10; G. H. Snelling, $2; Wm. Chestnut, 25 cts.; Hugo Andriessen, $1; C. A. Garley, $5; Jas. Gordon, 25 cts.; Rev. Dr. Kohler, 50 cts.; Henry Pearson, $1; Geo. H. Holzman, $2; J. W. Cogswell, 25 cts.; Benj. E. Hopkins, 50 cts.; W. C. Ewing, 50 cts.; S. Van Noorden, $2; J. W. Pike, 50 cts.; Walter F. Johnson, $2; Rachel Conard, $2; Gerrit Smil, $4; W. E. Darwin, 25 cts.; G. G. Briggs, $2; Clara P. Sheldon, 25 cts.; H. S. Mowry, 10 cts.; J. D. Zimmerman, $5; F. O. Sands, $1; M. M. Sherman, $4; J. T. Thornton, $1; Wm. Richmond, $1; J. G. Kinley, $1.50; Walter O. Wright, 50 cts.; Henry Edgar, 25 cts.; Henry Rice, 10 cts.; Chas. J. Hider, $1; Jas. M. Mercer, $1; J. Winslow, $2.50; Thos. F. C. Petrosch, $2; Milton Bentley, $1.50; David A. Wasson, $2.50; S. H. Emery, Jr., 10 cts.; Ira Smedes, 10 cts.; Alfred Taylor, 10 cts.; Wm. H. Franklin, 10 cts.; Jeremiah Brockway, 25 cts.; J. S. Thompson, 25 cts.; R. H. Carothers, 25 cts.; Wm. Smith, $2; Frank Treat, $2; H. K. Oliver, Jr., $2; W. R. Emerson, $2; T. S. La France, $1; L. H. Waters, $2.50; Cyrus Wick, 10 cts.; Alex. Fullerton, 25 cts.; H. E. Howe, $2; H. E. Howe, $1.50.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittance acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

RECEIVED.

ON RELIGION. By a Former Elder in a Scotch Church. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. pp. 24.

THE CHURCH AND THE CITIZEN. By EDWARD MAITLAND. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. 1873. pp. 13.

TENDENCIES OF MODERN RELIGIOUS THOUGHT. By the late Rev. JAMES GRANTBROOK, Edinburgh. Published by THOMAS SCOTT, Mount Pleasant, Ramsgate. pp. 18.

SUNDAY NOT THE SABBATH. All Days alike Holy. A Controversy between the Rev. Dr. SUNDBELL, Wm. HENRY BURN, and others. Washington: Sold by W. H. & O. H. MORRISON, Booksellers, No. 475 Pennsylvania Avenue. 1873. pp. 48.

MEDIUMS AND MEDIUMSHIP. By THOMAS R. HAZARD. Boston, Mass.: 1874. pp. 61.

BLASPHEMY: Where are the Blasphemers—the Orthodox Christians or Spiritualists? By THOMAS R. HAZARD. Boston: WILLIAM WHITE & CO. 1873. pp. 65.

THE CORNELL UNIVERSITY REGISTER. 1871-1873. Ithaca: At the University Press, 1874. pp. 149.

MONTHLY REPORT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR February, 1873. Washington: GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE. 1873.

SPEECH OF HON. H. C. BROCKMEYER, delivered in the Senate of Missouri, February 8, 1873, upon the Bill to Repeal the Usury Law, &c. 1873.

DER FREIENRECHER. Monatschrift fuer Volksaufklärung, Religion, Wissenschaft und Kunst. Februar, 1873. Herausgegeben von Dr. FR. LEISS. New York: OFFICE, No. 57 Broadway.

THE RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW. March, 1873. Rev. JOHN H. MORRISON, D.D., Editor. Boston: LEONARD C. BOWLER, Proprietor, No. 36 Bromfield St.

THE LADIES' OWN MAGAZINE. February, 1873. Mrs. M. CORA BLAND, Editor and Proprietor. Indianapolis, Indiana: $1.50 a Year.

SINNERS IN THE HANDS OF AN ANGRY GOD. By the Rev. PRESIDENT EDWARDS. Philadelphia: PRESBYTERIAN BOARD OF PUBLICATION, No. 121 Chestnut Street. pp. 16.

THE ALDINE. March, 1873. JAMES SUTTON & CO., 22 Liberty St., New York. $5.00 a year.

OLD AND NEW. March, 1873. Published Monthly. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 143 Washington St.

THE JOURNAL OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY. January, 1873. St. Louis: E. P. GRAY.

THE DICTATOR REFORMER AND VICTORIAN MESSENGER. January, 1873. London: F. PITMAN, Paternoster Row.

WOOD'S HOUSEHOLD MAGAZINE. March, 1873. S. C. WOOD & COMPANY, Newburgh, N. Y.

THE INDUSTRIAL. February, 1873. Richmond, Ind.: ISAAC KINLEY, Editor and Proprietor.

THE LITTLE CORAL. February, 1873. JOHN MILLER, 84 West Randolph St., Chicago.

THE SONG MESSENGER. February, 1873. Root & Cady, Chicago.

MORALS AND LAW.

A correspondent of THE INDEX in a recent number assumes that I desire to establish "a legal standard of morals." Nothing is further from my thought; but my theory of government does involve a moral standard of law. I do maintain that all legislation must be based upon the most enlightened interpretation of God's law that is attainable. Statute law may and should close houses of assignation, for they are an offence to social order and social welfare; and when any one publicly asserts that she has a natural or an acquired right to frequent such places, and openly or secretly to live as is thereby implied, her known purity of life may save her from suspicion, but it aggravates the insult she offers to public decency and the injury she inflicts upon public morals.

R. F. H.

AN ENGLISH VIEW OF THE SITUATION.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—Your noble protest against the Resolutions of the "Cincinnati Convention" leads me to say a few words on the great question which is now agitating your country.

Were there no other objection in the world to the proposed change in the Constitution of the United States, one alone would suffice to condemn it utterly, namely, the ambiguity of the term "Christianity."

In the second Resolution, we find the States spoken of as a "nation settled by Christians, with Christian laws and usages, and with Christianity as its greatest social force;" and the State is called upon "to acknowledge itself, in its written Constitution, to be a Christian nation."

Now this is either the result of fraudulent design on the part of the promoters, or it is the result of blindness and ignorance. The former may be dismissed at once as impossible on the part of men of whom you yourself speak with so much respect. The latter I will show to be the real origin of the blunder.

Let those excellent men summon a conference at which every so called Christian church and sect in the land may be represented by its own delegate; let these delegates meet and confer among themselves with the sole object of defining the term "Christian" and "Christianity," so that the nation at large may know beforehand what they are going in for. Imagine such a fold of lambs grouped together for this purpose, and then, Sir, let me ask you, what manner of bleating would greet your ears if you were privileged to listen to their debate?

The decision could not even resolve itself into the opinion of a majority as against that of a minority. Hardly ten in every hundred would agree sufficiently to form a coalition against the remainder. Owing to a tacit but most powerful conviction of some magical virtue in the names of Christ and Christianity, each one would be certain that he himself and the sect to which he belonged were the best Christians and the truest followers of Christ.

It is a fact that defies contradiction that agreement in the definition of the term Christianity would be hopelessly impossible.

From the Romanist who believes most (in quantity) and whose dogmas are most sharply defined, to the Unitarian who claims to be Christian because he has no dogmas and puts works in the place of faith, you would have such a diversity of opinion that, at the end of the debate, the question which it was intended to solve would be left untouched.

Imagine, then, what an army of dragons' teeth would be sown by incorporating these terms into the Constitution! Rival sects would then never be without a bone of fierce contention, and all the time of your legislators would be occupied in keeping the "Christians" from flying at each others' throats.

For my part, I have long since forsaken the name of "Christian" as in any sense expressing my views, or as in any way a term of honor. It has either no fixed meaning, or it is a term of reproach as expressing mingled superstition and uncharitableness. I would ten times rather be called a Jew, as Jesus was, for I am quite as little of a Christian in my beliefs as he.

Will America condescend to take up and put on our cast-off clothes? We, in England, are much nearer to the repudiation of the Christian name than fanatics dream. Underlying all society, the mass of incoherent beliefs which pass by the name of Christianity is simply despised. The outward compliance with custom and the exigencies of ordinary intercourse render all speech upon this topic very gentle and cautious; but, at the core of their hearts, Englishmen are no longer Christians, and they only wait for the turn of the tide that they may say so openly in their clubs and markets.

We are on the eve of either disestablishing the Church—or separating Church and State—or else of disestablishing the dogmas so as to leave all opinions alike unimposed and unprotected. Will America, of all countries in the world, make a retrograde step, and try again what the old country has tried for centuries and found to be almost an unmitigated curse? I cannot believe this. Such a step would be ominous of your coming downfall.

"Quem Deus vult perdere prius dementat."

There is nothing in the Christianities of the world worth keeping but what belongs to the region of Natural Religion, and which, therefore, will thrive all the better for being set free from dogmas which overlay it.

Here is your Trinity, Incarnation, stonement, justification, salvation by faith, everlasting hell and a psalm-singing heaven, bribes, threats, corruption of motives by rewards for doing nothing and by punishments for not believing everything, sacramental grace, priestcraft, absolution, confession, prostration of mind before authorities living or dead, worship of texts and general councils—a pretty list, in truth, of things essentially Christian, not one of which but has been a hindrance to human virtue, and a cloud between the soul of man and his Maker.

Call me "anti-Christ" for my repudiation of these dogmas, and I accept the title without hesitation or shame. So scornfully do I treat apostolic threats, that I add to this an assurance of my perfect readiness to take all the risk of the horrors they have predicted for those who, like myself, have escaped the slavery of credulity.

I need not tell you how we have welcomed here your "Impeachment of Christianity." Mr. Scott is doing us all right good service by reprinting it. THE INDEX is much admired by those to whom I have shown it, and I expect before long you will have to send me twice as many copies as I now dispose of.

I am very faithfully yours,

CHARLES VOTSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E.,
February 24, 1872.

RELIGIOUS PARTIZANSHIP.

"The Divine law as uttered in the thunders of Sinai, as re-enacted by our Savior, attaches inviolate sacredness to those rights of property which lie at the basis of our social order, civilization and progress. This law I have to the best of my ability endeavored to interpret in its application to the great issues which may demand your serious consideration as the chosen trustees of right, justice and equity. Heaven grant that you acquit yourselves as 'able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness.'"

The extract quoted above is the concluding paragraph of the report of the Election Sermon on the Rights of Property preached before the Legislature of Massachusetts by Dr. Andrew P. Peabody, of Cambridge. We shall not now criticise either the political economy or the politics of the sermon. We only wish to call attention to this extract as showing the warping of the intellectual judgment by the acceptance of an authoritative creed. Dr. Peabody has the name of being a thorough scholar, a profound thinker and an honest man. But who could read the record of Jesus' sayings with unprejudiced mind and find in them authority for the accumulation of large capital in the hands of individuals? The community of goods which Dr. Peabody deprecates was the early practice of the apostles who were the direct representatives of their master; and certainly no great encouragement for accumulation of wealth can be found in the familiar texts, "How hardly shall the rich man enter into the kingdom of heaven!" "Sell all thou hast and give to the poor." "If a man use thee at the law and take thy coat, give him thy cloak also." "Take no thought for the morrow," &c.

We do not profess to take Jesus as authority in political economy, and can readily see how this fine idealist, looking upon the sufferings of the poor and the corruptions of the rich, should have uttered these impracticable maxims; but it is grievous to see historical truth thus violated, to favor a preconceived religious theory. This warping of the intellectual vision is one of the great evils of sectarian and party spirit, against which believers in free religion should most especially guard themselves as well as others.

E. D. C.

"TO BE OR NOT TO BE."

In one of his "Lecture Room Talks," Henry Ward Beecher is reported as saying that "the testimony of all things which we see among men goes to show that, if in this world only we have hope, we are of all men most miserable. Life is not worth having if there is no more of it than we have here." Dr. Büchner, a German materialist, on the contrary, thinks that he would be of all men most miserable if he did hope, or rather did expect, to live hereafter. He says, in his work on "Stoff und Kraft" (Matter and Force)—"The idea of an eternal life, of not being able to die, is the most horrid thought that fancy could invent." According to our finite reasoning it would appear that either Beecher or Büchner is in danger of getting into trouble in the next world. If Beecher has his wish and drags Büchner into immortality, the "horrid fancy" of the latter will become an eternal horrid reality; while if Büchner snatches from the fearful Beecher his hope in a hereafter, the happy preacher declares he will "be of all men most miserable." Now the question is, to which one of these two gentlemen will the Almighty adjust this universe? It will be too bad to disappoint either. If Beecher will cry and "take on" because he can't have a piece of cake after his bread and butter is eaten, will it not be cruel to deny him? And if the Doctor doesn't want to live after this life is over, will it not be equally cruel in the Father of All to make him live forever?

It would seem inevitable, however, that either the Beechers or Büchners of humanity must be disappointed, unless God shall make special provision to meet the demands of every case, granting to this person eternal life, and to that eternal death, and to another perhaps a waking sleep, and to another a definite lease of life, and so on according to the dictation of each man's whim or "fancy." Do we think that God will give each one a private room in that "mansion in the skies" all furnished to his order on short notice? Is it not wiser to go over to the Infinite than to try to draw him to the finite? Is it not inexpressibly childish to threaten, to pout and whine and scold, and declare you will and you won't, to the Almighty, if he doesn't give or withhold eternal life? That man is not only the wise man but the man of truest trust, who can say with Emerson, "If it is best that conscious life continue, then it will continue." Most of us have hope, and many of us, we think, have a firm belief in a conscious life beyond; but suppose we believed that "we are such stuff as dreams are made of, and our little life is rounded by a sleep," shall we therefore, with Beecher, say that "life is not worth having if there is no more of it than we have here?" It is worth having—worth its par value, twenty-four golden hours every day, and three-score years and ten, which may be crowded full of good words and good deeds. Beecher himself ought not to ask to live again, for he has linked immortality to this life. "Most men die insolvent, promising more than they fulfil," says Emerson. Beecher and Emerson have fulfilled their promise. Their debt to humanity is cancelled, but they must live for ever in order to cancel the debt of humanity to them.

This "eminent hope of human nature," the hope of conscious life hereafter, is strong in most of the European and Western nations; but the Jews before the captivity seem to have lived happily for hundreds of years without this hope, and it is very doubtful whether the ideal state, the Nirvana of the Buddhists, is not more like our idea of an eternal sleep than of eternal life. If it is, then perhaps the three hundred and forty million Buddhists would be made "most miserable" by the "hope" of Beecher, without which he thinks life here is not worth having. This conflict of Ideals should make us cautious how we reason from what I want to what God wills. If he should fit the universe to Beecher, it might be to unfit it to millions of Buddhists. To us to-day it may seem that conscious individual life is the only thing that can fulfil our "dying ideal" of a future existence, but perchance a higher and better state may reveal itself to the future man. Nor is it true that men are necessarily miserable in this life who have no desire or expectation of another. Nature adapts men to her food. "The fur grows rough as the climate roughens."

Personally we cherish a firm belief in some kind of a future life. We would not like to surrender it; but if we were robbed of it, we would not go and hang ourselves, feeling with Beecher that "life is not worth having if there is no more of it than we have."

here." Rather will we be thankful that we have so much, and make the best of it—build for immortals here. If it be that God has prepared for us the heaven of eternal life which Beecher longs for, we will go there gladly; if the heaven of Büchner, we will try to go like him—

"Who wraps the drapery of his couch

About him and lies down to pleasant dreams."

If everlasting punishment awaits us, we will try to keep cool there and make ourselves as comfortable as possible under the circumstances! Come what may, we will not berate this life in order to glorify the next. We think this is a very good world to live in, though on this fifth day of March, 1873, the mercury stands at eight degrees below zero and the wind blows a gale in a New England city.

W. H. S.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

SPEECHES ON POLITICAL QUESTIONS BY GEORGE W. JULIAN (Hurd & Houghton) is an octavo of nearly five hundred pages, with an Introduction by L. Maria Child. Mr. Julian is a "self-made man;" but, unlike some other "self-made men," he does not worship his creator. In this respect he differs from Andrew Johnson, who exactly reversed the saying, "The eye sees everything but itself," and paraded for years before the country an I that saw nothing but itself. Mr. Julian has shown more regard in his public career for free and just principles than for his own personal interests; and, if he "made himself," it must be admitted that the workmanlike praises the workman. He is a genuine, incorruptible man. His speeches are bold, clear, and able. They record incidentally many facts of interest. For instance (p. 116), he states that in 1853 there were, "in all, 668,000 slaves held by the ministers and members of the Protestant churches of this country." Let that fact be remembered, when Protestant clergymen unblushingly claim that Christianity abolished slavery. Dr. Albert Barnes, the famous commentator of the Bible and a high authority among Protestants, was honest enough to declare—"There is no power out of the American Church that could sustain slavery an hour, if it were not sustained in it." The Church has always had a fashion of claiming the credit of every reform, when its opposition to reform has been finally overcome; but its impudent claim to such credit in regard to anti-slavery is amply refuted in these pages. There is hardly another man in American public life whose name deserves to stand so near to that of Charles Sumner for absolute integrity, as the name of George W. Julian.—Price $2.50; for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF RELIGION (Charles Scribner & Co.) by Max Müller is a republication, not only of the lectures at the Royal Institution which attracted so much attention in 1870, but also of his lecture at Kiel in 1869 on Buddhist Nihilism, and his invaluable translation of the Dhammapada, or "Path of Virtue," which we admired so profoundly as to read it through in course last year in our regular Sunday meetings, as the best series of "Scripture lessons" at hand. Nor does our admiration decrease on longer acquaintance. Portions of the Dhammapada, of course, savor too much of local and temporary limitations; but there is frequently a masculine vigor in its thought, and a ruggedness of tone approaching even to sternness, which suits us better than the excessive submissiveness and self-prostration required of the Christian disciple. There is hard but most wholesome truth, for example, in these sayings (pp. 211, 212):—

"If a traveller does not meet with one who is his better, or his equal, let him firmly keep to his solitary journey; there is no companionship with a fool."

"If a fool be associated with a wise man all his life, he will perceive the truth as little as a spoon perceives the taste of soup."

"If an intelligent man be associated for one minute only with a wise man, he will soon perceive the truth, as the tongue perceives the taste of soup."

We quote these passages for their severity, not for their beauty. There is something tiresome in the endless praise of love and gentleness and meekness. Even your pudding-sauce needs a little vinegar to save its sweetness from sickishness; and we admire in Buddha, as in Socrates, the capacity of dismissing all sentimentality and turning the back even on sentiment itself for a while. The world has been nauseated with the cant of a lackadaisical gospel. It is time to be invigorated with a diet of pure thought and ideas not tricked out with the cheap colors of personality. A self-reliant mind finds supreme satisfaction in being utterly alone with the truth. Over against the "love to God and love to man" of Jesus, set this saying of Buddha:—"From love comes grief, from love comes fear; he who is free from love knows neither grief nor fear." He has had a shallow experience who cannot understand the truth in both of these sayings. One can as little be spared as the other; and we owe gratitude to Buddha for perceiving that occasionally mankind is an impertinence. Were it not for solitude, misanthropy might become an epidemic. Alas for him who can find no companionship in himself, and shrinks from communion with his own conscience in the silence and the night! There is no word above self-respect; for it means God.

We make no attempt to review books in THE INDEX, and say a few words only that are suggested by them. But there is none better worth buying than this. The four lectures of Prof. Müller are most noteworthy, as indicating how loudly science is knocking at the door of religion and demanding the keys. His thought is far more advanced than some superficial critics of his perceive; for its general drift, despite some backward eddies, is towards the scientific method in religious study. For instance, he is critical and unbiased enough to admit the fact (though his own sympathies run counter to it) that Buddhism is by its very genius an atheistic religion:—

"As to atheistic religions, they might seem to be perfectly impossible; and yet the fact cannot be disputed away that the religion of Buddha was from the beginning purely atheistic. The idea of the God-head, after it had been degraded by endless mythological absurdities which struck and repelled the heart of Buddha, was, for a time at least, entirely expelled from the sanctuary of the human mind; and the highest morality that was ever taught before the rise of Christianity was taught by men with whom the gods had become mere phantoms, and who had no altars, not even an altar to the Unknown God."

The day when prejudice shall vanish and candor shall confess this fact may be confidently expected. Despite all cavil, the idea of religion is enlarging so as to include even speculative atheism within its scope. Freedom and fellowship, the very essence of its finer teaching, alike demand this enlargement, which is fated to occur. Prof. Müller, himself a theist, deserves high praise for the scientific impartiality which determines his position on this point. It will soon be shared by many who now demur.—Price, $2.00; for sale by H. S. Stebbins.

TRICKS EXPOSED.

The fact that Gov. Jewell, of Connecticut, published a letter withdrawing his name as Vice President of the National Association which aims to Christianize the U. S. Constitution, and the kindred fact that Gov. Washburn, of Massachusetts, published a similar letter declaring that his name had been used in the same manner without his consent, naturally gave the impression that the managers of that Association were seeking to push their movement by very unscrupulous means. After seeing and hearing these men at Cincinnati, we were quite reluctant to consider this the true explanation of the matter. The following paragraph from the Boston Commonwealth (which very kindly seconds our effort to get up a great remonstrance against the movement) shows that it was these politicians themselves, and not the officers of the Association, that were playing a double game:—

"General Secretary McAllister, of the National God-in-the-Constitution society, writes that he has a letter from Gov. Jewell, of Conn., admitting that he united in the call for the convention in Philadelphia last year, and a letter from Gov. Washburn of this State, dated last December, approving of the movement; and hence the reason why these gentlemen were made Vice Presidents of the national society—which seems reason enough to attribute to them sympathy with the 'cause.'"

P. S. The Christian Statesman of March 1 publishes correspondence which confirms the above statements of the Commonwealth. We are anxious to do no injustice to the gentlemen engaged in this movement, and therefore call special attention to the fact that it is not they, but the two Governors, whose reputation for candid dealing must suffer. Rev. D. McAllister, in a note to the N. Y. Tribune, says with great force:—

"If any gentleman, after committing himself to a movement by his own signature and acknowledged approval, sees fit to withdraw, there is an honorable way of so doing. It is due to all concerned that an intimation of withdrawal be made, in some way, to the Association to which the signature and endorsement were given. Until this is done, the endorsement and approval stand."

The many friends of Mr. Parker Pillsbury will be glad to learn something about his plans for the ensuing season. He proposes to spend the summer months in New England. Committees desiring to engage his services as lecturer will address him at Concord, N. H.; and the testimony that has reached us concerning his work in the West during the past year is such as to give us great confidence in urging the friends of free thought at the East to correspond with him. For one, we miss no opportunity of hearing Mr. Pillsbury lecture. His style is his own, cogent, cutting, and crushing,—marked by a peculiar eloquence at times, and sure to warm the blood of his listeners by the fire of his own half-suppressed enthusiasm. The grim determination with which he tears a superstition to tatters, or hurls his sarcasms at hypocrisy and tyranny of all kinds, shows that there is a strong dash of Oliver Cromwell in his character. Such men are very dangerous to sham. The following is the postscript to a hurried note just received from him:—

"P. S.—My winter engagement in Salem closed last Sunday; and I have every reason to believe my word was most acceptable to the good people of the Free Society there. A year ago when I left them, at the close of a six months term of labor, a unanimous voice of men and women of the Society invited me to return in September and renew my Sunday lectures. But so few are our Western workers in the department of Liberal religious thought and action, that it seemed to me better to give the autumn to more miscellaneous labors, which I did, in Michigan and Illinois; the four Sundays of November to Cincinnati.

The cold weather of winter returned me to Salem for another three months. But you may be assured only the weather has blown cold on me. And I should leave my friends there with sincere regrets, only that they prevented almost all sorrow by a unanimous and I know hearty invitation to return and renew my labors among them for an indefinite period, at the close of summer.

I go now to Cincinnati for two or three Sundays, and shall then return to New England (via Toledo, of course) for rest and such occasional work as may offer there, my headquarters being Concord, New Hampshire.

My future, beyond the summer months, is not yet determined. The West holds out the strongest inducements of nearly every kind, except in a pecuniary point of view. But as I am more missionary than anything else, I have to remember that missionaries are sometimes eaten themselves, instead of being fed; and so I plod on, in such work as the more destitute fields offer."

Elder Hammond, the noted revivalist, is out in Kansas, converting "gamblers" and "local editors,"—which makes it agreeable to be neither one nor the other.

Appropos of revivalists, Rev. Robert McLeod, the Unitarian minister of Chicopee, Mass., has the following caustic remarks in a recent sermon:—

"What can be more of a business operation than a deliberately planned revival? A society is small and poor; it needs numbers, in order to have money. Perhaps the pastor is not able to rouse the people to a consciousness of their condition—the people's of course, not the society's condition! In such a case, a regular revivalist is set to the work. They are a sort of spiritual quacks, travelling here and there with such pills and powders as meet with a ready market. They are loud talkers, unscrupulous dealers with facts, making up in brass what they lack in brains. These are the men that poor parishes send for to make people more religious. They come, with their trindes against common sense, their abuse of a learning they lack. People gather to hear them, as they would to see a 'live' gorilla, and for about the same reason. They begin operations. Soon the weakest point gives way; some one cries, then another, and another. At once they are pressed to come forward for prayers. They are led along by older ones, not a moment is given for thought or reflection till they are inside the circle. Who has not seen such converts when they begin to come to their senses again? How soon they forget all this rapture, how lightly they talk of it, and bring the sacred sentiment of religion into disgrace, by what appears to many as a repudiation of it."

The Radical for 1873 presents many attractive features to those who are at all in its way of thinking. And others, who desire to know what the leading minds of "Free" or "Rational Religion" are saying on the various open questions of religion and theology will find its pages well worthy of their attention. The forthcoming number (April) will contain the first and second instalments of O. B. Frothingham's presentation of "The Religion of Humanity," giving his views of "Its God" and of "Its Bible." In the same number M. D. Conway will treat of "The Theist's Problem and Task," and Rev. J. W. Chadwick will contribute an Essay on "Voltaire." A serial story, entitled "Timothy Tot," by Francis Gerry Fairfield, is running through the current numbers. Other thoughtful and important papers are promised, among them an address read before a New England Unitarian Conference by the distinguished essayist and preacher, Dr. C. A. Bartol, on "Sincerity" which is said to be in his happiest radical vein.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

GREETING FROM CHESTNUT STREET.

Boston, March 10, 1872.

DEAR ABBOT:—

Let me, as one of the people, think your last number your best. I thank you especially for your own masterly answer to Mrs. Woodhull, the tone and logic of which it would bless her to emulate. I note always Mr. Potter's "sweetness and light." Mr. Johnson's putting of the Ideal view is a marvel of spiritual and intellectual power. No larger sheet contained more truth than this issue of your little one.

Gratefully yours,

C. A. B.

ANOTHER VIEW.

March 10, 1872.

... The make-up of your yesterday's paper is a sore trial to me, the greatest yet. ... Three pages—one article each—two of those on one subject, and that a subject of which the public is now tired, Mrs. Woodhull—and then a page of advertisements. If I had taken up such a paper as a stranger, I should never have looked at it again. There is not a newspaper-man in the country, who has succeeded, but will tell you that no paper can succeed by such a method. ... While you were writing that useless answer to Mrs. W. (useless because H. will also have his say, and because she won't stay answered), you might have written three detached paragraphs on different subjects, each telling for something—and your scissors might have done the rest. Honestly I think your late papers have had more variety; and it is because this number is such a back-sliding that I re-monstrate.

Ever cordially,

[That number was our columbiad. This number is our shot-gun. If we cannot always secure variety in each issue, we will do the best we can in successive issues. It is pretty hard to suit everybody every week. We are like the old gentleman in the fable who tried to please the public, first by riding on his donkey himself while his son walked—then by walking while his son rode—then by leading the donkey while both walked—then by both riding at the same time—and lastly by tying the donkey's legs together, and slinging him on a pole between himself and his son. But the public would not be pleased, so the old gentleman resolved to please himself. Perhaps we shall have to do so too; but we shall always be glad to receive criticisms from our friends, and will learn all we can from their greater wisdom.—Ed.]

THE TRUE GRIT.

PARKERSBURG, Ind., March 9, 1872.

MR. F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—I this day send you 394 names to the Counter-petition, all solid voters. I live at a country cross-roads; but I called three meetings in my township, and delivered a lecture at each meeting against the proposed Amendment, and, with the help of Dr. J. M. Straughan and Pressly Gott, succeeded with my list.

Had I the time, and if the dog was not already dead, I would be disposed to rout him from every school house in the State.

I am, Sir, &c,

J. N. OSBURN.

[We cannot help taking special note of the above, for the reason that it breathes the spirit we want to recognize everywhere. It is not only shown in these ringing words and in the energy which took right hold of the practical work to be done, but even in the appearance of the petition itself, which came to us in beautiful shape, clean and carefully copied off in two long columns of names. Mr. Osburn has adopted the right course. Let local meetings be held everywhere, for the purpose of discussing this subject in all its bearings. But do not hold them as if "the dog" were "dead." That is a terrible mistake.

THE INTEREST OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH DEMANDS THAT THE PROPOSED AMENDMENT SHOULD BE CARRIED. It is the only measure that can preserve to Orthodoxy its permanent dominion over society. These men see this fact as clearly as we do. Do not flatter yourself that they will cease their agitation. Meet them on their own ground. OUT-AGITATE THEM! Carry these questions right before the people, and make every man decide which petition he will sign, theirs for tyranny or ours for freedom!—Ed.]

POLITICAL CHRISTIANS.

EDITOR INDEX:—

The Clergy a Source of Danger to the American Republic—such is the line upon which for five years I have been conducting the campaign against the clerical interference with our "Infidel" government. Mr. Abbot, I trust that no Liberalist will underrate the strength of the enemies of free government. I have many reasons for the opinion that the ministers believe they are doing God service in Christianizing our government. I know the men engaged in it. They are in earnest. They feel their cause is as holy as Garrison believed "Abolitionism" to be, and are confident that God and victory are with them. They have been laboring in this cause—they and their ancestors—ever since 1787. At that time they deplored the "wretched infidelity then abroad upon the air of the world," which gave us a "godless constitution," a "heathenish thing." They explain that Satan at that time was unusually active and "stole a march upon the Christian world!" The "Covenanters" were never reconciled to the Constitution which insulted God by omitting his name. In 1863 the modern form of the movement began. It is gaining strength. Our chief danger is to believe it is a harmless movement, or, if dangerous, that it can easily be extinguished. We need to beware of indulging an undue sense of security. I am glad you have espoused the cause of Liberty against clerical rule.

This effort to Christianize our institutions will endanger, far more than African bondage did, the perpetuity of the Republic. We are upon the eve of a great religious war that will not be entirely a wordy one.

I presented your petition in our meeting. It received many signatures and will be forwarded in a few days.

W. F. JAMIESON.

EAST SAGINAW, Mich.,
February 7, 1872.

THE FUTURE OF PUBLIC PRAYER.

SOUTH AMESBURY, Mass., Feb. 21, 1872.

MR. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Some remarks in your journal of the 17th instant, under the head of "Editorial Book Notices," attracted my attention, and I read them over more than once with an unusual degree of admiration. In one respect, however, you leave me in a somewhat confused mental state. You say:—"For these reasons we believe that public prayer will wholly fall into desuetude until the wiser science of the future shall have re-created a universal faith in God, &c., &c." "Until?" Do you mean to convey the impression that public prayer will then probably be reascituated? That is the problem which staggers me—"What to do with public prayer?"—or whether to do anything at all with it, in the conceivable exigency which, as you have hinted, may some time hereafter arise.

I do not write this in any irreverent spirit. I coincide with your remarks on this vexed question far more fully than I usually coincide with remarks of yours on other topics. Indeed, they seem to me fine beyond parallel, almost; finer, at all events, than anything which has fallen under my eye elsewhere. For, while I claim to be a radical, I am also, organically and by culture, a religionist; and, while withholding all criticism with regard to the use of this old Hebrew or paganistic term God, it seems to me that there ought to be, and is, a very blessed communion with the Infinite possible to mortals. But I cannot bring my intellectual conceptions into harmony with the idea of using verbal phraseology in this direction.

It would be a source of gratification to me, and I cannot doubt it would to many others, to see something more from your pen upon the theme in question.

Yours truly,

JAMES WHITTIER.

[If the slowly ripening knowledge of mankind shall, as we believe it will, lay solid foundations in human intelligence for the faith in God as Universal Mind which now has generally no more secure foundation than tradition or intuition, is it unnatural to suppose that the religious sentiment of the race will adjust itself to knowledge as it has hitherto adjusted itself to imagination? We do not believe that the religious sentiment—that sentiment which blends the finite with the Infinite in deep spiritual repose and joy, and fills out the sense of fragmentary individual being by consciously relating the soul to boundless Being itself—will ever perish out of humanity. It has hitherto assumed very crude forms. The religions have all perverted it, even while giving it expression. But the intellectual basis of Christian Theism, and that of purely Intuitionist Theism no less, is slowly crumbling away. Unless the new intellectual basis of Scientific Theism shall be found indestructible, we anticipate no future for Theism at all. But if it shall be found indestructible indeed, we believe that there will still be some free expression of the religious sentiment, and this, no matter under what form, whether worded or unworded, is prayer in its highest sense.

If, then, the enlargement of science shall make universal a higher faith in God than the world has yet seen, it seems probable that this purified faith will create its literature, its art, its cultus. Perhaps music, rather than language, will be the social expression of that deeper worship. It matters not. Any social expression of the religious sentiment is itself public prayer; and there can be little doubt that this sentiment will adapt itself to the newer and higher thought, not only in solitude, but in society as well. The vivification of the universal intellect, which is the meaning of this greating science, must tend to purify and elevate worship, private and public, unless the conception of an integral humanity is all an idle dream.—Ed.]

THE BIBLE CROSS-EXAMINED.

ANDERSON, Madison Co., Ind.,
February 20, 1872.

EDITOR INDEX:

Dear Sir,—You may not be aware that the Society of Spiritualists of this city recently invited Mr. B. F. Underwood, the Infidel lecturer, to deliver a course of Free Thought lectures. That gentleman accepted the invitation and delivered five most able and interesting addresses. At the conclusion of every lecture, Mr. Underwood challenged any clergyman to debate, but, as the sporting fraternity express it, "without takers." After several weeks silence, the Christian (Campbellite) Church here has responded, and we are in hopes, provided our Christian opponents do not "fly the track," that a debate will be got up between Mr. Underwood and some clergyman of that church before long.

Mr. Underwood has authorized Dr. Hockett, of this city, to make the necessary arrangements, and is willing to take the affirmative of the following propositions:—

- 1st. The Bible is at variance with the established facts of Science.
- 2d. The Bible contains doctrines and teachings that are pernicious in their tendency.
- 3d. The Bible contains contradictions, false prophecies, and historic errors.
- 4th. The Old and New Testaments are largely outgrowths of heathenism.
- 5th. The Bible is a work of human origin.
- 6th. The influence of the Bible, when accepted as a work of Divine origin and authority, is injurious in its tendency.

The minister of the Christian church, a gentleman of the name of Franklin, is also Principal of the Normal School, and is generally considered by the Orthodox as the most talented of the Anderson clergymen. He is decidedly well furnished with self-assurance. There is also talk of the church party putting forward the Rev. Mr. Burgess, of Chicago. Which it will be I cannot say yet.

I have heard Mr. Franklin preach, and make the old stereotyped Orthodox assertions that "the Church of Christ had fostered the elucidations of science, rather than hindered them!" That "science owes most of its advancement to the harmonizing, ameliorating, civilizing doctrines of Holy Writ, and that of the sucana. Miller especially has perfectly reconciled the facts of geology with the truths of Genesis!"

We congratulate ourselves upon the prospect of hearing from Mr. Underwood's opponent the best arguments to reconcile the mysticisms of Genesis with Science or Reason. We regard the Mosaic record in the same light as the Zend Avesta, or the Rig-Veda, or the Frithiof Saga, or the writings of Confucius, and we do not consider that the one possesses any greater claim upon human credulity than the other. And moreover, we regard all Swedeborgian text-torturing and sense-perverting interpretations as supremely ridiculous. We believe that the book means just what it says; and when we read of "waters above the firmament" and "flood-gates in heaven," of the earth being created before its centre and of vegetation flourishing previous to the birth of the sun, moon or stars, of the sun ceasing its rotation at the command of Joshua, and of men living nine hundred years and riding forth into space upon fiery chariots, we believe that these monstrous myths are to be understood au pied de la lettre, just as we understand the Runes of the Asgard gods. Nor can any living creature show forth stable reasons wherefore we should view the matter in any other light. By what right does the modern church place so fantastically tortuous a construction upon the words of those weird old Hebrew myths, written in the childhood of humanity?

Until Mr. C. C. Slocum came among us last fall, not a copy of THE INDEX was taken in Anderson. Now, through his exertions, several outsiders besides members of our Society are subscribers. You may judge that I like THE INDEX when I tell you that the only religious position I can ever occupy is the one you advocate as "Free Religion." Those Spiritualists among us who are not affected by a surplus of feelings, sentiments and "impressions," but who reason, appreciate and welcome THE INDEX.

Assuring you that the free and noble thoughts expressed through your paper are doing an important work,

I remain very respectfully yours,

JOHN R. A. TAYLOR,

Sec. Anderson Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Five Religions conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for one dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents concepts of Him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages entailing the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. R. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six Copies Fifty Cents; Twelve Copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. R. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by P. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution, —the list of its most prominent supporters, —and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single Copies, Five Cents; Twelve Copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, stated and answered from Her standpoint, a pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $5.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

110-116 Bow, Box 2338, St. Louis, Mo.

THE RADICAL is published monthly at $5.00 a year. Address S. H. MORSE, 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Send 50 cents for a Specimen Number.

A BOOK FOR THE TIMES!

"THE CLERGY A SOURCE OF DANGER TO THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC." Sold by Subscription only! Agents Wanted!
Address W. F. JAMIESON,
117-120, 10 N. Jefferson St., Chicago, Ill.

AGENTS WANTED FOR "JESUS." By Charles F. Doane, D.D. His Divinity established and Rationalism routed. The most popular and rapidly-selling religious work ever issued. For Circulars, address U. S. PUBLISHING CO., N. Y., Cincinnati, Chicago or St. Louis. 117-120.

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says, "I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. R. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. R. ABBOT. This series contains in the aggregate over two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, 90 St. Clair street, Toledo, Ohio.

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

(FIRST SERIES, NO. 1 TO 20.)

Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and needful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "it is written."
24. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love vs. Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die: an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others": showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelists" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unchangeable: will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes lose their children; did God ever lose, can he lose, His children?
35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader: methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Earle, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

EITHER SERIES, 30 CENTS; BOTH 50 CENTS.

Address CHAS. K. WHIPPLE
[50-17] 19 Pinckney St., Boston.

St. Louis, Quincy, Hannibal, Keokuk, Toledo, Wabash & Western R. R.

PULLMAN PALACE SLEEPING CARS!

THE Toledo, Wabash & Western Railway Co., having recently extended its line of Railway to the City of Saint Louis, will commence running all its regular passenger trains through to that city on and after the 14th day of May, 1871. The day trains will be equipped with new and elegant passenger coaches, and all night trains with the much celebrated and popular Pullman Palace Sleeping Coaches.

	Special Thro'	Pacific
	Express.	Express.
Leave Toledo.....	11:30 A. M.	11:15 P. M.
Ar. Ft. Wayne.....	8:00 P. M.	8:30 A. M.
" Lafayette.....	7:40 "	8:30 "
" Danville.....	10:05 "	11:50 "
" Springfield.....	8:25 A. M.	4:10 P. M.
" Quincy.....	8:45 "	9:25 "
" Keokuk.....	9:50 "	10:45 "
" St. Louis.....	7:00 "	7:15 "

Trains arrive from the West at 2:15 A. M., 8:40 P. M., and 5:00 P. M.

GEO. H. BURNOWS,
Gen'l Superintendent.

JOHN U. PARSONS,
Gen'l Ticket Agent. [5017]

Lake Shore & Mich. Southern R. R.

1872.

On and after Sunday, Jan. 14th, 1873, Passenger Trains will leave Toledo daily (Sundays excepted) as follows (Cleveland time):

CLEVELAND & TOLEDO DIVISION.

LEAVE TOLEDO.

8:06 A. M. Atlantic Express East, daily, arrives at Cleveland at 7:25 A. M.
6:50 A. M. Day Express will stop at Elmore, Fremont, Clyde, Bellevue, Monroeville, Norwalk, Towawand, Wakeman, Oberlin, Elyria and Berea, arrives at Cleveland at 10:30 A. M.
10:35 A. M. Cincinnati Express, stopping at all stations, reaches Cleveland at 2:45 P. M.
6:30 P. M. Special N. Y. Express, will stop at Fremont, Clyde, Monroeville, Norwalk and Elyria, arrives at Cleveland 10:15 P. M. Sleeping cars to Buffalo and Rochester.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

10:40 and 10:35 A. M., and 7:40 and 11:00 P. M.

MICHIGAN SOUTHERN DIVISION.

TRAINS DEPART.

MAIN LINE—8:15 A. M., Mail; 11:15 A. M. Special Chicago Express; 5:45 P. M. Coldwater Accommodation; 8:00 P. M. Night Express.
AIR LINE—11:05 A. M., Accommodation; 11:30 P. M. Pacific Express.
DETROIT—6:00, 11:30 A. M., 5:30 and 8:00 P. M.
JACKSON—11:35 A. M. and 5:00 P. M.
KALAMAZOO AND GRAND RAPIDS—11:15 A. M., and 8:00 P. M.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

MAIN LINE—6:30 and 10:35 A. M., and 5:40 & 9:20 P. M.

AIR LINE—2:30 A. M., and 5:55 P. M.

DETROIT—10:40 and 12:01 A. M., and 6:05 and 9:00 P. M.

JACKSON—10:35 A. M. and 5:15 P. M.

COLDWATER ACCOMMODATION—10:35 A. M.

CHAS. F. HATZEL, Gen'l Supt.,
Cleveland, Ohio.

S. H. WARING, Ticket Agent, Toledo, O. [5017]

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 25 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS R. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
J. VILA BLAKE, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $3.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 38, Toledo, Ohio.

NEW BOOKS BY MAIL!

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Bookseller and Publisher,

TOLEDO, OHIO,

Will send the following NEW BOOKS by mail on receipt of the publisher's price:

"LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF RELIGION," by Max Maeller.....$3.00
"RADICAL PROBLEMS," by Dr. C. A. Bartol.....$2.00
"THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH," by Louis Figuier.....$1.75
"THE DEBATABLE LAND," by Robt. Dale Owen.....$3.00
"SHORT STUDIES ON GREAT SUBJECTS," (Second Series), by Froude.....$1.50
"THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST"—An Examination of Liddon's Bampton Lectures.....$3.00

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

ITS GOD, ITS BIBLE, INCARNATION, REGENERATION, IMMORTALITY, PROVIDENCE, MORAL INSPIRATIONS, AND LAWS.

The first two of these Essays will appear in The Radical for APRIL.

M. D. CONWAY contributes to the same number—

"The Theist's Problem and Task,"

and JOHN W. CHADWICK—

"A STUDY OF VOLTAIRE."

This series of Essays by Mr. FROTHINGHAM are among the best of his writings, and furnish a very important feature in The Radical the present year, sketching as they do in the ablest manner the outlines of the New Radical Religion.

Now is the Time to Subscribe!

$3 a Year; Single Copies, 30 Cents.

Address THE RADICAL,
118-17 25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

JUNIUS UNMASKED; or, THOMAS PAINE the author of the "Letters of Junius" and the "Declaration of Independence." A DEMONSTRATION. Royal 16mo. pp. 322. Price, $1.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.
Address JOHN GRAY & CO.,
118-3m* P. O. Box 959, Washington, D. C.

Back Numbers of the Index!

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS A DOZEN!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, MARCH 30, 1872.

WHOLE No. 118.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. BALLOWELL, J. VILA BLAKE, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, Rev. CHARLES VOSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWKAY (England), Rev. MORCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

[Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.]

Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these Lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio."

THE BOSTON. SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1872.

THE POSITIVE CONTENTS OF RATIONALISM IN RELIGION.

BY WILLIAM J. POTTER.

[Tenth Lecture in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, March 10, 1872.]

The subject to which I invite your attention in this lecture is the Positive Nature of Religious Rationalism. My desire is so to open and analyze what is called the rationalistic, or radical, spirit of the age, as to show that it has positive contents and aims. It is a common charge that Rationalism is merely a system of negations; I shall try to show that it has the elements of actual faith. A common charge is that it is only critical and destructive; I shall try to show that it is also constructive. A common charge is that it is nothing but airy speculation; I shall try to show that it is practical and humane. A common charge is that it is empty and cold,—a vacuum in which no spiritual or even genuine human life can be sustained. I shall try to show that it presents the constituent parts of a comprehensive and satisfying belief,—that it is no vacuum, but is filled with the mental and moral atmosphere which sustains the most distinctive and the most vital and hopeful features of modern civilization.

That we may have a clear understanding with each other at the outset, it is well to begin with definitions. Let me say, then, to prevent any possible misapprehension, that I use the word Positive in its simple primary meaning, as opposed to negative, and not with reference to the system of philosophy known as Positivism. The word Rationalism, too, has had a technical use among theologians to denote that method of interpreting the Bible which, while holding essentially to its authenticity and authority, explains the miraculous element out of it and makes the narrative credible to the modern mind by reading modern ideas into the old text. So the German Paulus, accepting the accounts of miracles in the New Testament as worthy of credit, attempted to explain them by natural causes. So the old-school Unitarians, assuming that Jesus could not believe that epilepsy was caused by possession by demons, explained his language on this point by putting into it what the text gives no intimation of, namely, the intention to adapt his thought for a moral purpose to the popular beliefs of the time, though not himself accepting them. This kind of exegesis is called rationalizing the Scriptures, and has sometimes been dignified more than it deserves with the name Rationalism. For those who go to the Bible to get authority for their religious beliefs, it is a very convenient mode of interpretation, since they have only to read into the texts what they already believe, when, lo, they have the desired authority with which to confound their antagonists. It is a method, therefore, much resorted to by individual readers, writers, and sects, though as a recognized exegetical system it is passing out of favor among scholars. Of course in my use of the word Rationalism in this lecture I have no reference to this narrow technical application of the word, except as it is one of the straws which show the direction in which the Protestant wind of free inquiry has been blowing. But Rationalism is a word of much larger compass. Even setting aside its meaning in philosophy, it has in the field of theology a much broader significance than this questionable mode of scriptural interpretation. Real Rationalism does not now read and interpret Scripture in that way; nor does it find all the questions that concern religion presented or solved in the Bible. It has made for itself a much larger domain. The Rationalism of which I am to speak may be defined as the free application of reason, enlightened by all possible helps of investigation and culture, to all religious problems whether of belief or of practice.

To be ready to trust free inquiry in the field of the most sacred doctrines, traditions, and institutions, to be willing to follow investigation as it traces back the most pious beliefs to their ultimate origin wherever it may be, to give reason, operating through its two faculties of observation and reflection, full liberty to go whither it will unrestrained save by its own laws,—this is the primary principle, the starting-point, of rationalistic, or radical, thought. Rationalism in this its broad modern phase is, in fact, the direct and legitimate result of the original Protestant principle of the right of private judgment. It is the new shape of the old protest against the claims of external authority and in favor of the independence of the individual soul. This full complete assertion of the rights of reason in the province of Religion, which is made by modern Rationalism, is the logical outgrowth of the seed that was planted by Luther and Huss and Wickliffe,—or rather of seed which, before them, was inherent in the Teutonic blood.

Mr. Lecky, in the Introduction to his excellent book on "The Rise and Influence of the Spirit of Rationalism in Europe," says that he understands by this spirit, "not any class of definite doctrines or criticisms, but rather a certain cast of thought, or bias of reasoning, which has during the last three centuries gained a marked ascendancy in Europe." He further describes the nature of this spirit as follows: "It leads men on all occasions to subordinate dogmatic theology to the dictates of reason and of conscience, and, as a necessary consequence, greatly to restrict its influence upon life. It predisposes men, in history, to attribute all kinds of phenomena to natural rather than miraculous causes; in theology, to esteem succeeding systems the expressions of the wants and aspirations of that religious sentiment which is planted in all men; and, in ethics, to regard as duties only those which conscience reveals to be such." This passage describes very well the nature and progress of Rationalism in general since the epoch of the Protestant Reformation; and the same spirit working specifically in the province of religion gives us the religious Rationalism of this era,—which, for the sake of brevity, we may in this essay call simply Rationalism. In regard to Mr. Lecky's statement two points are worthy of note: first, that Rationalism, as he truly says, is not a system of "doctrines," but rather a certain mode of thought or tendency of reasoning; that it represents principles, not dogmas,—principles from which definite conclusions of thought may be logically deduced, but no theological doctrines for serving an ecclesiastical purpose; second, that the rationalistic spirit which he traces as if working its way unconsciously, impelled by an inherent but hidden bias of free thought, through the intricacies of theological and social beliefs in Europe during the last three hundred years, has now come to a much clearer consciousness of its own character and aims. Modern Rationalism is the same spirit, but grown out of youth to self-reliant manhood. Hitherto it has rather been under the leading-strings of an ill-understood instinctive tendency or impulse; now it is of age, conscious of its strength, conscious of its goal, able to choose its path and develop the positive contents of its nature. If hitherto it seems to have been mainly inquisitive, critical, destructive, this period is now nearly past, and the period for construction, for synthesis, is at hand.

And that Rationalism is positive in its character, that it is not simply negation and destruction, that it affirms no less than it denies, that it believes as well as doubts, that it builds more than it destroys, may be shown first and generally by the fact of its kinship to modern science.

Rationalism and modern science have one ancestry. They are children of the same parentage. For what is natural science but the product of the free application of reason—of reason in its two-fold character of observation and reflection—to the various phenomena of the material world? The scientific spirit of the age is pre-eminently the spirit of free reason applying itself to discover the laws of relation among the various substances, phases, and forces of physical nature. There was no natural science worthy of the name until reason was emancipated from bondage to dogmatism and superstition. When the ecclesiastical power could interfere with processes of scientific induction by throwing their authors into dungeons, when it would not hesitate to tamper with and manipulate the reports of telescopes and microscopes to suit its own purposes, there could be no such thing as science. Natural science came when reason obtained its franchise. It is the child of free thought. And Rationalism in religion is also the child of free thought. It is the same spirit of free reason that inspires physical science, only applying itself to another class of phenomena. The phenomena of which physical science takes note are the facts of material nature. The phenomena with which religious Rationalism deals are the facts presented in the religious history and experience of mankind. But in both cases it is the same reason, having precisely the same source and the same attributes, working with the same faculties, using the same methods, and aiming at the same object,—namely, the discovery of the actual reality and relations of things; only it is reason taking different directions for its inquiry and working upon different kinds of phenomena. Now why should we fear reason in one direction more than in the other? Why should we suppose it to be any more negative and destructive when working upon one class of phenomena than upon another class? The probability certainly is that it will manifest the same character upon both fields. In truth, Rationalism and natural science are but two phases of one and the same thing. Rationalism is the application of the scientific method to the problems of religion. Natural science is the result of the application of the principles of rationalism to the problems of the material universe. Both are human reason at work on the facts of existence. And if reason be positive and constructive in the field of natural science, why should we not believe that it will be equally so, when left equally free, in the province of religion?

But at this point it may be suggested that modern science is itself destructive—that it is just this which the great body of theologians and of religious believers fear. They are afraid of the destructive tendencies of Rationalism because it is the scientific spirit and method applied to problems of religion. Science, in whatever shape it come, they feel to be their great enemy. Since it undermined the book of Genesis and overturned their theory of the construction of the world, how can they trust it anywhere in the domain of their religious faith? But this objection compounds two things that must here be kept apart. It is doubtless true that natural science, as it pushes out its inquiries, is dislodging many venerable theological beliefs from their bases and disturbing many pious associations; it is not tender of our creeds and traditions; it has little respect for the geology or astronomy or physiology of Sacred Books; it does not accept their ethnology or history without examination; it has not the habit of asking us what of our theories with regard to the creation and existence of man on this planet we would like to preserve; on the contrary, it has rather a rough way of thrusting its facts into our faces and then leaving us to get along with our theories as best we can, though they may be left without any visible means of support. All this is to be admitted. But it does not bear on the present point. The point now is, not whether science is not indirectly destructive of theological beliefs by establishing conclusions in its own field inconsistent with those beliefs, but what is the character of natural science in its own province? Is it mere negation, blank scepticism, airy speculation and unbelief, crushing iconoclasm and destruction there? Of course no intelligent person will assert that. If there is anything that is positive, affirmative, constructive, in this present era, it is admitted to be natural science. The progress of natural science is the boast of our era. Do we boast of it for what it has destroyed, for what it denies, for what it disproves and disbelieves? No; rather for what it proves, for what it affirms, for what it knows. Of course in its progress it has pushed aside error, it has removed ignorance, it has destroyed many a superstitious notion, it has fought some long-established habits of thinking and living until they have gone down and been forgotten, buried under the fresh growth of some better conviction and method. If this is to be negative and destructive, then natural science is guilty of the charge; for all these things it has necessarily done as it has proceeded in its positive work of discovering and generalizing the laws of nature. But it is not any of these things that we have primarily in mind, when we think of the progress and achievements of science and are proud of its power. It is its positive achievements that we count. It is of its record of laws discovered, of principles established, of forces whose habits are so learned that they are made to serve human needs, that we boast. Science is knowledge, not negation. If it did not furnish positive knowledge, it would be nothing. Natural science consists, in fact, of many vast systems of knowledge. Look at the magnificent structures of the single sciences—Geology, Chemistry, Astronomy, Zoology, Anthropology, Mechanics, Dynamics, and the rest—any one of them, to be thoroughly pursued, affording room for a life-time of satisfying labor. Are these built of negations? Or that glimpse which science is giving us of a science of all the sciences,—of a unity of all forces in one evolving Energy, primal and eternal, whose orderly procession into finite forms of existence and power is creation,—is that mere negation? What, indeed, as a thought, is more grandly constructive?

And not only does natural science bring us these marvellously built structures of knowledge in regard to the ways of the material universe, but it shows its constructive power in matters that are only indirectly connected with its special domain. We might almost say that natural science is the architect of modern civilization. It is certainly among the most dominant of the active elements in modern thought and life. Upon the knowledge of nature which it furnishes are based those splendid inventions and enterprises that mark with special distinction the age in which we live, and give man a power over nature such as was never dreamed of in the ancient civilizations of the world. The genius of science now penetrates into the inmost recesses of nature, discovers her most secret treasures, tracks out her subtle energies, follows down her aim to its goal, and learns just where in her processes the human intelligence and will can advantageously make connection with her resources and forces, so as to wield them for the increase of human power and the benefit of human life. Is such knowledge as this negation and destruction? Look into the life of modern society where we will, and we cannot fail to see how largely it is shaped and moulded by natural science. Many persons complain, indeed, that natural science is becoming too imperious. Its share in determining modern civilization is so great they fear it is to become absolutely sovereign. It is pushing literature and philosophy from their places in the seats of learning. It entices young men away from the study of the classics to chemistry and engineering. It looks down with a little too much air of superiority upon the old professions which deal more with mental and moral phenomena. It commands the services of a large proportion of the finest intellect of the age. It lays the track and furnishes the motive power by which material enterprise is moving to girdle the globe and to draw the nations into a common civilization and to bind them together by common interests. In the presence of such facts no one, certainly, will deny that natural science, in its domain and in respect to social civilization in general, is affirmative and constructive; that reason freely applying itself to the phenomena of material nature, so far from working in the spirit of purely speculative criticism and denial and to merely negative results, is most emphatically a builder, furnishing the materials that are most relied upon in the structure of modern society.

Such, then, are the results of applying the principles of Rationalism to the study of the physical universe. Now I ask, why should not reason be trusted as a positive, constructive agency when it exercises itself with the same freedom in studying the phenomena of religious history? What grounds have we for supposing that it changes its nature when it changes the field of its inquiry? Reason in its essence, of course, is everywhere and always the same. And the principles of its application in respect to the two classes of phenomena we are now considering are the same. Reason in religion and reason in the domain of physical science are, as already said, but two phases, two forms of manifestation, of one and the same thing. Rationalism is a word which in its general meaning covers both phases. It may be justly claimed, then, that on a priori grounds Free Reason may be expected to be as positively constructive in the domain of religion as it has proved itself to be in the domain of material nature. If there be any difference in result, it must arise from difference in the phenomena towards which inquiry is directed. If the phenomena of religious history represent no realities, if the facts apparently exhibited prove to be no facts, but vanities at the first touch of investigation, then indeed the agency of reason in religion will be little else than critical and destructive. But if religious history offers any facts, any real phenomena, for the investigation of reason, no matter how much their character and relations to one another may have been hitherto misconceived, then, though the investigation in one aspect will necessarily be destructive, in another and larger sense it will be constructive. But this point—the nature of the phenomena presented by religion—we will consider by and by. Thus far in our discussion, considering simply the principles of Rationalism, we see that, whether applied to religion or to material nature, they have the same positive character and cover the same ground. And the result of this stage of the discussion may be summed up thus: As the human reason freely working, through its two faculties of observation and reflection, upon the phenomena of material nature gives us physical science for its product, so the same reason working freely with the various mental and moral phenomena presented in the religious history of mankind, may be expected ultimately to give us for a product religious science.

And now let us note two important points which emerge from this comparison and which more specifically define the character of religious Rationalism. Just as in natural science two termini are assumed to begin with, namely, the existence of the human intelligence as the agent and the facts of the universe as the object of thought, so religious Rationalism begins with two facts,—the fact of human reason and the fact of religion. And in the assumption of these two facts is involved another—which is, however, but a different form of expressing the same assumption—namely, the acceptance of human intelligence, both in its reasoning and observing faculty, as trustworthy. So much of assumption there must be, or there could be no rational thought in any direction, no science of any kind. Man could have no intelligent life, were he not compelled by the very conditions of his existence to accept the trustworthiness of his intelligence. In other words, he must needs receive the reports which come to his consciousness through his senses and faculty of observation from the outward universe as representing actual facts in the universe,—as declaring at least that there is an outward universe,—and he must needs accept also the rational deductions of his own thought as credible testimony to the truth of things. If he does not accept, and in ordinary affairs act upon, the trustworthiness of his own senses and reason, he is irrational, insane. This, of course, is not to say that the testimony of reason or of the senses is accepted as infallible. Human consciousness, while receiving the testimony of its faculties as worthy of credit, is very well aware that they are liable to mistakes and delusions. It has learned this fact also by the testimony of the faculties themselves; and itself furnishes the faculty for testing and correcting its own errors. And this latter fact, that human intelligence carries in itself and constantly exercises the power of detecting and remedying its own mistakes, is a strong and beautiful proof, if proof were needed, that in trusting its own veracity the human consciousness is not the victim of delusion. In any event it must so trust,—not as if the witness were infallible, but as if it were straightforward and honest; as if human intelligence were no mere scenic phantasmagoria for illusions to play through, but a living organism, adhering by inherent law of gravitation to truth, and representing, so far as it works correctly, the actual realities and relations of things.

Rationalism proceeds, then, like natural science, on this principle of trusting the veracity of human nature; and this trust branches into two parts. It accepts human reason on the one hand, and it accepts on the other hand the historical fact of religion. It is the office and aim of Rationalism to bring these two facts into normal and harmonious relations with each other. A word as to each.

First, Rationalism trusts human reason. It begins with that. This is its positive starting-point. It accepts the fact of thought just as it accepts the fact of existence. And if it accept thought, it must accept the laws of thought,—it must accept the power of induction and deduction, of analysis, of generalization,—in short, the power of reasoning. It says—as men trust to reason, or mean to do so, in the ordinary affairs of life, believing it to be a safe guide and their destined guide, so must it be safe for them to follow it, and mean that they should follow it, in the highest subjects and interests that concern humanity. It says also that, as reason has given to human history its distinguishing glory and equipped the human race for its great career, so it may be trusted with the choicest and most revered treasures which that career has gathered and history holds in store. Out of the human mind, developing amidst and by means of the outward conditions of existence whatever these have been, have been produced all the great facts of this history and career. From it have come the successive phases of civilization, the philosophies, literatures, arts, sciences, governments, industrial inventions and enterprises, and—it is no begging of the question to say at this point—all the vast systems of religions also which have filled so great a place in the history of mankind. Even if a supernatural revelation be claimed, that too must have come through the human mind and submitted itself to the test of acceptance there. Nothing in human history has escaped that contact. No fact or institution or belief can be named that has not received something from that shaping power. The human mind, through its various faculties of reason, emotion, sentiment, aspiration, has been the chief builder of history. In it has been the prime motive and constant central agency of advancing civilization. And civilization, history, offers no fact which human thought by its laws may not be safely trusted to test. Thought in its essence is constructive. It will destroy no truth; it will destroy nothing that has in itself the elements of reality and permanence. Surely, Rationalism is safe and positive when it trusts the laws of human thought—of that human thought which dredges the seas, and tracks the ethers, and searches all the spaces between for its materials, and then tells us how a world was made. By that token it proves its kinship to the creative power that evolved the world.

We certainly need not fear, if we leave all phenomena freely open to its careful search. It is searching not for error, but for truth; and it carries in its bosom the test of truth.

Secondly, Rationalism accepts the historical fact of religion. It trusts the veracity of history in testifying to this fact,—not as to all the details of the fact, but as to the fact itself and its general features. Even though one be prepared to assert that religion is all a superstition and delusion and must eventually pass away, he must nevertheless admit that religion has existed and does exist as a fact,—that there are certain phenomena in the history of mankind that have been called by that name. He must also admit that these phenomena have filled a very large space in history; that what is called religion has been one of the mightiest powers in human affairs, that it has made and unmade states, moved individuals and communities to some of the greatest actions recorded of mankind, and shown itself everywhere, in barbarous as in civilized life, one of the most vital elements of human thought and conduct. And this fact of the existence of religion, with all its authenticated historical movements, beliefs, experiences, presents the phenomena which Rationalism accepts for investigation. These phenomena are the field of religious Rationalism, just as the phenomena of material nature are the field of natural science. Nor can these phenomena be lightly passed by as of little account. Let them be a delusion. Still, it were worth while for reason to study a delusion that has swayed the actions of millions of human beings in every age. But, in reality, the phenomena are most rich and varied in themselves. They include the religious history of all nations and races; the sacred books of all religions; the theological beliefs, traditions, ceremonials of every people; the development of religious ideas from the most primitive epochs of savage life to the most enlightened religious thought of the present age; the origin and growth of specific religions, and the personal history of their founders and prophets; the power of ecclesiasticism; the formation of sects; the different practices and institutions of worship; the various shapes, phases, dogmas into which the religious sentiment has been projected; the nature of the religious sentiment itself and the source of its power both in the character of a people and in individual life. All these belong to the phenomena presented in the simple fact of the historical existence of religion. And not these alone, but also features of more personal and psychological interest; as the prayers and vows of saints, the morbid consecration of the ascetic, the ecstatic communion of the mystic, the rapturous confessions of a man like Augustine, the serene piety of a Fénelon or a Channing, the severe, grim faith of a Calvin and the joyous, grateful faith of a Theodore Parker, the claims of transcendentalist and of traditionalist, the "Inner Light" of the Quakers, the visions of Swedenborg or of Jackson Davis, Father Taylor's shout of delight in camp-meeting revivals, and Dale Owen's testimony to "spirit-footfalls" from another world,—these, too, are a part of the great mass of phenomena which religion presents to the investigation of reason. Not that every thing presented is to be accepted as fact; the testimony is doubtless to be sifted; investigation is to be thoroughly applied to every alleged phenomenon to ascertain if it be actually what it purports to be. But even a belief that is proved to be erroneous, provided it be sincere, is a legitimate part of the phenomena. Every thing, whether belief or ceremony, that has had an actual existence in religious history makes a part of the subject matter of the rationalistic student of religion. And to this vast field of phenomena, stretching through all nations and races around the globe and back through all the ages, Rationalism brings the sincere purpose of impartial and adequate research and the determination to do exact justice to every form of belief and every expression of adoration, and to find the reality corresponding to and underlying the outward facts. With what correctness can such an attitude as this be characterized as merely critical and destructive? When the student thus attempts to find the normal and harmonious relation between human intelligence and the facts of the religious history of mankind, he is no iconoclast, but is helping rather to lay the foundations of belief so solidly that they can neither be overthrown by the advance of science nor shaken by the downfall of sectarian faith.

We have now examined the fundamental principles of Rationalism; and we must agree, I think, that they seem to be very positive and constructive. But we must look also into the practical operation of these principles, in order to make our statement complete. Set these principles at work,—what is the product? Is that negative or positive? This is the question we now turn to consider. What are the actual results of Rationalism?

We might naturally suppose that, since the principles are positive, the results as a whole would be positive. But it is at this point that the common charges of barren scepticism and negation are hurled with most confidence and energy. True, it is said, Rationalism has the same fundamental principles as natural science, and they are positive; but when these principles are applied to religious problems, nothing but destruction ensues. And then follow the specific charges, arraigning its iconoclasm. Rationalism, it is charged, destroys the claim of Christianity to be a specially revealed religion; it robs the Bible of all authority as an inspired book; it reduces Jesus to the position of a mere man; it tramples over the barrier between sacred and profane history; it gradually wears away the sentiment of worship and disintegrates religious institutions; it puts man alone in a trackless world, cut off from God, with no guide but his unaided reason; it takes away the foundations of historical fact from beneath him and leaves him in the air, "an endless seeker with no past behind him." It, in fine, so analyzes, criticises, and protests against the ordinary conception of Deity as narrowly to escape atheism, even if it does not actually fall into that pit of despair.

New let us examine the facts as suggested in these charges, and see if Rationalism does not furnish quite as positive results as does the popular religious faith that brings the charges.

Look first at the history of religious development. The popular view regards the Jewish and Christian portions of religious history as the only portions of much importance to study, since nowhere else, according to its theory, was divine power specially manifest. In Judaism and Christianity, the Almighty, it is said, has particularly revealed himself, while all the rest of the world lies in gross darkness and can only be enlightened and saved by the light to be reflected from this specially illuminated section of human history. Here, certainly, is denial quite as large as the affirmation,—a denial of inspiration and of providential light and guidance to all races and people save those who chance to come within the Hebrew and Christian lines of history. But Rationalism shows a much finer constructive element than that. Investigating the origin, nature, and progress of religious ideas, and applying the scientific method to the investigation, it is beginning to find a unity in all religious and historical copulating links that bind them all together into one grand system of evolution, no part of which has been wholly cut off from the light of pure truth or the guidance of a beneficent providence. Negative and destructive? If there be a religious theory that is entitled to be described by such adjectives, I should say it must be Calvinism,—which, if it be rigidly interpreted, must deny the saving presence of Deity to the vast majority of all the millions of human beings that have existed on this planet and doom them to irretrievable and everlasting perdition. That, certainly, is a theory that may be regarded as destructive in its results. But Rationalism is constructive and inclusive. It finds evidences of creative intelligence and love among all religious faiths. Through such researches as scholars are now making into ethnic and primitive religions, it is gathering the elements for reconstructing the entire religious history of mankind. In these researches even a savage myth is not thrown away as meaningless. It is studied, just as the geologist studies a fossil,—studied for the life of thought or emotion that once palpitated full of significance within it. Nothing is thrown away, not even a dogma or superstition, though it be no longer anywhere believed, but every thing is gathered up and investigated and studied for the meaning its existence once had. And out of these investigations is already beginning to appear the fair and symmetrical proportions of a new science,—the science of religion,—in which the specific religions fall into harmony as parts of the natural evolution of primitive ideas and sentiments. It is discovered that the lines which have been regarded as separating one religion from another, or religious history from human history in general, are arbitrary and supposititious. The idea of such lines representing supernatural and impassable barriers between the religions is the result of ignorance,—of a limited historical vision. As research deepens and knowledge extends, it is seen there are no such limits, but every where proofs of connection and identity. As Mr. Tylor, in his recent thorough work on Primitive Culture, well says,—“No religion of mankind lies in utter isolation from the rest, and even the thoughts and principles of modern Christianity are attached to intellectual clues which run back through far pre-Christian ages to the very origin of human civilization, perhaps even of human existence.”

There is, indeed, something magnificent in the constructive capacity of this rationalistic interpretation of religious history. Among the scholarly researches of this age, I know nothing of finer promise than these studies into the primitive and progressing faiths of different races and nations. The investigation is throwing light upon many questions. But especially is it bringing new and unexpected testimony to the fact of human unity and brotherhood. How the unravelling of popular legends and myths is revealing that the faiths are all linked on one thread, and that in substance they are one all round the globe! There is not a Christian church of America which does not have some elements that link the celebration back to Norse or Teutonic paganism as well as to events or beliefs in Judea. The cross which is lifted upon Christian churches and which the Catholic devotee wears around his neck as emblem of a faith born nineteen centuries ago, is a symbol also in heathen religions twice or thrice as old, and hence carries in itself not only the weight of its Christian significance but a reminiscence of human thoughts and hopes belonging to a past too remote to measure. And at this point it may be well to notice the charge that Rationalism has no past behind it,—that it would cut religion off from all historical antecedents and leave it afloat in the air. By the side of these researches into religious history and these facts, showing unbroken historical development which the research brings to light, the charge itself seems to be left rather afloat. Rationalism, indeed, believes that the constructive element in human history is as active in this present era as at any past epoch, and finds no one era in the past authorized to sit in judgment on the present.

But that it cuts off the present from the past is the most irrational of all charges. On the contrary, it is tracing those lines of natural historical evolution which bind race to race, and age to age, and present to past, by clamps that cannot be broken. So far from cutting off the past, Rationalism is making a longer and larger and stronger past, and is setting it so solidly beneath us and what we are to-day that criticism cannot anywhere find the finest seam into which it can thrust its sharpest blade to cleave us from it.

Now in this reconstruction of religious history it is, of course, true that the Hebrew and Christian scriptures lose that specific authority which has been attributed to them because of an alleged different origin from that of the sacred books of other religions. Like all records of the past, they must be tested by intelligent inquiry and their teachings submitted to our own sense of truth and right. But they are not for this reason discarded as worthless. Not a precept or legend or speculation or myth is there in them which does not have its significance. Even the stories of miracle, no longer credible as accounts of actual events, bear testimony to the childlike simplicity of primitive faith, and represent some actual phase of human thought as it has met and tried to solve the deep problems of life; while psalm and parable and prayer, the narratives of struggle with the pressing exigencies of existence, the utterances of spiritual aspiration and hope and beatitude in the midst of material cares and sordid desires, find a response in sentiments that are still vital in the human heart and connect us back to people of a far-off time and race, but living essentially the same experiences that are ours to-day. Rationalism, therefore, does not destroy any real value that the Bible possesses, though removing it from its place of official authority. Moreover, not only does it not take away our Bible, but it brings us more Bibles. It reverently gathers and studies the sacred books of all religions. It illustrates how the important vital principles of ethical and religious faith have found utterance in all the great religious systems; and shows us, hence, how deeply rooted these principles are in the very substance of human nature and with what confidence they may be expected to appear as soon as certain conditions of intelligence are presented.

In like manner, though it be true that Rationalism, in its reconstruction of religious history, places Jesus in the line of our natural humanity, it is not therefore destructive, but rather more largely and grandly constructive. Let Christendom celebrate his virtues, adore his saintship, marvel at his spiritual insight, affectionately rehearse the story of his career as it will, Rationalism responds, “All this is an outcome of our common human nature,—go and do it.” On the theory that Jesus is to be taken for an example, make him human, and then what was actual in him becomes possible for all; but make him God or a supernatural man, and how can he be a model for men of only natural endowments? As a man he becomes one with us. He proves what flowers and fruits can grow on this stock of our humanity. His gifts glorify the race. His career becomes an inspiring motive. His history, as Emerson has said, “is the history of every man, written large.” And if rational criticism shall show, as it probably will, that the common conception of Christendom with regard to the character of Jesus is largely ideal, that even the New Testament record began to idealize it, and that it has been further idealized since, still Rationalism has the advantage over the popular ecclesiastical theology in that it can fall back upon this idealizing power of the human mind as itself constructive. The human mind is thus shown to have been by the agency of its own ideals, its own thoughts and emotions, largely instrumental in the development and growth of Christianity. And whatever Rationalism may disprove and destroy in the outward records as historical realities, it cannot destroy this fertile capacity of the human consciousness itself. Even though criticism could resolve the gospels into elements wholly mythical, still the character and career of Jesus as an ideal conception would remain; and the elements of this conception must have come from human nature. And the human nature that could conceive such a story of life and is thus proved to have the germs of it in itself—what must it not be capable of doing in reality? And suppose that, when we put Jesus in the line of our natural humanity, we do bring into his company other great prophets and teachers, the teachers and prophets of other religions, what is that but additional proof that fine spiritual insight and lofty character and saintly devotion to the good of humanity are not so rare in the world as we have been accustomed to think? That intelligence, love, heroism, faith, are human attributes, and have found their great exemplars under various forms of belief and worship? Surely, this should not be regarded as a dangerous discovery, but rather as inspiring a better hope and courage. Rationalism does not thus tear the temple of religion down, but spreads its walls to admit a larger assembly.

And again, with regard to our conception of Deity: suppose that Rationalism, applying its principles of investigation to all the phenomena, material and mental, of the universe, shall very essentially modify that conception as it is commonly held. Shall we fear the result as irreparable destruction? Conceptions of Deity have been before modified in the history of human development, and yet humanity has not suffered injury by the change. The change has indicated progress. But suppose that now the conception of Deity as an individual being standing apart from the universe, creating it externally and then imparting to it its laws, and now ruling it and mankind from that exterior place of his habitation—suppose that that old idea should now give way before rational thought, and in place of it should come the conception of Deity as immanent in the universe; or a conception that should absolutely identify Creative Power with the natural energy, law, force, life of the universe itself, as the Law of all law, the Life of all life, as the Infinite unity of which all finite forms of existence are partial and incomplete manifestations,—the change, in my opinion would not be loss, but great gain. It would really be a larger and more satisfying idea. We should then be in the way towards reconciling religion and science, faith and reason; and more than that, we should have in our hands the clew towards a practical reconciliation of individual experience and conduct with the exigencies of universal law. We should then see that by no schemes of mediatorial redemption or supernatural answer to prayers, but by knowledge of and obedience to natural law, and by faithful conformity to our highest sense of truth and right, do we find the conditions of spiritual health and peace. And even in the bitterest trials of our lot, is it not more to think of this Infinite Life close at our hearts, close at the very spot of need, waiting to flow in by channels of natural energy for our healing at every solicitation of our co-operating wills, than to think of a distant Deity who is to help us from the heavens? To think of God as the One in the All, as the intelligent Energy in whose vitality I consciously share, as the Living Power developing in all forms of finite activity and bending them by inherent force of gravitation towards truth and goodness and beauty,—to think of Him as the wisdom and beneficence which are the very spirit of these laws that penetrate the universe and all the experiences of our lives,—that thought seems to me all-sufficing in its positive and constructive power, whether I am weak and need to be made strong, or sorrowing and troubled and need to find repose. I do not say that all persons would accept this as the rationalistic interpretation of the problem of Deity. But let reason give what interpretation it will of the creative Power of the universe, it can not separate us from the great lap of Nature; it cannot thus orphan us. Science itself is tracing our pedigree back to the primal motive Force, and showing how the one Life-power has been slowly, through the ages, accumulating intelligence, conscience, love, with which it has endowed us its latest children. Thus the Creative Power itself, pulsing in our life, holds us to the goal of rectitude and beneficence. It is paternal in its wisdom, it is motherly in its services for our welfare. And by no possibility can we be “cut off” from this sustenance and guidance. There is no such thing as “unaided human reason.” The human mind by the very conditions of its existence is open to these vital forces of Nature, and its fibres run down into them to find their nutriment. Whatever the Power be that gives law and vitality to the universe, that Power inheres in human reason also. Our life can in no way be separated from the Life that animates the whole. Come to what belief we may concerning the nature of the Infinite Power of Life, we cannot change the facts of our relation to it. In it or Him we must needs “live, and move, and have our being.” Theistic or atheistic opinion cannot change that fact. And then this solid fact, which even the scientific reason offers, that we are vitally and beneficently connected with the Highest Power of which we can conceive in the universe, what can be a firmer basis for belief or trust? If we hold that creating and sustaining Power is immanent in the universe, if we identify it with the organic energy and vitality of the universe, then do we also hold that intelligent and beneficent Providence is immanent and inherent in the natural laws and forces by which we have derived and continue our being. Not negative, then, but positive is his faith.

As to religious institutions and forms of worship, these will doubtless be changed in the future as they have been in the past. Every great epoch in religious history has modified the outward expressions of religion. But not for this reason has an epoch been regarded as destructive. Christianity annulled many of the ceremonials of Judaism and introduced its own methods of worship. Buddhism did the same with reference to Brahmanism, Protestantism with reference to Romanism. Yet these were all periods of vital and constructive faith; epochs of fresh life, not of decay. So now, Rationalism will probably not find its instrumentalities to any great extent in institutions and ceremonies that have been moulded by the spirit of past beliefs. It will shape its own. And these are already beginning to appear. You may find them in institutions and movements for philanthropic, educational, social, and humanitarian objects. Rationalism, true to its inner principles, must emphasize the supreme importance of noble character and true living. Such instrumentalities as may help to this end it will preserve and foster. But it must always regard the spirit of devotion as a more substantial and trustworthy fact than the form of devotion; “the beauty of holiness” as better than any ordinance of worship.

And here I ought to refer to the constructive power of Rationalism as shown by its ready and natural alliance with Social Science, but can only do so by the briefest allusion. Social Science, resting as it does upon rational knowledge of the laws of existence pertaining to human beings in their social relations, is another phase of the free development of reason. It is reason applied to the facts of social life. It belongs, therefore, to the same stock as religious Rationalism, and becomes its legitimate ally and agent in practical efforts for the promotion of human welfare. While theologians discuss the question whether the race has been tainted by Adam's fall, Rationalism says, Here are children so badly born and bred

These are a few only of the ways in which a great protest now will check this incipient revolution, and do great service to free religion. We urge them as reasons for pushing the Counter-Petition with increased vigor, and not resting till the mail-bags groan with their burden of lists. The Boston Investigator, which never falters in the service of civil and religious liberty, reports a single petition of a thousand names from Davenport, Iowa. Well done! Who will match it, or overmatch it? Let there be a generous rivalry in the matter. If any other paper can secure fifty thousand names to our twenty-five thousand, we shall rejoice to be outdone in such a cause; but we hope our friends will do no less well than others. The enterprise is not a useless one; and THE INDEX has no more important work than to urge it forward. Give us the hundred thousand names by the first of May!

Since writing the above, we learn that Rev. Mr. McAllister, Secretary of the "National Reform Association," will hold a public meeting in Boston early in April in order to push the Christian Amendment movement, and will be assisted by Rev. Dr. Miner, President of Tufts College, and Professor Seelye, of Amherst College; and that Rev. Mr. Mayo, of Cincinnati, will lecture during the month of April in Pittsburgh, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, and New York, under the auspices of the auxiliary societies in those cities. A meeting in favor of the movement in the Committee Room of the Boston Young Men's Christian Association is reported, at which Rev. Wm. Graham, E. S. Tobey, Esq., and Russell Sturgis, Jr., were appointed a committee to organize an auxiliary local association. Mr. McAllister reports that the Ministers' Association of the Orthodox Congregationalists and the Methodist Preachers' Association are getting interested in the movement; also that Rev. Gilbert Haven, editor of Zion's Herald, is a convert to the cause, as indeed had already appeared in his paper. It may not be generally known that "the General Assembly of the Old School Presbyterian Church endorsed the amendment unanimously at its sessions in Newark, in the year 1864."

The Christian Statesman (Philadelphia), from which we derive the above information, also says:—

"Since the Cincinnati Convention, the work has been prosecuted with increased interest and vigor. We have accounts from every quarter of meetings to hear the reports of delegates and ratify the resolutions of the Convention; of public discussions in lyceums, colleges, and meetings for that purpose, and of a general demand for information on the subject."

We mention these facts because they show so plainly that the movement is gaining headway among the Evangelical churches, and that it is time for the liberals to act with energy. Again and again we repeat that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Let no one think it useless to get names to our remonstrance. They cannot be got too early, too numerous, or too fast. When the cholera is abroad, it will not do to despise sanitary laws; and the cheapest of all remedies is—prevention.

BEECHER AT HIS BEST.

It has been the lot of Henry Ward Beecher to have many words put into his mouth that he never said. We are therefore naturally shy of holding him responsible for the poorest things attributed to him; and are almost afraid to believe that he has said the best. Of these best things the following seems one of the very best. It is straying about the newspapers with his name appended:—

CONSCIENCE.—Men have the impression that the conscience is to a man's soul very much what the head-light is to a locomotive—a strong light with a reflector; and that it throws a beam right ahead in the middle of the night, lifting the track up clearly into the engineer's sight, so that he may see the obstructions, or the track, as the case may be. The conscience is no such thing. It no more determines what is right than the principle of taste determines what is beauty, or than the desire of acquiring property determines what would be successful in business. If conscience is an unerring guide, how is it that men have always been erring in nothing so much as in things which appertain to conscience? How is it that, now, no two men can agree on any one subject in all its shades and applications? What is right? Hardly two men can be found to give a common answer to that question. Everybody believes that the right ought to rule; but what is right, is always the problem. If conscience had nothing better to tell men than that the right should prevail, it would not be of much service to them. I could have got along without a conscience to tell me that. I knew it anyhow. But when in the ten thousand complications of human life, when in the play and interplay of a hundred feelings, I ask my conscience, "Now, to-day, what is right?" it is as dumb as a bat. My conscience does not help me in this regard. What do I then? I am obliged to take up the case, and think it all over, and put one thing against another, and go through such a process of reasoning as a lecturer or teacher would resort to for the solution of any philosophic truth; and so I come to the judgment that, on the whole, this or that is right, for such and such reasons. And the moment I say, "It is right," down goes the seal of my conscience, and fixes that decision. It does not interpret it, but ratifies or enforces it. It is the reason that determines it.—H. W. Beecher.

Are we not right in claiming that times are changed, when the foremost Evangelical minister in America, the professor of preaching in Yale College, utters truth like this? To find what is right, "take up the case and think it all over." Not a word about searching the Scriptures. Not a word about "looking to Jesus," or any other great and good teacher. Solve your problem of duty for yourself, precisely as a Jew would solve it, or a Mohammedan, or Socrates, or Buddha.

When Buddha says, in "The Wheel of the Law,"—"If any of you know of yourselves that anything is good and not evil, praised by wise men, advantageous and productive of happiness, then act abundantly according to your belief," his ethical method is essentially like Mr. Beecher's. In short, the pulpit orator of Brooklyn here frees us from the bondage of creed, and brings us out upon the high table-land of Natural Religion.

If now this is to be done in the most difficult cases, why not in all? The whole principle of the supremacy of the Inner Light is here. If I know a thing to be wrong, according to Mr. Beecher, I know it not because Moses or Jesus, the Father or the Scriptures, have taught it, but because it commends itself to this inward decision. If this is to be supreme, all other authorities are secondary. If there is a collision, they must yield. Follow out Mr. Beecher's system, and if you fail to be convinced by all these outward guides, they must for the time be set aside. You must follow your own conscience and reason, even to the exclusion of Moses, Jesus, the Father and the Scriptures, all together. You must go alone, without support from any of them, with nobody on your side but the Creator, who gave you reason and conscience, and bade you accept their guidance. Amen to that!

T. W. H.

MORE PETITIONS.

The following additional lists of signatures to the Counter-Petition against the Christian Amendment to the United States Constitution, have been received since our last issue:—

Mr. Otto Kaross, Milwaukee, Wis., sends four hundred and ten names (mostly Germans); Dr. James Fischer, Shreveport, La., sixty-three; Mr. F. Edson, Hadley, Mass., thirty-four; Mr. C. C. Whitman, Westford, Mass., seventy-three; Mr. A. G. Norman, North Lawrence, Kan., sixty-two; Mr. D. M. Martin, Pine Grove, Pa., seventy-six; Mr. H. D. Sissons, Mill River, Mass., six; Mr. Jerome Hurlburt, Manistee, Mich., thirty-six; Mr. J. S. Caulkins, Thornville, Mich., twenty-four; Mr. E. H. Heywood, Princeton, Mass., sixty-one; Mr. John Lowe, Monteville, Ill., eighty-six; Mr. Sylvanus Haag, Whitestown, Y. Y., eighty; Mr. Geo. Nichols and Mr. A. Huff, Tontogany, Ohio., sixty-nine; Mr. A. Huff, Tontogany, Ohio., eighty-nine; Mr. J. M. Ozler, Olivesburg, O., fifty-eight; Mr. M. A. Root, Bay City, Mich., one hundred and sixty-nine; Rev. G. W. Richmond, D. D., Plainfield, Mich., eighty-six; Mr. Matthias Wriest, Tripoli, Iowa, forty; Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson, Pierce City, Mo., eleven; Mr. T. A. Spaulding, Berrien Springs, Michigan, fifteen; Mr. Marc Thrane, Chicago, Ill., thirty-nine; Mr. S. R. Hopkins, Rossville, Kan., sixty-five; Mr. E. L. Baker, Topeka, Kan., seventy-three; Mr. Alfred Keyser, Kalamazoo, Mich., seventy-five; Mr. W. A. Lathrop, Cleveland, O., one hundred and thirty-one; Mr. D. C. Horton, Springfield, Mass., one hundred and twenty-one; Mr. Chas. M. Boutelle, Chester, Minn., five; Mr. Geo. W. Gist, Letart, West Va., one hundred and twenty-three; Mr. E. H. Bearse, Harwich, Mass., fourteen; Mr. O. K. Robinson, Oswego, N. Y., one hundred and thirty-five; Dr. N. B. Butler, La Harpe, Ill., two hundred and fifty-five.

The number of names thus far acknowledged in THE INDEX is about TWENTY-FIVE THOUSAND.

DEMOCRACY UNPAINTED.

In his lecture upon "Social Ideals" in THE INDEX of February 10, Mr. Wasson animadverted upon the Declaration of Independence in a manner both startling and novel. "This doctrine," he says, "would be quite as suitable to rats as human beings. . . . It is to-day furnishing the logic of 'free love,' and, if the premises be admitted, an unanswerable logic."

To reply to the first half of this remarkable statement, it seems only necessary to indicate the difference between rats and men—a difference too often overlooked by the school of political philosophers to which Mr. Wasson belongs. Another school, one which he ordinarily despises for its logic as well as its claims, commits the same blunder. The most notorious free-lover, referring to a certain class of persons, in THE INDEX, March 9, says that incontinence is "the natural expression of their natures," and, boldly proclaiming the right of her clients to pursue their vocation, she professes to find her logic in our Magna Charta. The readers of THE INDEX, however, will remember how at the first challenge free-love yielded the position and sought refuge in outer darkness. When last heard from, the right of free-lovers to liberty was only a right so long as they succeeded in pursuing happiness in secret—that is, in concealing their crime from society. It was cruel in "free love" thus to abandon the "premises," just at the moment its "logic" was pronounced "unanswerable." Will the "rats" remain true, or will they as hastily desert the sinking ship?

In the articles published in these columns and now reviewed by Mr. Wasson, I took exception to his construction and interpretation of the Declaration, and offered the suggestion that Jefferson and his companions did not overlook the difference between rats and men, but proceeded upon the assumption that man is a rational being, invested with divine attributes as well as animal instincts, and therefore that, when we attempt to interpret their language, we must keep this assumption in view. The "inalienable rights" implied in human nature grow out of the divine character of human nature, and in themselves imply correct social relations. Our forefathers did not ignore either the animal or the divine of humanity. I attempted to enforce this suggestion by an appeal to the Declaration itself and to the interpretation of it as indicated in the preamble to the Constitution. In his letter Mr. Wasson does not notice this line of argument, but proposes another method of inquiry. He does not pretend to maintain his own theory, but criticises mine sharply, and refers to the past and present conditions of American politics and society, as a sufficient refutation of it. In these he finds the result of a correct development and application of the principle of democracy, and to this principle he charges all that is despotic in our government, corrupt in politics, and anarchical in society.

Now it seems to me that only by reversing our history from the establishment of the government to the present day, can such a charge be sustained or such a conclusion be reached. The facts are (and my friend urges the value of facts), that African slavery, so far from being a product of democracy, was in constant and terrible warfare with it, until overthrown. Democracy does not encourage ignorance and vice, but pleads for the education of all classes. Democracy does not enfranchise any man "regardless of personal worth," but, with some wise limitations and exceptions, it enfranchises the multitude, because it recognizes personal worth. It does not foster political corruption; on the contrary it disgraces Tweed and forces his retainers to disgorge. It does not disfranchise the Chinaman, but seeks his elevation to the full rights of citizenship. It does not disfranchise woman, but protests against her present legal classification with idiots and criminals. The history of this country is the history of a people slowly but surely realizing the full import of a principle which at the beginning was as fiercely denied as it was forcibly maintained, and which even now is but partially assented to and is inadequately applied.

One of the most memorable of General Grant's campaigns is the one in the Wilderness, where, suffering daily defeats, he finally won a victory that converted previous disaster into substantial success. In like manner, democracy has pushed forward regardless of reverses, and we owe to it to-day, very largely, such social and political freedom as we enjoy, in which the intelligence and morals of the people, unequalled by those of any nation on the earth, find favorable opportunity for growth and culture. Let us welcome the consideration of facts and of experience, to which our friend invites us, and confidently appeal to the history of our own country, where democracy has obtained a foothold, and to the history of other nations, where it has been vigorously suppressed, for confirmation of our faith.

Following Mr. Wasson, I will leave the original question and consider the very amusing and summary manner in which he disposes of reformers. He remembers that many abolitionists refused to bend the knee to Baal, denounced the government for its recreancy to democracy and declined to vote for the President of a slave oligarchy. In his view this fidelity to principle was a virtual denial of faith. He discovers some one habitually protesting against political demagogues (against General Butler for instance), against the despotism of sex, the overgrown power of corporations, the exorbitant claims of capital upon the industry of the people, in short against every perversion of the democratic principle,—and he says to him, "You do lip service to your 'ideal,' but this persistent protest in its behalf belies you." Conscientious reformers are thus, with innocent gravity, reduced to one of two alternatives; they must abandon their principles or forego their protest against the violation of them!

Reply to personal criticism is always of doubtful taste and utility, but as my friend has broadly intimated that I abstain from political action, he and the reader will pardon me for saying that herein he does me unintentional injustice. So long as a vote implied an oath to support slavery, I withheld mine; but since slavery was abolished I have voted and otherwise performed political duty. In the second of my articles (that on the "Higher Law") noticed by Mr. Wasson, I expressly urge the necessity for the performance of such duty.

But to return to the original question,—What is the ground of our faith in American democracy? Mr. Wasson in his lecture refers to the Declaration of Independence for an exposition of democracy, and declares it to be based upon self-interest—pure individualism; that social rights and duties are excluded, that "rats" and "free love" are, equally with human beings and virtue, entitled to all the rights guaranteed by it. I accept his statement that the Declaration is the true exposition of democracy, but maintain that it finds its warrant in the divine character of humanity, and that it implies social as well as individual rights and obligations. He responds,—"Oh yes! The old, old story." From time immemorial the rulers of men have based their claims upon the assumption of a divine right to rule. Whether it be a family, a priesthood, or an aristocratic class, in each and every case this divinity is asserted as the principle of authority. Is there no significance in this "fact"? Is it merely "a subjective imagination" that invests it with meaning, that sees in it the partial expression, the dim recognition of a grand, living truth? Kings, priests and aristocrats discover in themselves, and themselves alone, this divine character, and therefore this right to authority; democracy announces the divine character of all men, the consequent equality of all men, and therefore the right of the people to be their own rulers.

Democracy trusts the people, for it is the people. My friend should help, not hinder it; and help it he does when, with an eloquence and power superior to that of most men, he pleads for personal integrity and social welfare. If, however, he must insist upon seeing only the refuse of European despotism as it is deposited in New York and used by demagogues—if this and "free love" are the only results of democracy visible to him, let him not be discouraged; let him rather find consolation in such reflections as escaped the lips of De Tocqueville, when he too was depressed through fear and doubt. He said:—"We may naturally believe that it is not the singular prosperity of the few, but the greater well-being of all, which is most pleasing in the sight of the Creator and Preserver of men. What appears to me to be man's decline is to His eye advancement. What afflicts me is acceptable to Him. A state of equality is perhaps less elevated, but it is more just, and its justice constitutes its greatness and beauty. I would strive, then, to raise myself to this point of Divine contemplation, and thence to view and to judge the concerns of men."

B. P. H.

"Follow me," said Jesus.

"There is no leadership in the world now possible except the leadership of ideas," says George Jacob Holyoake.

Holyoake is right—or will be when the world has learned its lesson.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

SAFENA; OR, THE MENTAL CONSTITUTION (published by "The Matuna," which the reader may locate in the moon for aught that the title-page says to the contrary) is such an outburst of supernal wisdom from the brain of Arthur Merton as defies all criticism. It is above and beyond us. Philosophers so profound as to find no expression for their thought without inventing a language on purpose to convey it should not send their books to THE INDEX for notice, unless accompanied by a lexicon. Fourierism, phrenology, and free-love might squabble for possession of "Safena," as Michael and Lucifer fought for the body of Moses; common sense would never put in a claim for it. If our readers desire to know more of this wonderful work, they must send x pennies to —, and wait patiently for the result.

THE INFINITE AND THE FINITE (Roberts Brothers, Boston) is a little exposition of New Church doctrine (Swedenborgianism, as the uninitiated are apt to call it) by Prof. Parsons, of the Harvard Law School. It is too vague, however, to be of much value as a statement; and it presupposes too much acquaintance with Swedenborg's writings to be easily intelligible by those who have not studied them. What we least like about it is the dualism of "natural" and "spiritual" on which the "Second Christian Dispensation" is based; for the better science and philosophy of the age are seeking to interpret human nature, like universal Nature, in the light of unity. What we like best in the little book is its calm and contemplative tone. A very pleasant impression is given by the following passage (p. 181):—

"We who have faith in this latest revelation must of course believe that it is in advance of all that have come before it. But we do not think that we, personally, are in advance of all that are outside our boundaries; and God forbid that we should be so blind as not to see in some of those who know nothing of our doctrines,—or, knowing them, cannot see their truth,—purity, charity, living faith, and excellence of motive and of conduct, before which we bow with reverence, and in which we would find examples and incentives."

Such catholicity of spirit as this passage illustrates commands respect, and inclines the sceptical reader to leave the New Church to enjoy its mild and harmless mysticism undisturbed.—Price, $1; for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

RADICAL PROBLEMS (Roberts Brothers, Boston), by Rev. C. A. Bartol, D.D., contains essays on "Open Questions," "Individualism," "Transcendentalism," "Radicalism," "Theism," "Naturalism," "Materialism," "Spiritualism," &c.,—seventeen in all. It is the work of a poet-thinker, not leading you step by step over the dusty road, but catching you up and setting you on peak after peak, to be awed and delighted with the glory of the landscape. True, you do not know just where you are, nor how you got there; but the glimpses of beauty that ravish your eye make you exclaim, like one that is said also to have seen wonderful things on a Mount—"It is good for us to be here!" If the vision vanishes after a while, and the returning dulness of the common makes the prose of life seem a little more prosaic than ever, that, too, is but repeating the legendary experience.

We can give no account of this book. It is to be heard, like a song,—or seen, like a rainbow. To be able to appreciate it, and to judge it as it ought to be judged, is proof of a spirit fine by nature and twice refined by culture. We do not think it will be a popular book. But the best part of "the people" will hold it as a treasure; for it is full of beauty, full of wisdom, full of most expensive and vivifying meditation. Dr. Bartol has more continuity than Emerson, but shares Emerson's low estimate of the "logical understanding," and makes no attempt to throw his thought into logical form. Readers destitute of imagination, therefore, will be apt to echo the mathematician's criticism on "Paradise Lost"—"The book may be all well enough, but I don't see that it proves anything!" No, it does not prove anything; but it teaches much, and quickens more.

If we were to argue against some positions assumed here and there in its pages, we should fall into the absurdity of one who should attempt to "photograph a fit;" for the positions shift from sentence to sentence. One corrects another. For instance, in the essay on "Individualism," we are not pleased with such a sentiment as this:—"The sceptics about God and heaven, however polite and complaisant, will be found in the last analysis self-seekers, and no devotees of their kind." There is cruel and harsh injustice in that judgment. But only a few pages later we read:—"I will not carry my blame of an opinion into my treatment of the man." Let us take this sentence as an apology for the other; for it far better voices the large and noble spirit of the writer.

Here are a few of the jewels that sparkle on these golden pages:—

"It is held dangerous to unsettle a common faith. Not if it is unsettled by thought! Better unsettle your house in season, if it rest on the sand."

"Take up your candles, carry them forth from every altar, and set them in the courts of Mammon, till all its dusky corners are lighted, and every unrighteous plot exposed. A lamp burning in a store is greater safeguard than a lock."

"Every pure thought is a glimpse of God. We have seen him, though the sight faded the next moment for ever away."

"Is number virtue? How easy to outvote God, who is only One!"

"I confess I am not moved when the table tips. The wonder is just as great when it reposes firmly on its legs."

"The man that first discovered sin went further than Columbus. Nothing but virtue could ever become aware of vice."

"O student of these fair appearances, observer of this ghost of God we call the world! Before you close the catalogue, account for yourself. Will you tell us why you are here? Who woke your curiosity, and started you on your track? Was there no lout-gator of your researches, or Source of your delight? What is the name of That which persuades you not chaos, but cosmos, is all?"

"The equilibrium is disturbed? Not God's or Nature's, when we miss our footing, and are overset. 'I did not know,' you say. Of all parties the Know-Nothing's was the worst."

But we must reluctantly pause, and resist the fascination. Reading these unequal pages which are studied so closely with brilliancy brings back to memory the close of a summer's afternoon at Hampton Beach, as we lay on the warm sand looking eastward, with the sun behind. The waves were dark and bewilderingly restless, rolling in unceasingly towards the shore. But as each breaker drew back for its plunge like a rearing horse, what marvellous emerald green, transparent as if we could look miles into its depths, suddenly burst into view! And a second later, as the slant sunbeams struck the toppling crest, what a glory of gold flashed suddenly along the beach from end to end, crowning the green surge with a brief but insupportable splendor just before it perished in a sheet of rushing foam! Such is the surprise of great thoughts, obeying their own law as they roll landwards from the immeasurable Ocean of Mind beyond our ken.—Price, $2; for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

ERRATA.—In the lecture on "The Character of Buddha," in our issue of March 16, we are requested to make the following corrections:

Page 82, col. 2, l. 63, for "their" read "these."
 " " " 72, " "selling" " "making."
 " " " 33, " "invited" " "visited."
 " 83, " 1, " 76, omit the words "make any."
 " 83, " 2, " 35, for "the human race has never got beyond" read "the human race has now got beyond."

The first and last of these errors were typographical: the other three are in the original manuscript.

In making these corrections we deviate from the rule published in THE INDEX every week; and the present exception must not be urged as a precedent. It is literally impossible to prevent all errors; and a large proportion of the few that occur are due to the illegibility or carelessness of manuscripts. As we comply strictly with this rule in the case of our own articles, we think it not unreasonable to expect a similar compliance from others; and we shall be obliged in the future to adhere to our rule without exception.

Father Damen, a Catholic priest who boasts that he has converted five hundred Protestants to his religion, made the following statement in a recent sermon in Brooklyn:—

"No money has ever been paid in the Catholic Church, and is not paid now, in order to obtain pardon of sins."

Why, in the name of common sense, what else is the money paid for? Is the Church anything but a great machine for getting sins pardoned, and was ever a penny paid into its treasury for any other conceivable purpose? Tetzels did the thing a little coarsely, perhaps, but Father Damen is in the same business himself. Let him convince his "five hundred converts" that they can get their sins nicely pardoned without turning a cent over to Mother Church, and he will find that the money and time he devoted to converting them were a little the worst investment he ever made. Such indiscretions will reduce the reverend Father to rags. It will never do in this way to kill the "goose" that lays the golden eggs.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

"SENSE AND NONSENSE IN THEOLOGY."

CHICAGO, Feb. 22, 1872.

DEAR MR. ABBOT:—

I happen just now to pick up the Independent for Jan. 25th, and observe its article on "Dropping the Theological Nonsense." Why have you not given it a return shot? Is the Independent so stupid as not to know the difference between theological sense and theological nonsense? Or does it suppose its constant readers are so stupid and muddled and mixed in their knowledge of words or of ideas, as not to see through its very loose attempt to confound the significance of the two words religion and theology?

You should never presuppose in the Independent either the brains or the candor to see, in a term like "theological nonsense," the ordinary and almost universally acknowledged meaning, but should remember that, if they can strain some uncommon meaning out of it, they will, just as many liberals claim the right to invent a new meaning for the word Christianity. So I beg you to speak by the book when you are likely to run against the Independent; and would it not be well to send their man an unabridged dictionary?

To relate my experience as they do in prayer meetings, I may say that I have read the Independent regularly for ten or twelve years, without finding as much inciting me to "do justly, love mercy, and walk humbly," as I have found in THE INDEX in less than two years. I called myself a Christian. But Christianity drove nearly all the religion out of me; and a universe full of free and rational religious agencies, among which THE INDEX holds a high place, have, I humbly trust, restored religion, with not enough of any sort of theology to over-balance it. Few know how common is my case as to the first part of the experience, and how much need there is of some INDEX to point the way to a religion not built upon dogma, not roofed with superstition, not begirt by crude absurdities, or crammed to suffocation with "theological nonsense." An organ which teaches people much in the way of "doing justly" will not urge them to sneak out of just punishment by grasping at blood-atonement. If a man's wishes shape his creed, as many Orthodox assert, those who "love mercy" will not believe much in the devil, or take large stock in hell; and those who have a monopoly of "salvation" and who know God's will so well that they have printed it all out for his family use, would do well not to prate much of humility.

I trust the charge of narrowness does not make you sleepless nights. Most of those who make it are as broad in vision as a goose in a good-sized puddle, discerning in its horizon the distant line of the ocean, and imagining that boundless body to be more narrow than its own pond.

Will not every honest and wide-awake soul soon shake off that puling sentimentality misnamed religion, with that vast mass of nonsense they call theology, and unite with us in striving by every true and wholesome means to bring in a revival of pure and undefiled, rational and free religion, in the place of the stupendous indifference which we, as well as "professors of theology," greatly deplore?

SENSE.

[The reason why we have not "given a return shot" is that we have ceased to expect from the Independent either honest or just treatment. We are willing to carry on a fair controversy with any one, according to the rules of discussion recognized by all gentlemen; but we will have nothing to do with those who wilfully slander and misrepresent. The editorial writer in the Independent knew that he put a construction on our language that we did not intend; and as this was a weak attempt to revenge himself on THE INDEX for convicting him of having garbled a quotation in order to sustain false witness against his neighbor, we took no notice of it. Such laurels as he has won he is welcome to wear. We shall not deprive him of them.—Ed.]

"THEOLOGICAL NONSENSE."

The Independent reads THE INDEX a lugubrious lecture for using the phrase "theological nonsense," insisting that it (THE INDEX) has dropped all religion, and is sailing under false colors when it claims to be a religious paper. It insists also that the phrase betrays a ruthless disrespect for the opinions of mankind. It closes about a column of pious cant by expressing the hope that such words were "a slip only," and adds,—"But what a slip!" It is difficult fitly to characterize such pious drivel as this, on the one hand, or, on the other, the meanness displayed by quoting, as the Independent does, a single sentence from THE INDEX and refusing even to let its readers see the paragraph in which it was found. But the Independent is such a small sheet, we will excuse it for its apparent illiberality on this score. What a profoundly logical conclusion the Independent reaches, when it declares that THE INDEX necessarily drops all religion when it drops "theological nonsense!"

Is there no religion, then, outside of the so-called Christian theology, supposing it not to be nonsense, and the Independent to be the judge of what is Christian theology? If Christ taught no theology, did he therefore teach no religion? If he taught theology, or a theology, what was it? No answer can be given which will satisfy a half dozen of the three hundred sects into which Christendom is divided. But if he taught a theology, was it the sum total of his religion? Did he then teach nothing which pertained to this world alone? Does a Christian drop all religion, if he happens to drop a theological dogma which the Independent thinks is taught in the New Testament? Finally, is there no religion except what the Independent is pleased to teach? We rejoice to know that the world has not come to be so spiritually poor as the Independent imagines. It may flatter itself that what is not comprehended by its clerical scribblers is not worth knowing; that they fill its columns with all that is valuable in religion; that all else is "unreligious religion," and that there is no "theological nonsense" suffered to pollute its pages.

But it is a blessing that this delusion is not shared by many outside of its editorial staff. The religion of the Independent in Orthodox circles is regarded very much as the Independent regards the religion of THE INDEX. The "theological nonsense" which it has seen fit to drop would make a bigger book than that which it clings to, Orthodoxy being the judge. While the Independent repudiates the dogma of Adam's sin, close communion, and other dear old "theological nonsense" which the Orthodox church clings to, by what process of reason or religion does it condemn THE INDEX for dropping what it clings to? How does the Independent infallibly determine that the "nonsense" which it has dropped is really worse than the "nonsense" which it holds on to, but which THE INDEX has dropped? Orthodoxy says that the religion of the Independent is as "unreligious" as that of THE INDEX, a good deal more dangerous, and not half so consistent.

It is true, as the Independent alleges, that THE INDEX "has had a house-cleaning," and has made thorough work, and got rid of worthless rubbish from garret to cellar, while the Independent has only white-washed the outside, and cleaned the front-yard of the old theological rookery in which it resides. It has cleansed the outside of the platter, while the inside is full of corruption and the dead bones of a defunct theological system. Within the last fifty years, while crying "Wolf!" lustily all the while, Orthodoxy has actually thrown overboard at least half of its pets. The wolf of Free Religion will within the next half-century compel it to cast overboard the other half—the half that the Independent clings to. That thrifty concern, however, will cling no longer than it pays to cling to Egyptian fables, mis-called religion. This is, at least, a consolation.

A. J. GROVER.

NOTEWORTHY BENEFACTENCE.

DETROIT, Feb. 20, 1872.

It is not the province of THE INDEX to publish news, or to glorify individuals, but it gives me pleasure to record a fact which is somewhat in the newsy and personal category—not for its newsy or personal character, but for its general interest as related to the social condition of the people.

Captain E. B. Ward, of this city, has for some time had in contemplation a plan of benevolence which he is about putting in execution. His plan is the erection of a commodious structure, to be called the Detroit Academy of Music, designed to furnish a place of resort and amusement for the people. It comprehends a free reading-room and library, and halls where amusements of an elevating character may be had, and where lectures and other intellectual exercises may be given, at such small expense as to place them within the reach of those who are now debarred from such privileges on account of the expense. Captain Ward has bought for the purpose a fine site on the corner of Fort and Shelby streets, and will commence the erection of the building with the opening of spring. In architectural beauty it is designed to surpass any structure now in the city, public or private. It will have two audience chambers, one capable of seating sixteen hundred, and the other six hundred people. These, with the library and reading-rooms, and a restaurant, will comprise what may be termed the public features of the proposed edifice, while the rents from stores and private business places will be relied upon mainly to pay the interest on its cost.

But it is the plan itself, rather than its details, that is of interest. It is social and moral problems that are now especially demanding solution. Our false religious system, which has gone to seed under the torrid sun of American Puritanism, has ever sought to draw a definitive line of demarcation between the sheep and the goats. The American Church has drawn this line so narrowly that it loses but a very small number of sheep and a very great preponderance of goats. And the sheep are continually and persistently jumping over into the goat pasture. It is presumed that the sheep are well cared for in the church fold, while in the estimation of the Church the goats are not worth caring for. But the disproportion of sheep and goats—or of saved and lost—is so great as to be really alarming. Political and social economy look at the problem with different eyes from the Church, and the man who shall prove himself a good shepherd, or goat-herd, will do the State some service, even though he may be compelled to take a position at the left of the mythical King. The plain meaning of this is that the Church, by its ostracism of rational amusement, has alienated the affections of the people from it; its absurd theology cannot hold the critical mind of the age through the reasoning faculties; and its hell and damnation have lost their terror-inspiring power. The result is that the mass of the people are outside of the Church, but yet, having been accustomed to regard the Church as the source of organic social life, no substitute has yet been devised. Our social life is chaotic and anarchical. This is the explanation of the alarming prevalence of dissipation among the young. The Church has denied them rational amusement and natural recreation, hoping to drive them into the Church, but it has driven them into the grog shop and the brothel instead. It is certainly by no means a tender arrangement of the Church on the one hand and the grog shop and the brothel on the other, the comparatively free choice of the young inclines to the latter against the force of custom, of public opinion, of social ties, and of domestic restraint.

Every governmental and social structure, so long as it ministers to the natural wants of the people, keeping step with rational intellectual and moral progress, will retain their affection and support. It is the tendency of governmental and social structures, however, to fossilize. They fall to work in harmony with the forces that they are intended to conserve; they thus lose the affection and support of their constituency, and seek to compel their further allegiance by severe measures. They then become despotisms. Or, to put the case differently, they seek, by severe measures, to cure evils which their wisdom and foresight should have prevented. These remedies may prolong their existence, but cannot cure. The Church seeks by prohibitive legislation against drinking, and by punitive statutes against social vices, to cure evils which its own failure to minister to the social needs of the people has rendered possible. For an analogous reason it is seeking a religious amendment to the Constitution, that it may perpetuate as a legal fiction what has no existence as a moral fact.

Social reconstruction and regeneration must constitute the bulk of the work that is demanded of rationalism. Society should minister to the social wants of the race. The churches belong to those who control them, and they have a right to make them the habitation of bats and owls, and to exclude God's sunlight from them, if they choose. Society should provide its people with temples for the free exercise of all the rational attributes of the person—with libraries, with baths, with conservatories, with theatres and dancing halls. It should do this as fully as it seeks to meet the demand for primary education. Our school edifices, instead of being made praying shops and places for mere dry study, should be given a wider range of uses.

But these things are in the future, and in their absence it is gratifying that private munificence seeks in some degree to compensate for the deficiency. The particular enterprise under notice originates in private munificence. It originates also with one who is known far and wide as a liberalist and rationalist. Fortunate also is it that Captain Ward, having amassed ample wealth by an active business life, can well afford the outlay, and can well defy the scowls and the horrible machinations of bigotry. Who of the wealthy liberalists in the other great cities of the country will follow his example?

I am alone responsible for what I have written. It is proper to say that it is without the knowledge of, and may not be approved by, the gentleman who is prominently named.

S. B. McCracken.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the ODEON, in the new EXCHANGE BUILDING on St. Clair Street, opposite the Wagon and Horse Bazaar, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

On Sunday, March 31, Mr. PARKER PILLBURY will lecture twice, in the morning on "Conscience—its Place and Power in Human Nature," and in the evening on "Self-Made Men and Society-Made Men, or Men With Conscience and Men Without." On Monday Evening he will lecture on "The Late Cincinnati Convention; or, God the Father, Son, and Holy Bible in the Federal Constitution."

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending March 23d.—Miss C. E. Nourse, $23; J. B. Stallo, $2; G. K. Withington, $2; H. Strause, $2; Dr. N. B. Wolf, $2; Dr. R. Bartholow, $2; Jno. French, $2; Harry R. Smith, $2; A. G. Kinsie, $2; Jno. D. Caldwell, $2; Joseph Transience, $2; A. M. Greeley, $2; E. B. Baker, $2; W. J. Godfrey, $2; James A. Clayton, $4 25; Henry C. Decker, $2; Miss Marian Hovey, $2; C. Baidas, $2; Ed. Andrews, $2; Mrs. A. Edgely, $2; E. T. Cook, $2; V. Averill, $2; Chas. Zoigler, $2; J. J. Mayer, $2; Ada P. Gist, $2; Chas. Mason, $2; H. L. Green, $2; H. Clay Ham, $2; J. M. Oiler, $2; Fran- cis H. Lee, $2; Herbert Fletcher, $2; D. C. Branch, $2; R. S. Hopkins, $2; G. P. Baskette, $2; Wm. F. Andrews, $2; Dr. H. S. Shoemaker, $2; John Lowe, $2; George Fleck, $2; Rev. E. H. Hall, $2; Mrs. E. Denton, $2; E. P. Hurd, $2; G. W. Topping, $2; Wm. McKen- zie, $2; James Forbes, $2; Geo. Riker, $2; Maggie Devoe, $2; John Wilson, $2; M. H. Doolittle, $2; J. P. Smith, $2; Martha Chadlock, $2; Toledo Printing Co., $10; Herbert Fletcher, $2; P. M. Barnard, $1 25; Mrs. C. Stratton, $2; Sarah A. Davis, $2.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for one Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. PROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents conceptions of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no able, firmer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. R. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—God in the Constitution? Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—The Sabbath, by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—Compulsory Education, by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. PROTHINGHAM, is a satirical yet felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution, the list of its most prominent supporters, and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, stated and answered from a Bible standpoint, a pamphlet published by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at this office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO.

SOW THE SEED!

THE "IMPEACHMENT OF CHRISTIANITY," published in the first number of the third volume of THE INDEX, has been electrotyped, and an edition of Ten Thousand Copies has been printed in the form of

A Cheap Tract for Gratuitous Distribution!

It is intended to circulate One Hundred Thousand Copies during the current year. In order to accomplish this purpose, we must rely upon the co-operation of our active sympathizers.

☞ Packages of these TRACTS, containing any desired number of copies, will be mailed to any address on receipt of enough money to defray postage, and whatever additional sums, large or small, the generosity of distributors may prompt them to add.

Of course, money will be needed to carry out our intentions; but we urge every one who believes that THIS TRACT WILL DO GOOD, and who is willing to distribute copies of it, to send in an order at once, even if unable to donate more than the simple postage and the time required for distribution. Do not hesitate because you cannot give more. We are convinced more than ever by the character and objects of the late Cincinnati Convention, that such plain speech as this TRACT contains is greatly needed at the present time. In the name of Christianity,

A most Dangerous Attempt is now Making to Subvert the Religious Liberties

of the American People; and the mighty magic of that name is still powerful over multitudes even of otherwise liberal minds. Let the world learn that the protest made against Christianity is not made by hatred of Goodness and of Truth, but rather by a love for those that can no longer be satisfied with shams. He woefully misjudges this Tract who thinks it has no higher aim than to "make a sensation." It was meant to tell needed truth so plainly that it must be heard. And it will be heard. All we ask is—give it a chance.

☞ Address your orders to THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio

A BOOK FOR THE TIMES!

"THE CLERGY A SOURCE OF DANGER TO THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC." Sold by Subscription only! Agents Wanted!
Address W. F. JAMIESON,
117-120, 20 N. Jefferson St., Chicago, Ill.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice President.
F. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ASA K. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN CONE, " "
EDWARD BISSELL, " "
F. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

Name	Address	Shares	Amount
D. R. LOCKE	Toledo, O.	Twenty	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER	" "	Fifteen	1,500
C. CONE	" "	"	1,000
EDWARD BISSELL	" "	Forty	4,000
F. E. ABBOT	" "	Ten	1,000
HERBERT HOLLOMAN	" "	"	1,000
GUIDO MARX	" "	"	1,000
P. H. BATESON	" "	"	1,000
E. P. BARNETT	" "	"	1,000
H. E. HOWE	" "	Three	300
W. C. FISK	" "	"	300
V. K. KIRK	" "	"	300
ALANSON WOOD	" "	"	300
WILLIAM KRAUS	" "	Five	500
J. G. HOLZWARTH	" "	One	100
JOS. E. MARX	" "	"	100
C. AUCHARD	" "	"	100
ANA K. BUTTS	New York, N. Y.	Thirty	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON	Newport, R. I.	Two	200
ALEX. COCHRAN	Franklin, Pa.	Five	500
GEO. HOADLY	Cincinnati, O.	Two	200
MISS A. HALL	Danville, Va.	One	100
G. N. JENNINGS	Northampton, Mass.	"	100
J. SEDGWICK	Tonika, Ill.	"	100
CARL FOST	Palmer, O.	"	100
L. R. SONDERLAND	Monroe, Mich.	Three	300
J. L. WHITING	Sacramento, Cal.	Five	500
LOUIS BUSTOL	Galveston, Texas	One	100
J. E. SUTTON	Boston, Mass.	"	100
S. I. DUBKEE	Croydon, N. H.	"	100
S. M. HADLEY	Olathe, Kan.	"	100
J. L. HILL	" "	"	100
W. H. SPENCER	Florence, Mass.	Ten	1,000
JON. F. BARRETT	Haverhill, Mass.	Two	200
E. W. WELSH	Boston, Mass.	"	200
FRANK PRATHER	La Grange, Ind.	"	200
E. F. DINGMOR	Boston, Mass.	Five	500
J. T. DICKINSON	Wellsville, Kan.	One	100
W. J. PUTNER	New York, N. Y.	Two	200
G. C. GLATT	Middlefield, Cal.	Fourteen	1,400
W. C. GANNETT	New Bedford, Mass.	Three	300
MISS M. C. PERKINS	Kendallville, Ind.	"	200
MRS. S. EMERSON	Boston, Mass.	One	100
MISS E. EMERSON	" "	"	100
W. H. DOWNES	Dover, N. H.	"	100
B. B. SMITH	Birmingham, Ala.	"	100
R. E. SWARTZ	Lansing, Mich.	"	100
W. C. RUSSELL	Warren, Pa.	"	100
WM. CLARKE	Itasca, N. Y.	"	100
C. L. SMITH	Toledo, O.	Three	300
J. N. LYMAN	" "	One	100
L. G. FEICH	" "	Twenty	2,000
A. FOLSON	Cincinnati, O.	One	100
L. O. BATES	Monroe Centre, Pa.	"	100
S. E. SEWALL	Boston, Mass.	Three	300
ELMER WRIGHT	Colebrook, Conn.	One	100
E. B. WARD	Boston, Mass.	Five	500
A. D. WILT	Detroit, Mich.	Twenty	2,000
S. S. BOWEN	Dayton, O.	One	100
WM. JONES	Keokuk, Iowa	"	100
S. H. DAME	Peekskill, N. Y.	"	100
J. H. YORK	Oakbrook, Ill.	"	100
JOS. HAYES	Dover, N. H.	"	100
G. P. FOLSON	" "	"	100
"A FRIEND"	" "	"	100
MRS. H. E. PERKINS	" "	Two	200
O.	Boston, Mass.	One	100
WILLIAM GREEN	Orange, N. J.	"	100
"A FRIEND"	Lowell, Mass.	"	100
D. B. STEWART	Brattleboro, Vt.	"	100
MRS. F. W. CHRISTIAN	New York, N. Y.	"	100
C. W. FARGENT	Kelley's Island, O.	Two	200
EDW. M. DAVIS	Philadelphia, Pa.	One	100
MRS. LUCRETIA MOTT	" "	"	100
MISS M. A. WRIGHT	Jersey City, N. J.	"	100
A. S. BROWN	Worcester, Mass.	"	100
EDWIN BROWN	" "	"	100
R. F. HALLOWELL	Boston, Mass.	Five	500
BENJ. RODMAN	New Bedford, Mass.	Three	300
H. B. CLARKE	" "	"	200
FRANK J. SCOTT	Toledo, O.	Six	600
M. L. HOLDSBROOK	Houlton, Me.	Ten	1,000
W. H. BOUGHTON	New York, N. Y.	One	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON	" "	"	100
E. G. BURNETT	Webster, Mass.	Two	200
J. E. FOLLETT	Windsor, Minn.	One	100
JOS. WARRASSE	Newton, N. J.	"	100
T. M. LANE	Franklin, Pa.	"	100
W. H. DIXIE	Worcester, Mass.	"	100
W. H. SPALDING	Patricot, N. Y.	"	100
LOUIS BELMONT	Duluth, Minn.	"	100
LEWIS KURTZ	Philadelphia, Pa.	Two	200
SAM'L WARRASSE	Anguilla, N. J.	One	100
W. L. RAYNE	La Fayette, N. J.	"	100
W. EMERSON	Amesbury, Mass.	"	100
C. H. BOWEN	Boston, Mass.	"	100
MISS I. THOMPSON	Dover, N. H.	Two	200
BENJ. HALLOWELL	Sandy Spring, Md.	One	100
MRS. M. R. VAN KENNERLAER	N. Y. City	"	100
R. B. STONE	Aberdeen, Miss.	"	100
WM. BOTCH	Fall River, Mass.	Two	200
MRS.	New Bedford, Mass.	Five	500
J. WHITAKER	Korhunkson, N. Y.	One	100
S. H. KOPPEL	Boston Highlands, Mass.	Two	200
MRS. R. D. FRANCIS	New York, N. Y.	One	100
CHAS. BONALL	Salem, O.	"	100
G. H. BIGGUS	Amesbury, Mass.	Two	200
J. T. CLARKSON	Castleton, Ill.	One	100
C. W. NEWTON	Castleton, Ill.	One	100
HENRY KLEIN	Toledo, O.	Two	200
OTTO KLEIN	" "	One	100
H. G. NEUBERT	" "	Two	200
A. BUNERT	" "	One	100
TOLEDO PRINTING CO.	Toledo, O.	Thirty	3,000
T. K. PECK	Westminster, Ct.	Two	200

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 29 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. PROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription. Send $3.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

NEW BOOKS BY MAIL!

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Bookseller and Publisher,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

Will send the following NEW BOOKS by mail on receipt of the publisher's price:

"LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF RELIGION," by Max Mueller.....$2.00
"RADICAL PROBLEMS," by Dr. C. A. Bartol.....$2.00
"THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH," by Louis Figuer.....$1.75
"THE DEBATABLE LAND," by Robt. Dale Owen.....$2.00
"SHORT STUDIES ON GREAT SUBJECTS," (Second Series), by Froude.....$1.50
"THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST"—An Examination of Liddon's Bampton Lectures.....$2.00

"The Word,"

A MONTHLY JOURNAL OF REFORM.

Edited by E. H. Heywood,

AND to be issued by THE CO-OPERATIVE PUBLISHING COMPANY, Princeton, Mass., May, 1873. Though not its organ or responsible for its action, "THE WORD" will zealously defend the principles of the Labor Reform League, and give in its first number a brief statement of its proceedings and purposes as reported by its Executive Committee. To the many intelligent lecturers and writers in behalf of Labor, Woman's Rights and Peace Reform, we shall render all possible assistance in diffusing their ideas; and we solicit their friendly aid, and the aid of all lovers of Equity, to enable us, by securing subscribers, to speedily place our venture on a self-supporting cash basis.

TERMS: 75 cents annually, payable in advance; 5 copies, $3; 10 copies, $5; 20 copies, $10; 50 copies, $22.50; 100 copies $40.

☞ Address "THE WORD,"
118-120, Princeton, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for "JESUS." By Charles F. Deems, D.D. His Divinity established and Rationalism routed. The most popular and rapidly-selling religious work ever issued. ☞ For Circulars, address U. S. PUBLISHING CO., N. Y., Cincinnati, Chicago or St. Louis, 117-120.

JUNIOR UNMASKED; or, THOMAS PAINE the author of the "Letter of Junius" and the "Declaration of Independence." A DEMONSTRATION. Royal 16mo. pp. 82. Price, $1.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address JOHN GRAY & CO., P. O. Box 689, Washington, D. C.

Back Numbers of the Index!

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

TWENTY-FIVE CENTS A DOZEN!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

☞ Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, APRIL 6, 1872.

WHOLE No. 119.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARBET, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS HARTWORTH HUGHESON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. WELLSWORTH, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOYSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATHORN, Business Agent.

(Entered according to Act of Congress in the year 1872, by THE INDEX ASSOCIATION, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.)

Editors of newspapers and periodicals are authorized to reprint these lectures in whole or in part, provided they give full credit at the time to "THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio."

THE BOSTON SUNDAY AFTERNOON LECTURES FOR 1872.

SEX.

BY C. A. BARTOL, D.D.

(Eleventh Lecture in the Course of Eleven "Sunday Afternoon Lectures," given in Horticultural Hall, Boston, under the auspices of the Free Religious Association, March 17, 1872.)

As artists speak of the value in painting of a color, there is one in sex too fast to be washed out, and stirring a warm debate, wide as the world. Says a famous French aeronaut, "The voice of a man is heard a mile, that of a woman two miles above the earth, in a balloon." For what does it call? For relief of disability and re-adjusted relations. "The woman starts," says Mr. Huxley, "in her nature heavily weighted." She drags a theological prejudice as a ball and chain. No mischief but a woman is at the bottom of it! Not a very manly remark, yet repeated by all but a tithe of the Christian Church. She is regarded as man's diminutive, man made small, part of him, the rib, which no anatomist finds wanting, and he has never missed from his side. She has never done anything but let in Satan to his paradise, and expiate her offence by child-bearing. Man, of whose grand unity she is a fraction, has made the explorations, conquests, inventions, every building, machine, vessel, utensil, statue, picture, poem, history, tillage, trade, policy, religion; no improvement of doctrine, worship, government, plant or animal from her. She does not discover printing, the earth's motion, the blood's circulation, the new planet, ether, photography, any process of manufacture, or, save in his heavy hand, man's animal descent. She is but his help-mate, shadow of his glory, waiter at his table, plaything or slave. She is physically stamped as his inferior in strength and size. If the race fell by a woman, it rose through a man.

Let us accept the flagrant facts, yet maintain her fine superiority. She is less in figure; but he is less than mammoth or mastodon. She is man modified to be perfected, and presented more and better to himself, being the next step of natural selection toward the angel. The survival of the fittest in heaven will resemble her organism, if our instinctive celestial descriptions are true. Some of his coarser features, of beard and bone and muscle, she has left behind; less remains to deposit in dust and death. She does not construct. But, in this world, the greatest thing is not art or architecture, the steam-engine or spinning-jenny, light-house or break-water, scouring the sky or dredging the sea. Influence and character turn the scale against genius and force. The Holy Ghost is an over-match for all triumphs of power and skill; and, if man has been woman's support, she has been his inspiration. If the busy globe be his image, hers the cleansing air. She is the lowly sea, if he be the towering hill. How this persuasiveness is figured in feminine names of things that have no gender! The mysterious, all-deciding powers that work under earthly shows, Goethe calls the mothers. What a multitude of ships, instruments, institutes, orbs and substances are so personified! If the engine has, painted broad on its round bulk, a man's name, the engineer persists to call it her, and tells you how she runs—a philosophical proof he does not fathom. If man is power, woman is pervader. Point to Elizabeth, Victoria, Catherine, sitting on a throne? The sway of woman exceeds all the sceptres.

Nor is this as man's mate and second; it is intrinsic energy. An eminent man, being asked for the object of woman, answered, "marriage." If so, God fails in many of his noblest daughters. Shakespeare's reproach, through scores of matchless sonnets, to the beauty that cheated the world of its copy by abiding alone, applies to thousands he dreamed not of. What insult to imply they live for no end but a means to propagate mankind, who, such as they are, multiply fast enough! The proof of immortality lies in this unfinished nature mounting above all organic hint, that is deeper than sex, and cannot pair off, but with gracious goodness of a divine sisterhood runs the line of humanity and couples the whole train. Celibacy for good reason, not as an enforced monkish rule, virginity for larger mercy, till one of you childless becomes mother of a thousand orphans, is a benediction to vie with all wedding-favors or music of the wedding-march. Every man that has loved feels exalted above the circumstance of continued generations, in a design to which posterity is a trifle. What star in wise men's vision to match the potent sentiment betwixt the maiden and the youth! In his love for her all people are loved, God is thanked, the heart is new born, all enemies become friends, evil is not, the flaming sword of avenging cherubim, that turned every way, falls from the garden-wall, and earth becomes Eden. So mighty to sanctify is the feeling, it may be doubted if its chief blessing come not by disappointment of the purpose, which no nuptials consummated. What espousals could more than clip the wings on which Dante soared to glory after the Beatrice, of whom his first was but the spark of his second sun-like sight! "To have known her was a liberal education;" ten thousand men can say that. Is not this a faculty as great as for sculpture, painting, verse? Has it not moved to carnage in war, enterprise in commerce, zeal of adventure, creation of riches and immaterial wealth? Is it not the matrix of every gem in the monarch of creation's crown? Let the materialist call conjugality the fulfillment of destiny; the ideal historian will trace something far above.

The greater number among us of the better sex proves them not designed for mere pieces of an earthly whole. There are not men enough to go round, and plenty of women who would not go round with the men they meet. Polygamy is a misnomer; it is not marriage. So, related to man though woman be, she is an independent creature.

But beware of adding to our civil a sexual war. Let not women advocate emancipation as if they alone were wronged! There are men not in the conscious exercise of tyranny. It is possible, on the other side, that Hector may be hen pecked, and the domestic roof harbor as many queens as kings. Is man unjust to woman, or woman to man? Neither sex can be just to itself, only each to the other. Women cannot appreciate women as men do; and the woman that depreciates man leaves him to what inadequate self-estimate! O men and women, let us no longer blow our own praises! But lately we learned that bad habit. Shift the trumpet into each other's mouth! Doubtless woman has much to complain of in her lord, in the ill subjection that title implies. But the honorable amendment is at hand. Like every advance, it comes in the fulness of time. Is anybody in particular to blame because Christianity, abolition of slavery, the republic, free religion, did not sooner arrive; or has God a season for these things as for fruits of the year? A worried man, being asked his occupation, said he kept a hot-house. But only a softer climate ensuing on displaced social barbarism can ripen this reform. Why quarrel with the past? Had not the axe and sword, which brawny arms must wield, a needful task? Can we get so far back as to style the knotted muscles a monstrous growth? Will mutual madness be progress? Woodsman and farmer go into no rage over the forest and the bog. What have we to do with the chaparral of twisted prejudice or the morass of selfish sloth but to think and work and shine it away? Let our heat not be hate; but, like the fire the husbandman makes his clearing with, used as temperately and wisely as the stream to invigorate his land, or the seed he sows.

Woman thus far has not been a cipher counting only with man's unit. She has been influence—he power; now she asks to be power or person, to communicate will and soul through her individuality; and, as man resigns power to be influential with her, the two will approach and blend, like the nerves of either hemisphere of the brain, which pass down the opposite side and unify with crossing harmonies the mortal frame.

Of this re-tuning, I name three ways. First, an equitable and impartial education. What a wrong is a college or university, law, medical, divinity-school for boys alone! In a coming age the inadmissibility of a girl to any study or institution will be held as mean as monopoly of corn, exclusive as English aristocracy or Brahminical caste, savage as the Indian's making a menial of his squaw. We have driven out the aborigines; but they have left a touch of their war-paint in the masculine assumption to compete for any prize in an arena fenced against our sister's feet. Do we doubt the prudence of mingling the sexes in seats of literature and science within the same walls? If experiment have not proved, and no seer's horoscope gives foregleam of that safety of such intercourse which Nature teaches in every house, then let them have such seats to themselves, better than Vassar, as good as Harvard and Yale!

But philosophy declares and experience seals the peril of separation. Is priest or nun the name for innocence? No. Mystery, seclusion, attracts the unhallowed glance and is the provocative of passion. The unwed Jesus brands as adulterer. Better dispense with the veil! Not a fair look at a woman's face is lust, but the side-long, peering, backward eye. It is said a lightning-rod on a building not only diverts the thunderbolt, but silently all day long draws the electric fluid from the air. Decent association will not excite or aggravate, but conduct away or regulate desire; while diverse gifts of pupils will move wholesome emulation and supply existing defects in the academic course. Bringing the young together, not for compliment or coquetry, but study, will so reveal their relative qualities as to favor more intelligent selection of partners in this great ball of life, will turn to sobriety inordinate desire, answer better the purpose of what is termed coming out, dispense with the occasion of so many costly feasts and feathers for lures; and, though never doing away with any salutary social convention, establish all bonds on a more solid footing.

The second mode of this true order is Industrial. Woman, in the more frequent necessity of earning her livelihood, finds her hand is made for something beside a ring or glove, or to give to whom she asks it; that her body is fashioned for more than the finery which the lay-figure in a milliner's window will display as well; that she has a higher mission than to be the vain ornament that ends in a licentious toy. When she is taught, in the common schools, not only to read and write, nor merely to stitch and sew, but to design and draw, model and mould, to be, like my friend who built her own house, an architect, an artisan, an artist; to make more than a plaything of these wonderful fingers,—then her owner will relinquish his property, her overseer drop his whip, her insulter fear the risk of his vile proposals, her feters fall; and wherever she stands or goes man meet not his slave or rival, but his peer, to take in every movement her share.

For the third mode of her deliverance is her civil and political right. In the training to useful work her importance will command honor. "A man's aptitudes," said one, "are to be respected—his inclinations to be examined;" and a woman's too! No mere recipient, but a creator like her companion, she will be no dependent on his purse. I am not at a wife's abject begging of a dollar from her husband for her own comfort or the family need; the despotism of his pocket-book often more stinging than a rod. This will pass, if not with growing courtesy which the curmudgeon resists, then with her well-earned and law-guarded possessions, to free her from the beggar's stoop. Every mendicant is under the thumb of whatever bestower is not a saint. I hail the day when woman shall be giver as receiver, even in the gross utilities which the miser owns. With her value will come her vote. In control of her own affairs she will have a voice which no prejudice or tradition can withstand. Representation will come with taxation, when she gets more to be taxed and asks to be represented. Elector and elect must become with a property qualification, though her poll, with all its native wealth, be rated worthless. She will go to the polls; to what places will the polls take her?

But man and woman will not do the same thing in the same way. They are not fac-simile; cannot be generalized. Their distinction is deeper than the fleshly dress. Not only, as Goethe says, the ever-womanly, but the ever-manly draws us; and there is that, in the diversity, which life puts not on, and death takes not off. Burns's song to "Mary in Heaven," Dante's lighting Paradise with the face of Beatrice, the Romanist's worship of the Virgin and her mother, touches our instinct of that immortality of womanhood without which something were wanting in the seats of the blessed, and the upper stories of the shining mansions less perfect than those below. But, in earthly ties, the man and woman who think sex mere costume are self-ignorant and unfit for their several task. It is a variation but no division; part and counter-part, of one continent, with no boundary-line; as Moses or whoever wrote Genesis says, "male and female;" as Paul says, "neither male nor female." This union in separation solves the problem. If in every common or differing work man be manly and woman womanly, all opposition will cease.

I name three properties from which she has no egreess more than the spirit Faust summoned had over the triangle at his door; in true play of nature her portion of the human symphony. God is no tau-tologist. He knew his image was incomplete in man without woman to enlarge the mirror to reflect that infinite glory. The masculine side, with every hunting Nimrod or Napoleon, metaphysic Plato or Aristotle, is but half.

The first feminine mark is sensibility. If understanding in man's brain be the promontory, sentiment is the inlet in hers. The softer skin, smoother feature, gradual outline, bewildering beauty of traceless proportion and finer hair an apostle calls a glory, symbolize this sensitive inner frame. To seize a woman is to bruise; to strike her makes it every man's duty, against husband or brother, to strike back. If man reflects or magnifies this world, her mind is a telescope for the starry sphere. Roughness to her is wrong to the commonwealth. The iron pot breaking the porcelain vase ruins more than its own worth. To this tenderness what is our debt? Said Eugénie de Guérin, "I feel the pain in my brother's side." Mungo Park is every man consoled by some woman. He is not half a man, to whom any other man can be so dear as all womanhood.

Her incarnate sentiment chooses every thing sentimental for her theme. Yet sex is a changeling sometimes. "She would have been a great general, had it pleased the Lord to drop her spirit into the pantaloons," said my friend of a vigorous dame. Cowper snatched a feather from his sister's cap, in writing his unsurpassed letters; but how much of a woman he was! Miss Evans cast novels of such strength, that the disguise of George Eliot but fell at one sentence: "No woman forgives coldness even as the mask of love." Man creates, woman oftener represents. Charlotte Brontë said "Don't!" to Mr. Thackeray when she thought he was eating too much; but she could not have sculptured the well-fed giant's figures, nor he painted her female forms. Woman commonly finishes what man fashions, adds accolades to his cathedral, and adorns what he blocks out. After Paul Potter comes Rosa Bonheur. George Sand cannot keep her man's name; why under no female one does man care to hide? "The reason," says a lady-lecturer, "we have furnished no Homer or Shakespeare is we have had no chance!" The Homers and Shakespeares if woman has not furnished, she has borne. "The greatest mother is the noblest woman," answered Bonaparte to inquiring Madame de Staël. Not the Iliad, Macbeth, Deuteronomy, the Sermon on the Mount, but the princes of poetry and law, Moses and Messiah are her crown. "I do not care," said a financier on employing a servant, "about your recommendation of the boy; tell me who his mother was!" Genius is accounted for by the mother; but it is moral explanation. Reason or intuitive feeling exceeds in woman all reasoning. Mrs. Stowe strikes down slavery with a story, but proves not incest on Lord Byron; Lucy Stowe's intuition convinces us of Woman's Rights, but not her scriptural exegesis; Mrs. Livermore's patriotism is a chronometer to reckon the worth of the administration, whatever republican or democrat may think of her argument; Mrs. Howe's reply to Mr. Waason has emotional higher than dialectic force; and Mrs. Woodhull's logic in behalf of debauches, crazy as any speech in Somerville, is blown to atoms with the breath of that John Stuart Mill in America, Francis Ellingwood Abbot.

Do I disparage woman? Logic is not the chief instrument of truth. It is outrun by perception of the heart. Men complain that women shift the issue. The issue ought often to be shifted! Too many a hard issue man has made with his mate. Metaphysic talent is not, in the college of humanity, the highest part. I would rather be in the state of mind which produced Celia Thaxters "Courage" or Helen Hunt's "Thought" than in that which sent forth Spencer's "First Principles." Mrs. Siddons equalled Garrick or Kean, though not in the same characters. The effect of Fanny Kemble's recitations Charles Dickens did not surpass, though his had the remote imagination, and hers the weeping of real tears.

Another mark of woman is privacy. "Not unsought be won," says Milton. "The woman who dared" to propose, has no followers. Doffing the protective dress of male attire is a failure; and the striding monster is seen in our streets as seldom as the hermaphrodite brig on the seas; may the strident voice not be heard! Miss Dickinson's mode of riding among the Sierras is not practised in Boston. Mothers withdraw their daughters into long dresses none too soon; and our great grand-mothers' chapeaux de frise were less unbecoming than is the modern exposure. "Curst be who evil thinks!" That is a French proverb; and we want not all that is covered by the French tongue! Good taste has put certain pictures of Venus, and a particular style of marble statues, on the retired list from our galleries; no matter how soon the scant-clad dancers follow, whom Father Taylor told me he turned his back on, in the theatre. The harem is hard beset both sides the water; we need not the oriental mask, if modesty be worn for a veil; and if the old law-phrase covert lose not its social sense. This privacy is no prejudice of woman's claim. Not a personal, civil or proprietary right, but she may use without unwomanly sacrifice. It is not a republic where she has no voice. Shame to talk of her vote as our grant! "Suffer not a woman to teach," sayest thou, O Paul? She is best of teachers in ten thousand Sunday-schools. Shall she not heal? The nurse has done it more than the doctor, enough to graduate into his rank. Shall she not practise at the bar, till a true verdict comes? Shall she not preach? She does it better than some men; she cannot do it worse than others. Thirty-five years ago, Lucretia Mott was listened to as earnestly as Dr. Channing; and to-day the younger Quakeress, Miss Smiley, robs laurel of success and crown of honor from the Presbytery, that would silence her or hush the advocate whose submission to discipline costs all his courage and romance. War has suppressed woman's faculty, postponed her suffrage and narrowed her sphere. But she bides her time; she waits the reign of peace. Not the thing to do, but the manner of doing does her privacy fix. Madame de Roland arranged her dress to fall decently from the guillotine. The silent man, Grant, teaches one lesson, to beware of that itching tongue as well as ear, that greed to be heard, which is of both sexes the common sin; but from which, however unrighteously, a woman's repute suffers most. "The Countess of Carbery," says Jeremy Taylor, "cast like a candle round her own station a shadow and a cloud, and shone to all but herself." Ambition to multiply one's public countenance is mental prostitution; and of frequent appearance there is no warrant but rank or power. Queen Victoria is not seen or Jenny Lind heard too much. But, if a woman slip from propriety, her fall hurts her more, being from a greater height. Her garment is easier soiled; her character sheds not slander. Pioneers get bruises, and the woman must be pardoned if in her demand for equity her low and gentle voice become a shout or shriek. Yet let her hold fast her own less flaming colors while she fights!

A man that pleads the woman's cause expects to be taken with a grain of salt. But let me proceed and name as the third mark of her constitution purity, with which, as we say, she is beautifully marked. Her sensual passion is weak. Crystal, though broken, cannot help being above the cloud. It takes more slowly any spot. The scale of virtue is absolute; pollution not worse in her because she is inwardly less tempted. For sanctity is an undivided property. It is the common of the soul. Yet virgin has no masculine synonyme. Man's baseness underpins "Five Points" and "North Street." Still on her rests the blot of the name Desdemona asked if she were. Why with such disproportion? Is it for the failing of cleanliness in its source, fouling the element he is washed in, corrupting his atmosphere and unsweetening the breath of his soul? A good woman is the best thing; what a bad one is let me not say! It is not strange the conscience of the double-mistress, not privy let us trust to the crime of her last accomplice, took the shape of a blood-avenger, haunting her house till she appealed to the police. I do not wonder at the worship of Mary. Every sister is holy. Man is farther down the stream. Let it not be muddled higher up! O woman, be our spring and perpetual baptismal font!

The native traits of either sex affect its moral qualities in ways too far now to trace. Woman suffers with more fortitude. She forgives wrongs that seem too dreadful for God to pardon. Her leaning is loyalty, first at the tomb, last at the cross. Has she more love or truth? Napoleon discarded Josephine for reasons of state, which in the death of the Duke de Reichstadt, became apples of Sodom, "no son of his succeeding;" but his letters show an affection more ardent than hers. One, in admiration of their devotion in a great extremity, prayed God to keep the women just as they are! Are they so perfect, sincerer than men? Is it a libel that mendacity in a woman is more serene, and she does not stammer when she lies; that young girls can deceive more than boys at the same age; that they have more wiles, "rounds within rounds," as in body, so in mind! Is cunning the weapon with which rudeness is met? Shame on the oppression that requires such a foil; and no credit to the masculine and bearded veracity that is without fear! If women are not dew-drops; if men are official managers, and a managing woman our horror, is not secrecy needful defence of her charge?

Far from her nest the lapwing takes her flight, to lure the hunter from her young, though to her own harm. To how many a nobler fugitive Shakespeare's exquisite line applies!

But deride or distinguish as we will, there is no parting of woman from man. They make one nature. Their spheres are concentric. They are not enemies. Men do not hate women, as much as women hate each other. They form parties that quarrel as badly as York and Lancaster. They cannot keep under private jealousies. Their brothers are not mere despots to hold them down, and pinch them, as I heard one say, like a Chinese foot. Let them ask the franchise, they shall have it, and, being in Massachusetts an immense majority, remove every male and put a female in office, from governor to tide-waiter!

But treat the sexes not as co-rival, but complementary. As the theologian says of his trinity, we must not divide the substance or confound the persons. Accursed he who either cuts the bond or blurs the line! Let me celebrate the oneness! Of which sex is it the privilege to think and love, worship and will, believe and act, and hope for that resurrection which Jesus says leaves marriage behind? In the ecstasies of aspiration and prayer, sexual constraints drop like sand-bags from the mounting balloon, and distinctions vanish like degrees of latitude and longitude in the whirling sphere. In transport of action or devotion is no sex. The soul gathers all divinity into its humanity. Much is said of woman's sphere. May not woman move in any sphere, and do any thing that needs to be done? She must not vote, you say, because she cannot fight? The maid of Saragossa, Joan of Arc, many a woman with the burglar, or for her honor, has fought with force and fury as becoming as any courtesy. What is fighting? Carrying arms, or letting them off at the foe? Was that all, in our civil war, that won the day? Would that have saved Washington, or taken Richmond, or got through the Wilderness, or opened the Mississippi, or made the Georgia March? Never, without the corps de reserve at home, at the needle, in the hospital, which was half the host. Homer and Shakespeare represent spirits contending with mortals in the bloody frays of England and Greece. Leave out those in the flesh, yet unseen on the field, the wives, mothers, sisters, maiden lovers, that flew to nerve the soldier's arm; and the scale would have turned the other way. You might as well omit the Holy Ghost, because it does not drill, or fire the cannon, or answer to its name. The boys in blue share the credit with girls behind, or nurses that went and handled bloody limbs, or did scouting service, or stood in the ranks in male attire, everywhere as brave, and effective. Sphere of woman? Was Sojourner Truth in her sphere re-enacting at a nobler call the part of Moses, to lead out of a worse Egypt those in bonds, while a million white males played false in politics and put off the evil hour? Was Mrs. Patten unwomanly navigating the disabled ship? Did the slender woman, when the life-boat-men quaked at the storm and refused to put forth, as she rescued in her skiff the last survivor from the wreck, at Drogheda, on the Irish coast, appear out of place? Did my friend, Mrs. Cutter, break the seal of nature or the marriage-vow when, as her coachman sat afraid on his box, she rushed out and saved two drowning men from the Nahant surf? Did I say that sex disappears and woman is no longer, in such raptures of duty and love? I take that back. Never woman so much! "Neither male nor female," did the apostle say? Let me call these female achievements a worthy challenge for us who are stronger to leap beyond.

No matter if the occasions be trivial or rare. The woman that rose in meeting to correct misrepresentations of her father, and the clergyman who tended baby that the pale mother might take the air, were both alike in order. But women mixing in the dirt of politics! Must policy be dirty; the pillars of the commonwealth wreathed in tobacco-smoke and planted in exhortations, as York Minster and the Duomo at Milan rise out of heaps of aged stains? But so a woman is censured! Lady Macbeth's was fit prayer, to preface murder,—"Unsex me here!" But a woman were not unsexed to know her business, control her fortune, choose whom to be represented by or represent her district, plead with Portia like "a Daniel come to judgment" or legislate down the drunkard's bane.

But this were what a change! The days of chivalry, as Burke complained, will be gone. Let them go! Woman can dispense with the kiss or caress as a make-weight for wrong. Getting up in a car or concert is poor atonement for deprivation or disability of substantial right. "Not for the Queen," answered the Britons in a London omnibus to the driver's request that some one would yield a seat to a woman. Being an American, bound, to show I was a delegate from a polite country, I gave up mine. But nobler manners may deck excessive deference, and true women will not ask, while the unworthy will be disappointed if they demand it. Rudeness is not covered with a gown. When a row of presuming misses marched along the side-walk and pushed him into the gutter, "So much," said a young Norwegian, "the worse for them!" I was tempted to say it when persons, dressed as ladies, crowded up to usurp my place at the librarian's desk.

Man and woman are one in the house. Marriage is the Border-State that cannot be taken out of the Union! You do not love any longer? Suppose you said you were a house-breaker, incendiary or thief; that were a less capital crime. Make a merit of loving no longer, because forsooth you are so lofty, and your partner so low! Love is a law! Abandonment is no prop for unfaithfulness, but a new offence. The murderer was drunk, the assassin crazy? All sin is mad and inebriated. Insanity is its consequence, not cause. "Did you tie the knot fast?" we ministers are asked. Easy divorce makes it a slip-knot. Whom do its advocates quote? Not Jesus, or Moses, or Paul; but Milton, whose genius did not make him wise to choose or endure his mate. "He does not "make me happy!" Did you marry for that? You need another conscience, not your own echo, if you are to have golden wedding or tin. Put grist of benevolence, and the upper and nether mill-stones will not grind each other. Take meekly the yoke of contrary opinion! By the oxen's straining apart the load is drawn. The chastening you accept, like Aaron's rod, will bud. Children will be the covenant's unbroken seal. By what more than family fidelity was the North stronger than the South, and Germany than France?

Man and woman are one in the civil polity.

"What constitutes a state?"

The poet answers with the sort of men. We talk of our forefathers, not our foremothers. By what principle do we keep out of the balance the woman's weight? The logic of female protestants, in the State-house pigeon-holes, was never answered in the halls of legislative debate. Had all the women voted against slave extension, the South might have shrunk from the appeal to arms.

Men and woman are one in the church. If in Christ there be neither male nor female, what part of Christian service should they not share? If not equal, are they not equivalent? Was Anna the only prophetess? Could Miriam alone improve a Red Sea occasion? Rotten boroughs and partial representation have been England's disgrace; and some grumble that Delaware should be senatorially a match for New York. But how about a disfranchisement of more than half the people, so complete that they have no compensation for political extinction in any ecclesiastical voice, not silenced with a general grudge?

But the hour strikes on the clock wound by no mortal hand. It has struck for the despot, the baron, overseer, pope, the absolutist everywhere but in his own house. Like the preliminary rattle in some time-pieces, do we not hear in the belfry some warning of the clang for him? There is to be a period of disturbed sexual relations, no doubt. Wild notions of independence and license will be proclaimed. They prejudice not the cause of justice, nor prevent the pre-ordained motion of the dial-hand. It is a long stretch already, from the Mohammedan conceit that woman has no soul, to the modern poet's verse, that she "is the soul of humanity." In the question whether science or intuition be the criterion of knowledge, her witness is with the seers. If God has made her weaker, he has given her a quicker eye. O my brother, who looked at her, suppose not for her downcast air she is blind to thy intent! That meek sister's glance pierces thee through and through. O my sister, complain not, thou hast been deceived! Vision is the weapon in thy nature to atone for thy exposure and foil brute force. Be ashamed of the plea that thy unsuspecting ignorance was the prey of art beyond thy power to detect! It is a reproach to Him who has not left thee helpless against plots, and prepares for violence a dread account. Woman is to have her right; she must be put on her responsibility. Let us not do her or her Maker the disservice of painting her as the victim of man. She chooses, if he asks. The spark falls into the tinder of passion from her eye, and could be withheld. She puts the motion; she has the casting-vote. Not by her feebleness, but by her might in this world, am I amazed. She is to make a new election of her state. Her fate trembles in the scale. But the balance is her own hands.

HUXLEY'S REPLY TO A BISHOP.

At a meeting of the British Association he had a famous tilt with Prof. Owen; and on another occasion Samuel Wilberforce, Bishop of Oxford, blandly asked him in the presence of a large audience, "Is the learned gentleman really willing to have it go forth to the world that he believes he descended from a monkey?" Prof. Huxley rose and replied in his quiet manner—"It seems to me that the learned Bishop hardly appreciates our position and duty as men of science. We are not here to inquire what we would prefer, but what is true. The progress of science from the beginning has been a conflict with old prejudices. The true origin of man is not a question of likes or dislikes, to be settled by consulting the feelings, but it is a question of evidence, to be settled by strict scientific investigation. But as the learned Bishop is curious to know my state of feeling upon the subject, I have no hesitation in saying that, were it matter of choice with me (which is clearly is not) whether I should be descended from a respectable monkey or from a Bishop of the English Church who can put his brains to no better use than to ridicule science and misrepresent its cultivators, I would certainly choose the monkey!" The reply was received with a storm of applause, and Huxley was not afterwards troubled with senseless questions.—Science Record.

GIUSEPPE MAZZINI.—The news of Mazzini's death, which has come at last, is none the less sad for having been long expected. He was the greatest, bravest, most heroic and persistent of the long roll of Italian worthies who took up in 1815, when the rest of Europe sunk, weary of strife, into ignoble repose, and above all, the great doctrine that every people has the right to dispose of itself, and fought and died for it, without ever flinching or ever despairing or ever repining, till 1859 brought their triumph. Indeed, it may be truly said that to them, more than to any other agency, is due that great, silent change in European politics which has made Austria a constitutional monarchy and has taken Victor Emanuel to Rome. This long and fruitful Italian struggle, too, was remarkable, not simply for the production of martyrs and confessors and conspirators, but of brilliant men of action, of soldiers and statesmen who wanted nothing but a country and organized government at their back to make them illustrious. Any country which in fifty years of sorrow and degradation and oppression has produced Mazzini, and Manin, and Garibaldi, and Cavour, and D'Azeglio, and Rattazzi, and the gallant and gifted Govea, just dead in his prime, and who led his division off the field of Custoza unbroken, after bearing the whole brunt of a bloody and disastrous day, may well call herself the mother of a great race. Mazzini was a dreamer, as a man must be who is forever intent on schemes beyond his power, and morbid, as men always are who are fighting against laws for which they have no respect, and bitter, as nearly all men become who have long hoped against hope and have often thought themselves struggling against fate itself. But it was a striking illustration of the radical soundness of his mental and moral constitution that, when the day of triumph came, it brought in him no frenzy or ecstasy. His last public utterances were as clear and healthy definitions of the bases of civil society, and of the true conditions of order and rational progress, as if he had all his life sat debating in the Parliament of a free country, instead of plotting in back bed-rooms. Italy owes him a monument as one of those "great precursors," as they have been called, who rendered her the inestimable service of worshipping her as a nation when the rest of the world despised her as a "geographical expression," and only visited her as an old curiosity-shop.—N. Y. Nation.

WHAT MEN HAVE DIED FOR.—Colonel Montgomery was shot in a duel about a dog; Colonel Ramsey in one about a servant; Mr. Featherstone in one about a recruit; Sterne's father in one about a goose; and another gentleman in one about an acre of anchovies; one officer was challenged for merely asking his opponent to enjoy the second goblet; and another was compelled to fight about a pinch of snuff; General Barry was challenged by a Captain Smith for declining wine at dinner on a steamboat, although the General had pleaded as an excuse that wine invariably made him sick; and Lieutenant Cowther lost his life in a duel because he was refused admittance to a club of pigeon shooters. In 1777 a duel occurred in New York city, between Lieutenant Featherstonebaugh, of the 76th, and Captain McPherson, of the 42d British regiment, in regard to the manner of eating an ear of corn, one contending that the best eating was from the cob and the other that the grain should be cut off from the cob before eating. Lieutenant Featherstonebaugh lost his right arm, the ball from his antagonist's pistol shattering the limb dreadfully, so much so that it had to be amputated. Graham, Major Noah's assistant editor on the National Advocate, lost his life in 1827, at the duelling ground at Hoboken, with Barton, the son-in-law of Edward Livingston, in a simple dispute about "what was trumps" in a game of cards.

THE HEATHEN CHINESE.—A day or two since a couple of ladies, who went out collecting money for church purposes, stopped at the Piute House, Lower Gold Hill. After calling upon a number of persons for contributions, they asked "John," the Chinese cook, to give a dollar.

"What for you want me give a dolla?" asked John.

"We want you to give us a dollar to help the church."

"Dolla helpa churcha!" cried John, opening his eyes; "what matter churcha?"

"It's poor; it needs money. Can't you give us a dolla?"

"Me no sabe churcha; me poor, too.—What you call churcha—what him name?"

"Christ's Church," was the reply.

"No, me no give dolla," answered John, decidedly. "Me no likee Klist; Klist wantee too much money—money, money, all the time for Klist."—Virginia (Neo) Enterprise.

One by one the various States of the Union are beginning to feel the necessity of universal education. The New England States have, for some time, regarded this as a cardinal principle of democratic government; and, of late, Michigan has passed a law for compulsory education. It may, at first sight, seem to be an interference with the rights of the individual to compel him to send his children to school; but it is a demand made in accordance with the interest of that individual, and the safety of himself and his neighbors. If we are to continue a great, free people, schools and colleges must acquire the ascendancy, and prisons and jails sink below the horizon. Education and reformation have the same end; but if the work of the former is well done, that of the latter may be dispensed with; nay, it will find no place in which it can be performed.—Williams (College) Vidette.

I have read books enough, and observed and conversed with enough of eminent and splendidly cultivated minds, too, in my time; but I assure you I have heard higher sentiments from the lips of poor uneducated men and women, when exerting the spirit of severe yet gentle heroism under difficulties and afflictions, or speaking their simple thoughts as to circumstances in the lot of friends and neighbors, than I ever yet met with, except in the pages of the Bible.—Sir W. Scott.

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"Nothing but want of means deters me from subscribing to the Association fund, and nothing but my farm duties has prevented me thus far from trying to obtain subscribers for it in this vicinity. Have been a friend of the liberal cause from boyhood; had infidel parents (for which I am truly thankful), but Orthodox surroundings, from which I emerged by the help of the Investigator and other counter-publications into a Deist, when quite a young man, and holding to the word Infidel as a good and appropriate motto. Religion I always held to represent something stagnant, or like a muddy pool of water. In all its phases my mind has been imbued against it. I cannot for myself admit religion as of any good. I have lived fifty-four years without it, so far as mental and moral conditions are concerned, and don't want it. I think it merely a figurative concern. As a system of faith and worship, it probably has answered its ends as swaddling-clothes in the infancy of the human race, which the growing intelligence of the age is fast laying aside. And yet for a wonder I can see persons around me that seem to be as morbidly superstitious as the Old Book represents the times it was written in to have been. I see I am getting prolix. The principles underlying the 'religion' you are disseminating are worthy of a grand cause. May God speed you in your highest endeavors to promulgate Truth!"

"The reason of not knowing when the first year of my INDEX expired is that I let THE INDEX lie on my counter for the benefit of all that are willing to read it; and in most instances it is taken away for a more leisurely reading. The new order I send to you is the result of the above. Whether you have got any more readers out of my propagandism, I do not know. I notice but little opposition to the ideas expressed there, except by the President of the Young Men's Christian Association of this place."

"You may put me down for one share of INDEX stock. Have made some inquiry among acquaintances, hoping to get other subscriptions to stock. One man agreed to take one share, but 'backed out' soon after. Many men pay from five to twenty-five dollars to keep up orthodox preaching, which they despise, and can't be persuaded to take THE INDEX, which suits them better. The moral cowardice of such people is astonishing."

"THE INDEX has been a weekly and cordially received visitant for months, and with its object I am in hearty sympathy. I would hereafter relieve kind friends from the trouble of bringing it to me, and at the same time give a more substantial expression of sympathy. For inclosed $2.00 please send it to my address for one year."

"I enclose one dollar, for which please send me by mail as many copies of THE INDEX for Aug. 26th, 1871, as you can afford. I am anxious to circulate among my friends as much as possible Rev. Chas. Voysey's lecture on the Bible, and at the same time to advertise your very valuable paper."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the OROON, in the new EXCHANGE BUILDING on St. Clair Street, opposite the WHEELMAN OPERA HOUSE, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

SOCIAL RE-UNION.—Members and friends of the First Independent Society are invited to meet at the residence of Mrs. Edward Basell, on Summit St., Wednesday evening, April 10.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending March 26th.—A. BULL, 50 cts.; John Rappaport, 25 cts.; N. Johnson, 50 cts.; H. D. Simpson, 25 cts.; R. H. Runney, 10 cts.; Alex. McBride, 50 cts.; S. F. Woodard, 75 cts.; Dr. A. Bell, 25 cts.; Clarence Vail, 25 cts.; M. M. Lord, 25 cts.; C. R. Corbin, 25 cts.; John Clifford, 25 cts.; Walter Donaldson & Son, 25 cts.; Fred. Andersen, 25 cts.; R. W. Rater, 25 cts.; T. A. Kinney, 25 cts.; J. H. Stevens, 50 cts.; Jas. Fischer, 10 cts.; Wm. M. Rappaport, 25 cts.; F. J. Keene, 25 cts.; E. S. Brown, 50 cts.; Milan Bentley, 40 cts.; Fred. Rinehart, 25 cts.; A. G. Norman, 25 cts.; H. L. Green, 25 cts.; Mrs. Dr. Harrington, 25 cts.; F. C. Edwards, 25 cts.; Louisa B. Southworth, 10 cts.; E. N. Heath, 25 cts.; Mrs. Rufus Leighton, 10 cts.; F. M. Karney, 10 cts.; Joseph A. Peck, 50 cts.; E. Lutz, 10 cts.; Nelson Thwing, 25 cts.; H. L. Green, 25 cts.; L. Newell, 25 cts.; Jas. G. Richardson, 25 cts.; H. W. Beach, 50 cts.; H. H. Cronin, 50 cts.; A. Kiehlman, 25 cts.; D. C. Branch, 25 cts.; H. Edger, 10 cts.; Henry H. Everts, 50 cts.; James T. Sutton, 25 cts.; Samuel White, 25 cts.; John Hendrick, 25 cts.; Henry Bronson, 25 cts.; Geo. Nichols, 25 cts.; Chas. Bonnell, 25 cts.; J. Sedgwick, 25 cts.; J. C. Allen, 25 cts.; A. Friend, 25 cts.; A. Worder, 25 cts.; Milan Bentley, 25 cts.; R. Lamson, 10 cts.; D. F. Sweetland, 10 cts.; James D. Parrott, 50 cts.; Mrs. S. B. Blount, 25 cts.; J. W. Scott, 25 cts.; Miss H. B. Brooks, 25 cts.; F. E. Holt, 25 cts.; M. Bonister, 50 cts.; Nicholas Juranovich, 50 cts.; J. A. Bateman, 25 cts.; Dyer D. Lum, 25 cts.; A. W. Howley, 25 cts.; Milan Bentley, 25 cts.; Joel Sharp, 25 cts.; J. S. Bonnell, 25 cts.; George Williams, 25 cts.; T. W. Truendell, 25 cts.; Max Pracht, 50 cts.; R. Branch, 25 cts.; Thos. Tasker, 25 cts.; H. L. Green, 25 cts.; Dr. C. O. Clark, 25 cts.; Parker Pillsbury, 25 cts.; D. Cronin, 50 cts.; L. K. Washburn, 25 cts.; Geo. S. Bowen, 25 cts.; Kate P. Ward, 25 cts.; S. F. Gay, 25 cts.; L. T. Ives, 40 cts.; W. T. Allen, 25 cts.; Miss Maria Hovey, 25 cts.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

Story.

NO MORE AKA.

BY ELISA SCUDDER.

Life of our life, and Light of all our seeing!
How shall we rest on any hope but Thee,
What time our souls, to Thee for refuge fleeing.
Long for the home where there is no more Sea?

For still this Sea of Life with endless wailing
Dashes above our heads its blinding spray,
And vanquished hearts, sick with remorse and falling,
Moan like the waves at set of autumn day.

And ever round us swells the inviolate Ocean
Of Sin and Doubt that lures us to our grave;
When its wild billows with their mad commotion
Would sweep us down, then only Thou canst save.

And deep and dark the fearful gloom, unlighted,
Of that untried and all-surrounding Sea,
On whose bleak shore arriving lone, benighted,
We fall and lose ourselves at last—in Thee.

Yea! in Thy life our little lives are ended;
 Into Thy depths our trembling spirits fall;
 In Thee enfolded, gathered, comprehended,
 As holds the Sea her waves, Thou hold'st us all.

—Monthly Religious Magazines.

The Index.

APRIL 6, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. Its columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under its general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL $100,000.

SHARES EACH, $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten pence on each share for the year ending Oct. 30, 1878. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and the Directors have strictly complied with this condition. It is therefore desirable that the entire amount of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED on last page, Five Hundred Shares, $50,000.
THOMAS MCKEON, New Bedford, Ind.	One	100
D. AYRES, Brooklyn, N. Y.	"	100
MRS. L. E. BLOUNT, Evansville, Ind.	"	100
Defiance, O.	"	100
Bryan, O.	"	100
J. T. BRADY, Sabetha, Kan.	"	100
Northampton, Mass.	"	100
MAX PRAGOT, Cincinnati, O.	"	100
C. H. HINTERMANN, Boston, Mass.	"	100
C. POLLOCK, Toledo, O.	"	100
S. C. EASTMAN, Essexfield, O.	"	100
J. O. MARTIN, Palmyra, Mo.	"	100
L. T. IYER, Indianapolis, Ind.	"	100
E. W. MEDDAUGH, Detroit, Mich.	"	100
A. FOLGOS, Boston, Mass.	Two	200
W. F. BEIKER, Dayton, O.	"	100
HIRSH & COY, Sasp'n Bridge, N. Y.	One	100
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass.	Two	200
E. F. WOODWARD, Livonia, N. Y.	One	100
H. A. MILLER, Osborn, O.	"	100
J. W. BARTLETT, Mt. Carroll, Ill.	Two	200
OSCAR ROOS, Dover, N. H.	"	100
Mrs. ELIZ. S. MILLER, Taylor's Falls, Minn.	"	100
Mrs. ELIZ. S. MILLER, Geneva, N. Y.	"	100
JOS. R. SPORER, Cincinnati, O.	"	100
D. K. IYER, " "	Five	500
A. TAFT, " "	One	100
S. L. WILDER, " "	"	100
PETER H. CLARK, " "	"	100
G. K. WINTINGTON, " "	"	100
J. T. SUTTON, " "	"	100
WALTER F. AUSTIN, Pittsburg, Pa.	"	100
Mrs. C. E. NOUBSE, Cincinnati, O.	Two	200
JAS. FURBER, Shreveport, La.	One	100
GEO. H. HOLTMAN, Pittsburgh, Pa.	"	100

Henry Ward Beecher made this amazing statement to the Divinity Students of Yale College, as reported in the Christian Union of March 12th:—

"I consider myself Calvinistic, you know, and in this way: I believe what John Calvin would have believed, if he had lived in my time and seen things as I see them."

We have long been at a loss for an appropriate name. Now we have found it—we are a Calvinist! That is, we believe just what John Calvin would have believed, if he had lived in our time and seen things as we see them. For breadth and catholicity, the name Calvinist is evidently the ideal thing; for there is not a man on this planet, at least, who is not a Calvinist by Mr. Beecher's definition. Nay, more than that. There is not a hen, horse, or dog on the planet that is not as good a Calvinist as Mr. Beecher; for they all believe exactly what John Calvin would have believed, if he had lived in their time and seen things as they see them. What a "happy family" of Calvinists we all are, to be sure!

THE DEMANDS OF LIBERALISM.

The zealous chaplain of the Massachusetts House of Representatives recently opened one of its sessions with the following prayer:—

The earth is thine, O Lord, and the fulness thereof, the world and they that dwell therein! And now that another of the world's great questions presses into this chamber for an answer, "What can we do for woman?" clamor answers "Let her vote." Clamor answers again, "Don't let her vote." Clamor thunders, clamor whines, clamor prays, clamor jeers. Shall we hear the jester of clamor? God forbid! If there be any stain of right withheld from those bright, blessed beings who, as mothers, wives, sisters, daughters, companions, friends, make up so much of the happiness of the Commonwealth's homes, give us wisdom clear enough to see and will strong enough to expunge that stain from the records of our otherwise prosperous State.

On this remarkable outpouring the New Bedford Mercury of March 22 comments as follows:—

Mr. Kimball, of Boston, in accordance with a suggestion that had been made to the chaplain, inquired whether it was in order for a person not a member of the House to discuss matters before the House, and the Speaker replied that such discussion was clearly not in order. After some debate, an appeal from the decision of the chair was not sustained. If the chaplain is wise, he will not consider himself in the light of a martyr, but will follow the dictates of common sense. His indiscreet zeal can have no other effect than to lessen his personal influence in the House; or, it may be, lead the members of the Legislature to conclude that the State can be conducted without a chaplain.

Again. As Mrs. Cheney recently informed us in these columns, the whole subject of "judicial swearing" is under fresh consideration in Massachusetts. On St. Patrick's day, the House of Representatives debated "the alteration of the statute concerning administering the oath so that it shall not conflict with the Roman Catholic conscience." Of course, from the liberal point of view, the judicial oath should universally be replaced by simple affirmation. For several years we have refused to take the judicial oath under all circumstances, on the ground that it is superstitious and imposes no obligation upon the conscience not included in the natural obligation to tell the truth at all times. In the Boston Commonwealth of March 23, we find the following bold and most excellent remarks on the subject:—

Our systems of oaths in courts is the last and strongest remnant of the old Puritanic laws. It seems destined to hold its place while the Sabbath laws are slowly disintegrating. But it is contrary to the animus of our government, and its days are surely numbered. It is based on the delusion that our government is a Christian government; that our nation and our State are Christian institutions. Whatever Puritanic Protestantism characterized the early laws of Massachusetts, it is plain that the American nation was organized on a purely secular basis. The state has been approximating a secular code of laws ever since its earliest years. The necessity for it grows as we advance. Jews were never so numerous in this State as to form serious objection to our plura prejudices. But now the Catholics have become active in protest, and lo! the Chinaman already appears within our borders. What next in shape of foreigner and anti-Protestant-Christian may appear we will not guess, but no doubt there is more immigration in store for us. New protests must still be made, as long as legal matters retain ever so slight a foothold on special creed or faith. - Quakers have long been exempt from oath. The Quaker's affirmation is as good as his oath. And so is any man's.

Adherence to the barbarous custom of attempting to scare truth out of a witness who would, in a natural state of confidence, prefer to lie, is puerile and disgrace to our courts. The whole system of oaths and sin of perjury rests on a superstitious base, which has become worm-eaten and rotten in these materialistic latter days. Pious people, who feel something solemn in an oath, would tell the truth quite as well without it. Sinners and heretics, who would lie without it, are about as sure to do so with it. In fact, the oath is a remnant of the past that has lost its efficacy as a truth-elicitor in the present day. Jurymen of sense do nowadays take testimony somewhat for what it is worth, measured by the standard of the character of the witness.

But should, then, perjury go unpunished? By no means. The sin that is punished under that head is not false swearing, but falsehood. Law punishes the lie, not the blasphemy. There used to be laws against profanity and blasphemy in the old Puritanic code. Perhaps their corpses may yet be found embalmed in the statute-book and still uninterred. But modern morality is inclined to consider those sins of so purely a personal character, like uncleanness, that it forbears to meddle with them. They show sad ignorance rather than aggression, and offer scope for education instead of punishment.

The State protects itself in its law against perjury. The perjurer injures it by falsehood, not by blasphemy. Let, then, a lie on the witness-stand go by its own name, and receive its own punishment. Drop out of our courts all the mummeries of superstition. Require of no man oaths, but "affirmations," which, if false, are lies, and subject to penalty as such. Let Christians follow truly the teaching of the Christ they claim, and "swear not at all"—not even in court. Let other folks know that a sin against truth is ever the same as sin against God. For God is truth.

In this and the previous extract we have italicised passages to which we would call especial attention. They indicate the progress making in the direction of a clean and thorough-going secularization of our government. On the one hand, the intensely earnest Christians of the country are striving to make the government more consistently Christian; on the other hand, the liberals are becoming daily more pronounced in their demand that it shall be made more consistently secular. The conflict thickens. So be it!

Note the confident and insolent tone with which the Philadelphia Christian Statesman, the organ of the Christian Amendment movement, treats those objections to its pet project which have been based on the equal rights of Christian and non-Christian citizens:—

"The newspapers which write against us help us amazingly, partly by their refusal to consider a single one of the series of arguments by which this movement is sustained, and partly by the repetition, in solemn chorus, of their stock of trite objections, until we are verily moved to laughter as we read.

Unless more thoughtful and serious opposition be offered, we shall simply walk over the course to our destined goal, brushing aside the cloud of irrelevant objections which have been raised, as a race-horse scatters the bevy of gnats that floats in the summer wind."

That is the spirit, fellow-citizens, in which these Christianizing revolutionists treat all arguments based on natural justice, equal rights, and the sacredness of religious liberty. The only arguments they listen to are drawn from Bible texts and decaying Christian superstitions. But they are raising a tempest which will sink American Christianity to such unfathomed depths that no system of deep-sea dredging ever yet invented can fish it up again. They are forcing issues upon the people of this country which will hasten by a hundred years the destruction of Christian power and prestige.

"Laughter," forsooth! It is that laughter which the Bible itself likens to "the crackling of thorns under the pot"—the laughter of intoxicated boatmen as their cockle-shell is swept resistlessly to the cataract's brink. If these hilarious reformers, laughing to the glory of God, imagine that the liberals of America are terrified by the noise of their pious buffoonery, they greatly overrate the military efficiency of their merriment. They who laugh at justice and freedom in this country will be very poorly amused by the echo. The Jewish priests are fabled to have blown down the walls of Jericho by the mere blasts of their trumpets. But it will take more than the wind of such idiotic cachinnations as these to blow down the walls of American freedom.

We assume no defensive attitude. We are for carrying the war into Africa. We should spurn the proposal to leave things as they are, on condition that this Christian Amendment agitation should cease. No! We have demands to make. The more bolsterous grows the mirth of these worthy gentlemen, and the more demonstrative their amusement at the idea that American freemen set a higher value on the principles of secular government than on the antiquated absurdities which they themselves prefer, the more cordially we congratulate them on doing their very best to ensure the success of these demands. The agitation they depend on as a means of preserving the "Christian observances" which still deface the practical administration of this non-Christian government, will ultimately lead to their total abolition. Let them agitate. The struggle between Christianity and secular freedom for the control of this country is inevitable, and will only be hastened by agitation. While these revolutionists are urging their demands, the liberals will more vigorously urge their own. What are they?

1. We demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property shall no longer be exempted from just taxation.
2. We demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, in State legislatures, in the army, navy and militia, and in prisons, asylums, and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued.
3. We demand that all public appropriations for sectarian educational and charitable institutions shall cease.
4. We demand that all religious services now sustained by the government shall be abolished; and especially that the use of the Bible in the public schools, whether ostensibly as a text-book or avowedly as a religious service, shall be discontinued.

edly as a book of religious worship, shall be prohibited.

5. We demand that the appointment, by the President of the United States or by the Governors of the various States, of all religious festivals and fasts shall wholly cease.

6. We demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all other departments of the government shall be abolished, and that simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury shall be established in its stead.

7. We demand that all laws directly or indirectly enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed.

8. We demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of "Christian morality" shall be abrogated, and that all laws shall be conformed to the requirements of natural morality, equal rights, and impartial liberty.

9. In short, we demand that not only in the Constitutions of the United States and of the several States, but also in the practical administration of the same, no privilege or advantage shall be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion; that our entire political system shall be founded and administered on a purely secular basis; and that whatever changes shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently, unflinchingly, and promptly made.

That is our reply to the audacious demands of the National Reform Association." Let the people decide which shall govern this country, Christian tyranny or secular freedom.

SENTIMENTALISM.

At a recent meeting of the Radical Club in Boston, as reported in the New York Tribune, the big-hearted brother of Chicago—who was probably saved from the great conflagration by the swifter flame of his own spirit, which left nothing for the material blaze to consume—struck into the talk about science and religion in quite a characteristic way. He honestly disclaimed an acquaintance with science, which seemed to him a windy snow-covered plain, and consequently exalted that of which he does know a great deal, namely, Sentiment—the warm fire-lit room, with glowing friends and a bountiful hot supper on the table. This worship of Sentiment was sincere, pathetic, and picturesque. As worship is wont to do, it chose the dramatic form of expression; the gurgling goodly man told a little story to illustrate his thought.

He was called to see a woman in grief and asked to give her consolation. At first he tried the rational—shall we say the scientific?—method, or perhaps it was merely the ecclesiastical; said all the wise, proper, encouraging, reasonably comforting things he could think of, but with no effect; the afflicted soul was unrefreshed. Then, ceasing to speak from his head and speaking right out of his heart, he told her how God loved her, felt for her, felt with her, shared her woe and pain, gave her, so to speak, tear for tear. This assurance the sorrowful soul received gratefully; if God sympathized with her, she would not complain; if He suffered as much as she did, she was content. It is not surprising that she was; indeed it would have been surprising if she had not been; such fellowship in suffering must have been true solace; such delicate flattery of one's self-esteem might go for something; if the woman was of a resentful disposition, the feeling that her tormentor got as good as he gave was probably quieting to her spirit. The grief that would not subside at bidding like this would be truly inconsolable.

But was the solace legitimate? That is the question. Casuistry has never yet decided whether the physician may ever tell lies to save his patient's life or sanity; whether the priest may in any case palm off sheer fictions to secure the peace of a troubled soul. We have never been much interested in the discussion, but have been willing to leave the matter in each case to the decision of good sense, allowing a liberal play for kind feeling. Few will maintain that sentiment should never temper the strict truth. But clearly there must be limits. Even the pleasantest fictions must not be permitted to have their own way unchallenged. Truth deserves some consideration, even from clergymen who are by profession idealists and sentimentalists. The Church of Rome practised pious frauds for a thousand years and more; did it deliberately, purposely, on principle, its theory being that, if Mahomet will not go to the mountain, the mountain must come, or must pretend to come, to Mahomet. The theory was about as flattering to common sense as its success was to common integrity. It began on the presumption that people were foolish, and ended by making them fools.

For some generations past it has been thought wiser to try to induce the sluggish, apathetic, slightly conceited Mahomet to take a few steps over the common earth towards the mountain. The trip, though a little fatiguing, possibly lacerating to the feet and legs from an occasional stone or thorn-bush, cannot be otherwise than strengthening. It is thought, to the constitution, and bracing to the will, and if a bit mortifying to spiritual pride, that is no irreparable misfortune.

It should be time now for ministers to practise the heroic method of treatment, not merely because it is heroic—though there can be no harm in that—but because it is honest and true. They need not be stickling for the truth and nothing but the truth, for the simple, bare, unadorned truth is not so easy to come at; they may mingle feeling with truth in equal measure; they may give a strong infusion of imagination with their science. All we contend for is that there must be an infusion of science with the imagination, a suspicion of truth mixed with feeling. Suppose we compromise on sentiment, which is thought suffused with feeling, or feeling tempered with thought—at all events thought and feeling, worked together. Pure feeling answers no better than pure thought; for if pure thought is cold, pure feeling is hot; if thought is ice, feeling is vapor. If either must preponderate, by all means let it be thought; for thought supposes intelligence, addresses itself to rational powers, opens views of the world, takes the mind out of its miserable limitations, starts faculties into activity, suggests new interests, makes the sufferer responsive to fresh ideas, places rocks of conviction under his feet; thought enlarges, strengthens, edifies. Pure thought would be best of all, if we could get it, for pure thought is luminous and sweet; it has the brilliancy and the tenderness of the sun-beam. But as pure thought is inaccessible, let us have thought as pure as we can find it, with the least possible admixture of soothing syrup. Public opinion is beginning to distrust that, notwithstanding the passionate cries—not altogether genuine—of the children.

O. B. F.

TAKING ONE'S OWN MEDICINE.

It is said that doctors, if sick, do not prosper under their own medicines. So the Christian Register does not show to good advantage when it tries to apply to its own case the prescriptions it is in the habit of making for others. It recently made the assertion that "the Free Religionists stand before the world now as an anti-Christian sect." The context made it clear that by "Free Religionists" in this sentence it meant the Free Religious Association. It spoke of "most of their officers" and of THE INDEX, which it calls "their organ," as proving this statement,—saying, besides, that "the Association withholds full hospitality from all who do not virtually renounce Christianity when uniting with them." Taking the hint from the Register's own method of dealing with persons and newspapers that have made certain questionable assertions about the Unitarian denomination, we called upon the Register to substantiate its sweeping statements by giving "names, time, and place." The readers of THE INDEX may be interested to know the result of the experiment. Here it is.

First, we fear we shall have to say that the Register declines a part of the prescription. What we asked for was—"Of the present officers of the Association, will it name those who have announced themselves as 'anti-Christian,' or even those who have actually or 'virtually renounced Christianity'?" What the Register says it was called upon to do is, "We are asked to give the names, time, and place of the virtual renunciation of Christianity by present officers of the Free Religious Association." It will be seen that the Register, like many other patients in similar circumstances, instead of following heroically the whole regimen, has taken advantage of a permissible reduction and chosen that part which, with reference to the conditions of its case, would appear to be easiest to comply with. We doubt if it would let Zion's Herald off thus, but we will be lenient and let this pass.

But taking its own interpretation of what it was asked to do, this is the way the Register meets it. It gives up on "time" and "place," but thinks it "knows some of the names." And it begins very confidently. "There is Mr. Abbot, of course." Yes, of course it is sure of him. But at the next step its confidence begins to betray some faltering. The second name it offers is that of Mr. Towne. But Mr. Towne, it is well known, positively refuses to renounce Christianity and insists on keeping the Christian name. The Register summarily disposes of him, however, by saying that "his Christianity is too Pickwickian to be of any avail." That is, it makes a definition of Christianity that shall exclude him from it in spite of his own statement! But then the Register discovers, and announces in a postscript, that "Mr. Towne is not now an officer of the Association." He is an active member, however, and the Register may count him if it chooses. Next it comes to Mr. Frothingham,—of whom it says that he "criticises Christianity as an outsider and asserts the inferiority of Jesus to other religious teachers in some essential respects." All this, it is certainly conceivable, might be done without renouncing Christianity. It is, to say the least, rather too indefinite to support the charge which the Register made, of anti-Christian dogmatism. With regard to Mr. Higginson, the next named, the Register is still more indefinite. All that it can say is that—"It is generally believed that Mr. Higginson does not care to be called a Christian." "Generally believed!" The Register does not allow such evidence as that to pass when it is dealing with the loose statements of the Congregationalist or Church and State. We will help the Register to a source of more specific knowledge. In THE INDEX for February 8, 1872, Mr. Higginson defines his own position as "extra-Christian," not "anti-Christian." The Register continues its list with the names of Messrs. Weiss and Potter. It "does not understand them to regard Jesus as pre-eminent the spiritual teacher and leader of the human race, though they may still do so." "If they have not virtually renounced Christianity"—will they not please say so? For that is the real substance of the Register's next sentence. It finds the testimony for its original assertion getting rather doubtful, and so it asks these gentlemen if they will not be so accommodating as to make a confession of their faith! If it prove that they are "disciples and followers of Jesus," then the Register will be "delighted to touch elbows with them in the Christian ranks," and to make amends for having "mistaken their position!" But those gentlemen, though ready at any suitable time to give their faith and a reason for it, can not thus interfere with the laws of evidence.

With these names the Register's list closes. We submit that it has not made out its case. It spoke of "most of the officers" of the Association as in some way implicated in the "anti-Christian" attitude which it says the Association has taken. It mentions five out of the thirteen officers who, it thinks, "have virtually renounced Christianity," though expressly admitting some doubt with regard to two of the five, and not bringing any specific proof of an anti-Christian attitude in two others. The Register does not let off its Orthodox antagonists with such a defence of their loose criticism as that. It is a somewhat curious fact, too, though having no special bearing upon the question, perhaps—but it may be an interesting fact to Zion's Herald—that three out of these five officers who, the Register says, "have virtually renounced Christianity," are recorded in the Unitarian Year Book for 1873 as recognized ministers in the Unitarian denomination.

The readers of THE INDEX should understand that this question, whether the members or officers of the Free Religious Association are Christian, or non-Christian, or anti-Christian, is not asked by the Association. It is merely a question which the Register has raised. In fact it has been one of the fundamental distinctions of the Association from the outset that its membership has been extra-Christian as well as intra-Christian. And if a member who has called himself a "Christian" gives up the name and feels even impelled to take an anti-Christian position, the fact would not alter his relations to the Association. That he can do that and still retain active membership in the Association—this, too, in a country where the Christian religion prevails—is the grand test of the liberty of the organization. But the Association is not thereby committed to this position. The Register, perhaps, will learn by and by that an Association is possible for the promotion of truth and good fellowship in which membership "shall leave each individual responsible for his own opinions alone;" and that a newspaper may be conducted, as THE INDEX is, on the same principle,—no contributor, editorial or otherwise, being responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions."

W. J. F.

There is no such thing as absolute rest in the universe. The only rest is orderly motion.

Do not "make up your mind." Let your mind make up you. Thought unsettles, but only to settle better.

Colonel Higginson writes that he is to be absent in Europe for a couple of months, leaving about the last of April. Our readers will doubtless reap some of the benefit of this trip, and will surely unite with us in the wish that it may prove a delightful one.

We regret to be obliged to take the name of Rev. J. Vila Blake from our list of editorial contributors. Mr. Blake has "become a business man for the present," and finds it impossible to get time for writing. We comply, therefore, with his request, and thank him gratefully for the kind and valuable help he has already given to THE INDEX.

In the Pittsburgh (Pa.) Christian Radical, edited by Rev. Daniel Schindler, we find a verse ludicrously illustrating the style of the editor himself, whose "Christianity" always gushes whenever his "Radicalism" forgets to snarl:—

"Please, Deans, to help 'little Daisy'!"

To which touching appeal the response would undoubtedly be made in the well-known language of Thomas Hood:—

"Go to your mother, child, and wipe your nose!"

"To despair of what a conscientious collection and study of facts may lead to, and to declare any problem insoluble because difficult and far off, is distinctly to be on the wrong side in science; and he who will choose a hopeless task may set himself to discover the limits of discovery." (Tylor's "Primitive Culture," Vol. 1, p. 32.) Let this be well pondered by those who despair of a scientific treatment of religious questions.

In a lecture on the "Tendencies of Modern Religious Thought," the late Rev. James Cranbrook, of Edinburgh, says:—"The scientific method is striving to bring everything under its control; politics, morals, government in the family, education, all that comes under the cognizance of man. . . . Evidently science is only just beginning its successful career. We are only on the threshold of its discoveries and its triumphs. As it progresses, it will take firmer hold of society, and bring more and more of the people under the influence of its spirit. As people are brought under the influence of its spirit, they will apply its methods to all spheres of their thought. And thus religion itself must come more and more under its control."

Remembering that the scientific method can expunge no fact and extinguish no truth, men of thought will not shrink from its universal supremacy, nor repeat in these later days the childish opposition of the Catholic Church to its advance.

We have on hand seventy-three articles from occasional contributors, most of them such as we should be very glad to publish. But they would fill several numbers of THE INDEX, if our entire space were surrendered to them. Under such circumstances the writers must perceive that non-insertion of their communications indicates no want of appreciation of their merit. The problem before us every week is how to get a gallon into a gill.

In various ways we have repeatedly hinted to the writing public that there is no room to waste in our columns; and, we confess, our patience is severely taxed at receiving by a single mail, from contributors who have already had special indulgence shown to their prolixity, two articles which together would fill three solid pages of THE INDEX. Rev. Francis T. Washburn sends one of four columns, and Mrs. Victoria C. Woodhull sends one of five columns. Both of these writers have already filled more than their due share of our narrow space; but if they will condense what they have to say into one column each, we will give them each another hearing. It is injustice to others to ask more.

We do not want volunteer essays for THE INDEX; but we are always glad to receive terse, pithy, vigorous communications. Long articles can be published elsewhere; THE INDEX wants short ones. Opinions of all kinds have always received impartial treatment at our hands; but impartiality does not mean indulgence of long-windedness. While not unwilling to face a discharge of bullets, we must beat a retreat when the feather-beds come flying about our ears.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to Errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:—

As the allusion to the Declaration of Independence in my essay on "Social Ideals" seems open to misconstruction, and as some sharpnesses of expression there indulged in afford enticing hooks to such as incline to present it in the least favorable light, I beg leave to offer a few words of explanation. What I said was in substance this: that the objects of desire actually specified in the Preamble, and put under the sanction of Rights, would be and are objects of desire to creatures below man's degree. "Your rat," I said somewhat sharply, "is as much attached as a human creature can be to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness." What follows? That the above are not legitimate objects of desire for men? Not at all; they are perfectly legitimate. Or does it follow that men have no rights corresponding to them? Assuredly not; all men, not guilty of crime, have such rights; and the government is odious and infamous which does not protect all in the just enjoyment of them. What is the point, then? That the Preamble covers but a part of the ground, and that, if taken as a complete statement or summary of first principles in politics, it becomes misleading—leading first to false notions of liberty, thence to indiscriminate suffrage, and thence to very imperfect constructions of social duty. In the essay this was put somewhat roughly, I admit, and was accompanied by a bit of subordinate criticism, which rather complicated matters. But the above is the simple and precise purport of the passage, leaving minor points aside.

It would, however, have been prudent in me to omit that passage from the essay, as I could hardly fail to be ill understood. But the passage when written was designed to be an Uhlán or two scouting in advance of the main body. To explain myself fully, it would be necessary to make a critical examination, first, of the political philosophy of the Eighteenth Century, and, secondly, of Jefferson's politics as manifested from 1790 to the end of his career. This piece of work I then expected to complete during the present spring; but a tedious and most inopportune illness has upset all my plans. The main body cannot come up, and the scout must take care of himself as best he can.

As I am condemned to silence for the immediate future, perhaps you will indulge me in a word more. I distinguish broadly between Republicanism and Democracy. Republicanism is my hope and ideal; Democracy arose from an attempt to flank the "divine right of kings" by attributing a right of the same character to the people indiscriminately. In our institutions and actual politics, the two—simply opposite in their fundamental principles—are mingled. They have been in conflict ever since 1790—the grand impulse to strict Democracy having been given by Thomas Jefferson. Eventually one of the two must conquer; and the question which it shall be is, in my judgment, by far the most serious one this nation has to consider. Assured for my part, and after no brief nor slight study, that all the good hopes of the nation are bound up with the principles of Republicanism, I find no fitter work than that of trying to make them clear. If in endeavoring to do so, and in some occasional, off-hand performances, I lay myself open to misconception by thrusting out sharp statements without the requisite shading, I shall trust candid men to construe me, not by a casual expression or two, but by the general tenor of my thought. My friend Halliwell, a man of rare uprightness, has tended a little too much, I think, to identify my opinions in general with certain special and incidental judgments, which he does not share; nevertheless I commit myself with entire confidence to his sense of justice.

D. A. W.

MILK FOR BABES SOURD.

BY REV. EDWARD C. TOWNE.

On the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the Christian Register, when by moral precipitancy backwards the paper had become more than a hundred years old, a great feast was made by the Boston members of the spinster sect. At this feast Rev. Dr. Hedge, who has so frequently of late found that he was among the Unitarians, but not of them, ventured a masculine suggestion, to the effect that hasty and careless reporting was an evil, and that possibly the Register was too much given to gossip. Then uprose one Daniel L. Haskell, with a "come-to-judgment" reply. This Daniel, it seems, is editor of the Boston Transcript, an evening paper, the editorial columns of which are largely devoted to generous remunerative mention of pills, plays, books, hair-dye, pictures, politics, poetry, &c.; and with manners evidently learned behind his editorial counter, he read Dr. Hedge, who at one time edited the Christian Examiner, the following lesson in journalism, which we quote from the Register's report of Mr. Haskell's remarks:—

"He thought the feature of the Register to which Dr. Hedge had alluded as objectionable was one of its principal attractions. Let our friend from Brooklyn, said he, re-establish the Christian Examiner, with its twenty-four subscribers, six of whom never read it, and let him put the Christian Examiner as it was and the Christian Register as it is together, and the one would lie with dust upon it, while children would cry for the other. I should not do justice to my own feelings on this occasion were I to keep mum in regard to our friend Mumford of the Register. . . . the man who writes those paragraphs; his inkstand is worth a mine of gold."

Doubtless the playful insolence of this fling at Dr. Hedge, and falsehood of its dull wit, were as excusable as the encomium upon Mr. Mumford's milk-pail was natural. Mr. Editor Haskell had written so many leading articles on the subject of Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup for Children, and had otherwise kept his mind so remote from intellectual interests, that really he could not be blamed for anything false or despicable which he might say about Dr. Hedge and the tradition of Unitarian learning; while, with the Transcript habit of mind—"children will cry for it"—came naturally to his lips as a formula of superlative eulogy, equally familiar and appropriate. From the point of view of his own experience of highly remunerative small talk, he could well bestow generous appreciation upon the gratuitous and impudently gossipy of the Register; and if, in doing this, he was rude to learning and thought, and literary culture, in one of the most distinguished of their living representatives, he might undoubtedly plead that he did not know it—much less know better than it. It was characteristic of the depression of high feeling in the regular Unitarian ranks, that from no quarter did there come any rebuke of the pert head-gossip of the Transcript. Or was it that Unitarian courtesy felt that any word of justice to Dr. Hedge would reflect so very hard upon Mr. Mumford? Dr. Hedge was known to the chairman of the feast as the most sensitive of men, and as a scholar, thinker, and writer of peculiarly pure and noble feeling, as well as the rarest attainments; and not to have felt, and at least corrected, if not resented, Mr. Haskell's ill-mannered thrust, was a sad misdirection of courtesy. It has for some time seemed as if denominational Unitarianism were becoming peculiarly tender towards the feeble-minded, the morally decrepit, and the professionally indigent in her pulpit, like a mother doting most upon her frailest or weakest child. Did it not cherish Hepworth, and even give him a Divinity school of his own within three miles of Cambridge, though perfectly well knowing (if present confessions are true) that Hepworth was a charlatan? And has it not attended, at least by elderly female proxies, at the Register lap, where Mr. Mumford now presides over milk for babes?

The least drop of Free Religion quite sours the editorial sentiments of the Register. In July last, one of Mr. Mumford's paragraphs curdled with misrepresentation of the Examiner. To take away the force of the fact that Miss Cobbe had sent the Examiner a contribution, expressly as such, it inserted a false word in its mention of her article, saying, "It (the Examiner) contains a fine (selected) essay on 'Prayer,' by Frances Power Cobbe;" as if we had helped ourselves to the article. The untruth of the word "selected" was inexcusable; for a distinct note expressly related, by way of introduction of Miss Cobbe's essay, that she had sent it as a contribution.

Again, Mr. Mumford's paragraph declared that we claim to be a Christian in the "Pickwickian sense." He knew this to be untrue. He soon had his attention particularly called to the gross untruth of any such statement, but he now (March 16) repeats the slander in an editorial assertion of our "Pickwickian Christianity." If there were any the least excuse for his first application, last July, of the term "Pickwickian" to our profession of Christian conviction, there is absolutely none now; for our complaint of the shameless falsehood of the assertion was made at the time, and was twice pressed upon the attention of our columnarist by the editor of the Boston Commonwealth, Mr. C. W. Slack. If the "love of Jesus constrained" Mr. Mumford to unscrupulous criticism once, the love of decent regard for truth should at least have prevented his making a second use of it.

But Mr. Mumford's most injurious innuendo is his assertion that we "may soon feel called upon to undertake" "an essay on the Cmelty, Selfishness, and Inefficiency of the Deity," and that the work which we had already done was "in the line of preliminary practice" for such a task of vulgar atheism. Mr. Mumford knew perfectly that our whole work rested on no other foundation than faith in the Goodness, Love, and Efficiency of the Deity. He dare not assert the contrary. He dare not pretend that our work and our writings have not shown, in the most distinct manner, a sincere, fervent, exceedingly strong conviction of the goodness, paternal efficiency, and absolute effectual mercy of Living Deity. We need only cite some sentences from the very essay which he pretended to consider "preliminary practice" for vulgar atheism, and proof that we claim the Christian name insincerely and lightly. We quote just as the words cited stand on the pages of the July Examiner:—

"We have felt the pressure of every conceivable minor motive to use reserve, and are only held to plain speech by the greater motives, our faith in GOD, Jesus or no Jesus, and in MAN, Christ or no Christ, and in TRUTH, Gospel or no Gospel. We are almost sorry not to be able to reject the Christian name for a time, along with the Lord Jesus, just to do more complete honor to our faith that God is, perish what may. We do not reject this name, but stoutly retain our hold on it, and on ministry, communion, and sacrament, connected with this name. The truth we find in Christianity without Christ; in Faith without Master; in Jesus, the Nazarene Christ, without the Lord Jesus—that is to say, in anybody and everybody, in anything and everything, made and kept and saved by the Infinite Ancestor, Father, and Redeemer, which the Living God is. There is no Lord but God, and of Him is all truth the law, prophecy, and gospel. It is fit and needful to step out from our low and narrow limitations of church, and creed, and Christ even, and stand free under the Infinite Presence, whose eyes shine on us like the stars, and whose being covers and holds us with depths of depths of eternal life, exceeding all that our imagination can conceive or our hearts desire. . . . In particular we challenge, on the strongest grounds of sober learning and sound thought, all rejection of the Christian name and connection, because of an assumed dependence of Christianity upon Jesus, called the Christ. . . . We understand that there is no surer fact than this, the condescension of Divine Love to men of low degree, and the exposure of humbleness. . . . The teacher of to-day, guided by love of practical truth, and owing allegiance to the divine providence and spirit, and none whatever to the person and word of Jesus, may and must and the truth is Jesus in the "Our Father," and the "Love one another," even if neither of these came directly from his lips.

It was with such evidence as this immediately before him, and a hundred-fold as much equally known to him, that Mr. Mumford accused us of "Pickwickian" adherence to the Christian name, and asserted the probability that our next step would be "an essay on the Cruelty, Selfishness, and Inefficiency of the Deity." It was not therefore by honest mistake that Mr. Mumford called our article "probably the most bitter, savage, and shameful attack upon Jesus that has ever appeared in any periodical which has received even the qualified sanction of respectable men." The able and candid critic of the New York Tribune said of the view taken in the same article, that it was "supported by quiet argument, instead of inflammatory suggestions," and declared that no one could doubt "the sincerity, ability, and deep religious feeling" of the writer; and the Boston Commonwealth, an ably edited journal, also pronounced this same article "the work of a man both honest and studious," and said that it was written "for the most part in the proper tone of scholarly discussion," and was a "very ingenious and very able" essay. Mr. Mumford's criticism was in violent contrast with these judgments, chiefly because he was determined to do injury by his words, no matter how untruthful or dishonorable they might be.

But we chance at this moment to bethink ourselves of a vague rumor which once came to our ears—that Mr. Mumford is a pious wit, and that the use of what seems virulent calumny is only a "Pickwickian" demonstration of a witty love of Jesus. If this be so, we of course erase our own gentle reflections in the latter half of the present article, and regret that pious wit is so inexplicable to us.

GIVE ORTHODOXY A CHANCE.

MILL RIVER, Mass., March, 1872.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

Enclosed I send you the petition I received from you with a few names attached; also two dollars for one year's subscription to THE INDEX.

I would like to say a few words about the question asked by your correspondent H. L. B. B.—"How to reach the imbruted."

H. L. B. B.'s suggestion that "Free Religion does not claim as its most prominent direct object the conversion of outbreathing sinners, but the diffusion of truth and light among all classes, believing that education is better than conversion, that soup, soap, and spelling-books are better moral agencies than tracts and sermons," is very good; but still why not let tracts and sermons do their work? Don't discourage Orthodox missionaries—they are needed as stepping stones to a higher faith. The notions of the dark ages do not possess Christians of to-day. They believe that development of the human mind is a part of the Creator's design; therefore, since they carry soup, soap, spelling books and education along with them, let them work. They are needed and will do good, so long as they do not try to subvert the principles of our government; and the common sense of the people will block the wheels of any movement of this kind.

Now if a part of H. L. B. B.'s suggestion is very good, another part, it is hoped, will never be adopted by Free Religionists. She says: "It (free religion) believes, if a man has actually sunk so low that moral motives cannot avail with him, he is out of the reach of any truly religious ones, though he may be indoctrinated with a cruel superstition under the name of piety." There are two features about this part of the suggestion that careful thinkers will not adopt. One is the inference naturally drawn, that Free Religionists are the only truly religious, and that all other religions are cruel superstitions. This—"Mine is the only true religion"—is a bigoted notion preached from Orthodox pulpits everywhere.

In fact this bigotry seems to accompany religious conviction; but since we have come to know the wonderful power of mind, we are not astonished at humanity's freaks, or the historic barbarities perpetrated in the name of religion; because we know this conviction to be a matter of cause and effect.

The other feature of this suggestion is the recognized possibility that "men do get so low that moral agencies and true religion will not reach them." Now there are all grades of religion, but to-day there are none in our midst, of the Christian faith, that can be termed crude superstitions, although nearly all may be termed superstitiously religious and yet be truly religious. There seems to be a difference between religion and morality (for some men seem to have a deal of religion, and not much morality). Religion can exist without morality, but still men can make morality a religion. There seems to be in human nature a faculty or attribute that can be called by no other name than a religious faculty, and any notion or act of the imagination that satisfies the longings of this faculty is true religion to that being. Now, if these missionaries of Christ's church can by vigorous language reach and psychologize this organ into their faith and satisfy this inherent longing in an imbruted mind, and by this means bring this mind into the path of rectitude and virtue and in the way of getting an education, then they are doing a noble work, and work it is very doubtful whether any Free Religionist would stoop to. At least, it would take years of organization and drill to establish such a corps of missionaries in the field as belongs to the Christian Church. The surest way to reach ignorance is, first, to excite superstitious fear. Self-preservation is the first law of nature. This is the most vulnerable point in undeveloped man. This stronghold secured (brimstones will do it), soup, soap, spelling-books and education will follow in their turn.

Free Religionists ought not to waste their powder on small game; their legitimate hunting-ground is immediately before and around them. Leave the weak-minded men and women and heathen, for the chase of Orthodox churches; and sail in and capture the strong-minded and the men of science that are in the churches, impregnating the rest with the spirit of rationalism so that, by the time the heathen have been Christianized, the whole world of Christians will have insensibly advanced to Free Religion.

H. D. S.

ORTHODOXY A PRACTICAL FAILURE.

SUSPENSION BRIDGE, N. Y.,
February 25, 1872.

EDITOR OF INDEX:—

In last's weeks INDEX, in an article over the initials H. L. B. B., the question is raised—"How to reach the imbruted." A missionary friend of H. L. B. B., writing from our Southwest border, is of opinion that something more practical than Free Religion is needed to reach darkened heathen minds. "They must be told of a Deity whom they have fearfully angered; of a terrible judgment in store for them, and of one who can deliver them from it." Before we grant that the method he indicates is the best for those to whom he is preaching, it will be pertinent to inquire whether he has ever tried any other method, to request more particulars as to the character of those to whom he is preaching, and to ask what success he has met with in his efforts.

For more than twenty years I have spent the greater part of my life in the most remote of our Western borders. During that time I have attended the burial of ten persons killed in personal affairs, or hung by mob-law, or murdered for their money, where I have attended the burial of one person who died a natural death. It will be conceded that in communities where such events were constantly occurring, one would be brought in contact with the imbruted if anywhere. A few incidents drawn from my life while thus situated may be interesting to your readers, and may throw some light on this question.

In one small mining camp in eastern Oregon (for aught I know three hundred miles from any organized church), some six or eight years ago there were about fifty permanent residents. There were among us gamblers, saloon-keepers, roughs, and, as in all communities, those well-disposed. This assortment didn't make the best society in the world, yet pleasant views of life would frequently be offered.

One was taken sick. No one of them all was more repulsive than he—a gambler, an idler, spending his whole time in the drinking and gambling saloons, and a foul-mouthed man. It soon became apparent that his disease, a fearful organic one, would soon be beyond human control, unless he was placed at once under skilful medical treatment. An appeal was made to the residents, and in half a day money enough was raised to send him to San Francisco, more than a thousand miles away, and leave him there with more money in his pocket than he had been known to have in years.

The next year there came urgent appeals from the far East in behalf of those who were suffering from the terrible battles which were so frequently occurring in the South. Our community was composed of men from all sections, Missouri and Arkansas borderers, some from farther South, while the majority were from the North. Yet when an appeal for help was made, five or six hundred dollars were raised in a short time and forwarded.

Two or three years after the occurrence of these events, when our little community had become more settled and quiet, when gambling had almost if not entirely ceased, when drinking was confined to a few inveterate tipplers, and the roughs had been displaced by a better disposed class, there came one day for the first time a preacher, who announced that he would preach to the people. He was a modest, unassuming man, with a serious, thoughtful and not unintellectual face. A fair audience assembled to hear him, and apparently interest was awakened in his effort. At the close of his discourse, he announced that he would preach each alternate Sunday through the summer. He came at the appointed times, faithfully preached the gospel of Hell, the wrath of an offended God, and the exceeding goodness and mercy of God in sacrificing himself on the cross in the person of Jesus Christ to save us from perdition. Towards the close he urged that God needed help to save, and that his cause would be materially assisted by the contribution of that which is said to be the root of all evil, money. No one saw it in that light. His pictures of Hell terrified no one. His affecting narratives of the sufferings on the cross of Christ moved no one. His angry God frightened no one. His plaintive appeal for help brought a beggarly return, scarcely enough to pay his travelling expenses to and from the place. After he left, one of the few inveterate drinkers of the camp had his leg broken by accident. Improvident, he had exhausted his means and his credit. Again an appeal for help was made, and soon money was forthcoming enough to pay his physician's fee, his board, and leave him upon his recovery in a better condition financially than when the accident happened.

Will not my experience fully justify me in my belief that preaching humanity to men is as effective to move them to religious acts, as it is to preach Christ crucified, the terrors of Hell, and an angry God?

One other incident, related to me by one who witnessed the occurrence, may serve to illustrate this matter further.

In a locality upon the border, a spot of great fertility and surpassing beauty, a settlement was formed, each resident being intent upon building up and surrounding himself with the comforts of home. The utmost harmony prevailed among them all. Each one stood ready to help the other in case of need. Kindly acts, good will, and fellowship was the rule, and in their social gatherings they were wont to say to each other how peacefully and happily events were passing among them. Said my narrator—"It seemed as if it was Heaven upon earth." One day, unsolicited by them, there came into the neighborhood a Methodist minister, who prepared to preach to them. So cordial a welcome was given him that he soon broached the subject of building a church. The plan met with a favorable reception, and soon a modest and unassuming church made its appearance. Everything had thus far gone on harmoniously; but in an evil day a Baptist minister came into the neighborhood. Now it happened that some, before they came to this neighborhood, had been baptized, and others had descended from Baptists, so that the new minister soon found himself among friends. He solicited the use of the Methodist church, and from its pulpit insisted upon the necessity of immersion, which proved to be a hot shot thrown into the Methodist camp. The Methodists were uneasy; uneasiness was followed by discussions; and in time a Baptist church, far more imposing than the Methodist, made its appearance. The Methodists, however, were not to be outdone. New carpets were obtained for the aisles; the seats were cushioned; the pulpit was decorated; and, all this was not enough, the women put on airs and dressed more stylishly than heretofore. The Baptists saw into the game, and would not be outdone. An intense rivalry soon sprang up, dissensions came, quarrels followed, and the Heaven which many thought they had found on earth had degenerated into a Hell.

Fraternally yours,

SAMUEL COLT.

WHAT THEY THINK.

PORT HURON, Mich., Feb. 26, 1872.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Esq.:

Dear Sir,—Enclosed please find petition against the recognition of God, Jesus Christ or the Bible in the Constitution of the U. S. I am sorry there are so few names from Port Huron; there are many who refuse to sign it because they say the convention is all a farce and there is no danger. There are others who profess to be liberal that think there would be no harm to merely recognize God and the Bible in the Constitution—and do not seem to care anything about it.

There are a few who belong to the Orthodox churches who have signed the petition—but I find the greatest number are in favor of the proposed amendment.

Yours respectfully,

JOHN L. NEWELL.

JOTTINGS.

I sign the remonstrance from a sense of duty, to testify against fanaticism in high places. But I do not share in any alarm. The people have more sense than their pretended leaders give them credit for. It reminds me of the clergyman that asked a little boy if he knew the Lord's prayer? "Yes; don't you?" was the quick reply. But let them get the change into the Constitution, and we shall see strange things in Congress. Some Fisk may be a member, for there is always "one more," as the shopkeepers say, and he may be the chairman of the "Evangelical Committee," and that would look funny enough, but not improbable.

I think Mr. Washburn travels in a small circle. Somebody asked Father Taylor if he believed anybody was as good as Jesus; and he said, "Yes, thousands!"

It being settled that reformed rakes make the best husbands, what are we to say of the apparent tendency of reformed pugilists to turn preachers of the Gospel? There is an association in England denominating itself "The United Christian Band of the Royal Artillery of Heaven." Among the members, as we are informed by an advertisement, are "many extraordinary men who have been rescued from the devil, having been wrestlers, publicans, and pugilists, but are now servants of God." "Hallelujah!" concludes the advertisement, and so say we. There is one peculiarity of these muscular brethren which in an emergency may prove convenient—if a majority of them get possession of a meeting-house, it will not be easy for the majority to turn them out; and this, in these military days, is something.—N. Y. Tribune.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them, from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents concepts of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no sabler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Fall of Pigeons, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six Copies Fifty Cents; Twelve Copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous and able subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single Copies, Five Cents; Twelve copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman's Rights, a pointed pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX OFFICE. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio.

SOW THE SEED!

THE "IMPEACHMENT OF CHRISTIANITY," published in the first number of the third volume of THE INDEX, has been electrotyped, and an edition of Ten Thousand Copies has been printed in the form of

A Cheap Tract for Gratuitous Distribution!

It is intended to circulate One Hundred Thousand Copies during the current year. In order to accomplish this purpose, we must rely upon the co-operation of our active sympathizers.

☞ Packages of these TRACTS, containing any desired number of copies, will be mailed to any address on receipt of enough money to defray postage, and whatever additional sums, large or small, the generosity of distributors may prompt them to add.

Of course, money will be needed to carry out our intentions; but we urge every one who believes that THIS TRACT WILL DO GOOD, and who is willing to distribute copies of it, to send in an order at once, even if unable to donate more than the simple postage and the time required for distribution. Do not hesitate because you cannot give more. We are convinced more than ever by the character and objects of the late Cincinnati Convention, that such plain speech as this TRACT contains is greatly needed at the present time. In the name of Christianity,

A most Dangerous Attempt is now Making to Subvert the Religious Liberties

of the American People; and the mighty magic of that name is still powerful over multitudes even of otherwise liberal minds. Let the world learn that the protest made against Christianity is not made by hatred of Goodness and of Truth, but rather by a love for those that can no longer be satisfied with sham. He woefully misjudges this Tract who thinks it has no higher aim than to "make a sensation." It was meant to tell needed truth so plainly that it must be heard. And it will be heard. All we ask is—give it a chance.

☞ Address your orders to THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio

A BOOK FOR THE TIMES!

"THE CLERGY A SOURCE OF DANGER TO THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC." Sold by Subscription only! ☞ Agents Wanted!

Address W. F. JAMIESON,
117-120, 10 N. Jefferson St., Chicago, Ill.

Lake Shore & Mich. Southern R. R.

1872.

ON and after Sunday, Jan. 14th, 1872, Passenger Trains will leave Toledo daily (Sundays excepted) as follows (Cleveland time):

CLEVELAND & TOLEDO DIVISION.

LEAVE TOLEDO.

8:00 A. M. Atlantic Express East, daily, arrives at Cleveland at 7:35 A. M.
6:50 A. M. Day Express will stop at Elmore, Fremont, Clyde, Bellevue, Monroeville, Norwalk, Townsend, Wakeman, Oberlin, Elyria and Beron, arrives at Cleveland at 10:50 A. M.
10:55 A. M. Cincinnati Express, stopping at all stations, reaches Cleveland at 3:45 P. M.
6:30 P. M. Special N. Y. Express, will stop at Fremont, Clyde, Monroeville, Norwalk and Elyria, arrives at Cleveland 10:15 P. M. Sleeping cars to Buffalo and Rochester.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

10:40 and 10:55 A. M., and 7:40 and 11:00 P. M.

MICHIGAN SOUTHERN DIVISION.

TRAINS DEPART.

MAIN LINE—8:15 A. M., Mail; 11:15 A. M. Special Chicago Express; 6:45 P. M., Coldwater Accommodation; 8:00 P. M., Night Express.
AIR LINE—11:35 A. M., Accommodation; 11:30 P. M. Pacific Express.
DETROIT—6:00, 11:30 A. M., 8:30 and 8:00 P. M.
JACKSON—11:15 A. M., and 8:00 P. M.
KALAMAZOO AND GRAND RAPIDS—11:15 A. M., and 8:00 P. M.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

MAIN LINE—6:20 and 10:35 A. M., and 5:40 & 6:00 P. M.
AIR LINE—2:30 A. M., and 5:55 P. M.
DETROIT—10:40 and 12:01 A. M., and 6:05 and 9:00 P. M.
JACKSON—10:55 A. M., and 5:51 P. M.
COLDWATER ACCOMMODATION—10:55 A. M.

CHAS. F. HATCH, Gen'l Supt.,

Cleveland, Ohio.
S. H. WARING, Ticket Agent, Toledo, O. [9017]

St. Louis, Quincy, Hannibal, Keokuk, Toledo, Wabash & Western R. R.

PULLMAN PALACE SLEEPING CARS!

THE Toledo, Wabash & Western Railway Co., having recently extended its line of Railway to the City of Saint Louis, will commence running all its regular passenger trains through to that city on and after the 14th day of May, 1871. The day trains will be equipped with new and elegant passenger coaches, and all night trains with the much celebrated and popular Pullman Palace Sleeping Coaches.

	Special Thro' Express.	Pacific Express.
Leave Toledo.....	11:10 A. M.	11:15 P. M.
Ar. Ft. Wayne.....	8:00 P. M.	8:30 A. M.
" Lafayette.....	7:40 "	8:20 "
" Danville.....	10:05 "	11:50 "
" Springfield.....	8:25 A. M.	4:10 P. M.
" Quincy.....	8:45 "	8:25 "
" Keokuk.....	9:50 "	10:45 "
" St. Louis.....	7:00 "	7:15 "

Trains arrive from the West at 3:15 A. M., 5:40 P. M., and 5:00 P. M.

GES. H. SUMMOW,

Gen'l Superintendent.

JOHN U. PARSONS,

Gen'l Ticket Agent.

[9017]

Now Ready!

R. G. INGERSOLL'S GREAT ORATION,

"THE GODS."

PRICE.....Fifty Cents.

☞ Send orders to

LOCK BOX 454,

118-119,

Peoria, Illinois.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00.
Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $3.00 each.

☞ All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

110-16100w.

Box 2598, St. Louis, Mo.

JUNIOR UNMARRIED; or, THOMAS PAINE the author of the "Letters of Junius" and the "Declaration of Independence." A DEMONSTRATION. Royal 16mo. pp. 32. Price, $1.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

Address JOHN GRAY & CO.,
P. O. Box 680, Washington, D. C.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 25 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCREAF D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

NEW BOOKS BY MAIL!

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

Bookseller and Publisher,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

Will send the following NEW BOOKS by mail on receipt of the publisher's price:

"LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF RELIGION," by Max Mueller.....$1.50
"RADICAL PROBLEMS," by Dr. C. A. Bartol.....$1.50
"THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH," by Louis Figuer.....$1.50
"THE DEBATABLE LAND," by Robt. Dale Owen.....$1.50
"SHORT STUDIES ON GREAT SUBJECTS," (Second Series), by Froide.....$1.50
"THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST"—An Examination of Liddon's Hampton Lectures.....$2.50

THE RELIGION OF HUMANITY.

BY O. B. FROTHINGHAM.

ITS GOD, ITS BIBLE, INCARNATION, REGENERATION, IMMORTALITY, PROVIDENCE, MORAL INSPIRATIONS, AND LAWS.

THE first two of these Essays will appear in The Radical for APRIL.

M. D. CONWAY contributes to the same number—

"The Theist's Problem and Task,"

and JOHN W. CHADWICK—

"A STUDY OF VOLTAIRE."

This series of Essays by Mr. FROTHINGHAM are among the best of his writings, and furnish a very important feature in THE RADICAL the present year, sketching as they do in the ablest manner the outlines of the New Radical Religion.

Now is the Time to Subscribe!

$3 a Year; Single Copies, 50 Cents.

☞ Address

THE RADICAL,

116:17

25 Bromfield St., Boston, Mass.

AGENTS WANTED for "JESUS." By Charles F. Deems, D.D. His Divinity established and Rationalism routed. The most popular and rapidly-selling religious work ever issued. ☞ For Circulars, address U. S. PUBLISHING CO., N. Y., Cincinnati, Chicago or St. Louis. 117-129.

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

IT is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

☞ Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, APRIL 13, 1872.

WHOLE No. 120.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARNOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BACON, FROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. HALLGREN, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CURNEY, REV. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

The Development Theory.

[The Second Free Lecture, by F. E. ARNOT, in the City Hall, Dover, N. H., November 30, 1868.]

"It is not I who seek to base Man's dignity upon his great toe, or insinuate that we are lost if an Ape has a hippocampus minor. No one is less disposed to think lightly of the present dignity, or despairingly of the future hopes, of the only consciously intelligent denizen of this world." [HUXLEY, Man's Place in Nature, p. 129.]

There is a very homely and not very new anecdote, doubtless familiar to most of us, which well illustrates the subject I have chosen for the evening's lecture, namely, the Development Theory. A negro preacher was descending on the mysteries of creation, and declared that the Lord made Adam out of mud. "Hold on dar!" exclaimed one of his hearers, "de good book says de Lord made Adam out of dust!" "Well," replied the preacher, "de dust wouldn't stick together, and so he had to take mud, and lean him up against a fence to dry." This answer appeared to silence the objector, and the preacher was about to proceed with his discourse, when his irrepressible listener burst out once more:—"What I want to know is, who made dat fence?" "Brudder," replied the preacher, in a tone of solemn reproof, "ax a few more questions like dat, and you'll upset de whole science of theology!"

This anecdote, extravagant as it seems, is hardly a burlesque on the usual instructions of the pulpit on the subject of the creation. Some old poet among the Hebrews, nobody knows who, first told the legend preserved in the opening chapter of Genesis, as the best account he could give of the origin of the universe; and this crude fancy of a barbarous age, this grand but scientifically worthless speculation of an untaught nomad tribe, is gravely preached to-day as a divinely inspired history of the birth of the world, to doubt which is blasphemy and infidelity. But, notwithstanding the frowns of superstition and the anathemas of alarmed priestcraft, the human mind begins to comprehend the true character of these old traditions, and to look elsewhere for light on the great question of the origin of man and the globe he inhabits. Without the least concern whether "the whole science of theology" is to be upset or not, modern science calmly pursues her investigations, and persists in putting her fatal inquiry,—"who made that fence?"

There are many persons to-day so convinced of the impossibility of obtaining any solution of the great problem of creation, that they stigmatize all discussion of it as useless and worse than useless, saying that we should content ourselves with studying subjects within the reach of human faculties, and forbear to push our inquiries into regions of impenetrable fog. To postpone indefinitely in this manner all investigation of the universe as to its parentage is certainly a wiser course than to accept with credulity the answers to our query which are rendered, not by the universe itself, but by presumptuous theologians who pretend to speak with authority on matters of which they know absolutely nothing. But it is idle to forbid, or discourage even, the activity of the human mind, in whatever direction it may choose to exert itself; and because in all ages I see that men have been driven by intellectual curiosity to speculate on the enigma of creation, I believe that giving advice to refrain from such speculation is talking against the wind.

Besides, the hitherto unsatisfactory character of human inquiry on the subject seems to me in great measure due to the false methods of research which have been adopted. Men have tried to dream out an answer to the problem, without having recourse to the true scientific methods of observation, experiment, and induction; and from dreams nothing but dreams can be born. The dazzling triumphs and discoveries of the Baconian method of investigation, which have given so enormous an impulse to human civilization in the last three hundred years, have flowed exclusively from a new-born willingness to hear what Nature really says, and the abandonment of all attempts to make her say what we have merely imagined. When we cease to pore over the scriptures of barbaric men, and begin to read the eternal scriptures of God ever before our eyes in the heavens and the earth, then we begin to obtain intelligible answers to our interrogatories; and when taunted with inability to discover any clew to the profound mysteries of creation, science may point with modest pride to her Nebular Hypothesis and her Development Theory. From the vast ocean of mystery, a portion, at least, of solid land has been reclaimed, and made to yield a firm basis to constructive thought. Instead of floundering in the bottomless mud of theological swamps, and trying to stand upright in the mire of miracles, we have found a foothold of rock in the idea of natural law; we have learned that creation is not an event but a process, and covers, not an insignificant six days, but rather the whole expanse of exhaustless and limitless time. The change of base implied in the establishment of these great principles is full of promise, and proves that, when approached from the standpoint of science rather than that of theology, human thought is not wasted in the effort to decipher the hieroglyphics of creation.

But what is creation? What does that word stand for in our own minds, and how does its meaning for us differ from its meaning for other men? Let me briefly answer these questions.

The universe exists; there can be no denial, no doubt, of that. But if anything now exists, something must always have existed; since otherwise that which exists must have sprung into being out of absolute vacuity, without any cause whatever. The simple fact that the universe exists to-day—a fact which the most determined sceptic cannot but admit—proves to demonstration that something or other must have existed from all eternity. The admission of an eternal something must be made by all persons not insane. But what is it?

Some say it is matter, which has blindly and unconsciously shaped itself into this beautiful universe without any evolving and formative intelligence. Others say it is God, who, after infinite ages of lonely communion with himself, at last called the universe into being by a simple fiat of his will. Those who give the first answer commonly say that matter is uncreated—that there has never been any creation at all. Those who give the other answer, say that God created matter "out of nothing," and in the absolute emptiness of infinite space caused, by a mere word, the boundless universe to start into being. This is the usual meaning of the word "creation," as explained by theologians—the sudden conversion of Nothing into Something, the instantaneous production of matter where before were absolute darkness and non-existence.

Now in this sense of the word I do not believe in any creation at all. I see no reason for believing that there ever was a time when the universe of matter had no existence—that there ever was a time when it altogether began to be. A third answer to our question is possible. Something, I see, must have existed from all eternity; and, because I am a theist, and not an atheist, I believe that God has so existed. But I see no reason why I should not believe that matter is eternal too—not of course as independent of God, but rather as absolutely dependent on him, as the eternal product of his eternal thought and life. Certainly, to believe that, up to a particular point of time in the past, no universe existed, and that God had then spent already a whole past eternity of idleness and inactivity, is to me supremely irrational. I believe in no idle God, no dead God, no God that can sleep through a whole eternity; the only God I can believe in is One with whom to live is to act, to pour forth exhaustless energies in perpetual stream, to radiate life and power throughout infinite space and time. Hence, since either matter or God must be eternal, I find no greater difficulty in believing that both are eternal than that one is so. The difficulty lies in believing that anything can be eternal, and this we must believe. Matter is to me the everlasting self-expression of Mind, the visible form in which the Infinite has, as it were, everlastingly clothed the divine thought and manifested its own being. Creation, therefore, is either a word without any significance, or else it means that endless outpouring of infinite power which creates the universe anew at every instant of time. Jesus is reported to have said—"My father worketh hitherto, and I work." This everlasting working of God, this ceaseless efflux of divine potency in forms perceptible by human senses, this perpetual evolution of finite being in accordance with what we call natural law (i. e. the ideas of God), is what I mean by creation; and in no other sense can I accept the word for myself.

Two theories, therefore, are before us, when we come to interpret the history of the globe and its inhabitants. The one is the theory of Spasmodic Creation, or the instantaneous production of matter out of absolute nothingness, and the instantaneous production of new species of living beings at successive geological epochs. This may be called the Biblical Theory. The other is the theory of Perpetual Creation, or the eternity of matter as a living expression of divine energy, and the unbroken continuity of its development in all its changes, including the gradual evolution of new species out of old ones. This may be called the Development Theory, though not always advocated by scientific men in quite so complete and thorough-going a sense.

Now the Biblical Theory gives the origin and history of the universe as seen by imagination,—the Development Theory as seen by reason. But, on the imaginative basis of Genesis, theology has built up a huge superstructure of dogma which has neither poetry nor science to recommend it. I have nothing to say against the Biblical Theory, when taken, as it should be taken, as the crude guess of untutored man at the origin of the home in which he was born and came to consciousness,—his reverent confession of the Divine mystery of Nature and his own soul. As a poem, I regard that first chapter of Genesis as unsurpassed. But when this poem is taken into theology as a solemn record of facts, and made to bolster up all sorts of absurd tenets—or when it is taken into science as an infallible record to which all observation of facts and all induction from them must be made to conform,—then I say it is time to expose the true character of the chapter, and emancipate the world from its oppressive influence. This has been, in fact, in great measure done, at least so far as the realm of science is concerned; scientific men now care very little what Genesis says or omits to say. But in the realm of religion it is not so. There it still exists as the underpinning of the Christian Church, and grave doubts may well be entertained whether the venerable edifice could outlast the attempt to put under it a new underpinning. Hence the importance of showing that, while the Biblical Theory of creation, based on Genesis, cannot be disturbed without endangering the whole fabric of historical Christianity, the Development Theory, which will inevitably supersede it, is in the highest degree friendly to a truly spiritual religion. In fact, the Development Theory lies at the root of all intense faith in the ever-present and ever-active God; for it alone can recognize that ceaseless "working" of the Eternal Spirit, that perpetual activity of Divine Life both in Nature and the soul of man, which is the condition of all true worship. Belief in the indwelling God, who makes his temple in the pure and holy soul, and perpetually ministers comfort, hope, and peace to all those who truly live, is so closely connected with the Development Theory, that I find myself unable to separate the two; for both grow out of one and the same root. If God is immanent or indwelling in the soul, so must he be also immanent or indwelling in Nature; and this involves that very ceaselessness of activity, that very uninterruptedness of living presence, which the theory of a constant development or perpetual creation of Nature demands. Hence I look with the greatest hope to the progress of science, believing that the nearer science comes to the truth, and the nearer religion comes to the spirit, so much the nearer will they unite to each other, and so much the sooner will they unite in that "worship in the spirit and in the truth" which is indeed the only true worship. Strange as it may sound, therefore, I make the Development Theory an essential part of the gospel in which I put my trust, and which I mean to preach as long as I am able to preach any gospel at all.

The account of the creation, as given in Genesis, divides the creator's work into six periods of a day each, and makes it consist of six miraculous exertions of Divine power. The last of these miracles is the creation of man out of the dust of the ground. Now when the formation of this vast universe was proved by geology not to have taken place in six days, but rather to have extended through an enormous period of unknown duration, the first effect of this collision between facts and the rude cosmogony of Genesis was a compromise between science and theology. Theology agreed to call the six days of creation six long geologic periods or eras, and twisted the Hebrew words to make them support this palpable evasion of their meaning. That the Jews themselves understood the word as signifying days and not periods, is plain enough from the fact that the reason given in the book of Exodus [xx, 8-11] for observing the Sabbath is, that the Lord made heaven and earth in six days and rested on the seventh. [So Exodus, xxxi, 16, 17]. The meaning of this is clear. If the Jews were to rest on the seventh day because then the Lord rested from the work of the precious six days, it is plain that days, and not eras, were meant; otherwise the Jews would be commanded to keep as a Sabbath, not one day in seven days, but one geologic age in seven geologic ages; which is a supremely absurd notion.

Notwithstanding all this, however, theology agreed to interpret the six days of creation as so many ages, when she found herself unable to overthrow the proof that six common days were not time enough for such a task. Science, in her turn, agreed to interpret the commencement of each geologic age as a new display of creative power, characterized by frightful convulsions of Nature, by the destruction of all living creatures, and by the creation of fresh species in their stead. This theory is still defended by the older and more conservative school of geologists, Prof. Agassiz among them (for science also has its conservatives and radicals); while it has been abandoned by those who, like Sir Charles Lyell, have kept their minds open to the light of truth.

It was vain to suppose, however, that this compromise, patched up between science and theology, could long continue; the bolder minds, like Dr. Hutton of Edinburgh, soon disowned it, and regarded all these pretended catastrophes as gradual changes, brought about by natural causes like those now in operation. Out of the intellectual discontent occasioned by this compromise between theology and science, this oil-and-water admixture of miracle and law, sprang the Development Theory, first advanced in striking form by the famous Lamarck. But it did not assume a thoroughly scientific shape till 1859, when Mr. Charles Darwin published his world-renowned "Origin of Species." He was the first to explain plausibly the appearance of new species of animals and plants without invoking the aid of miracles, by showing how variations of climate or other surrounding influences tend to produce in any species a corresponding change of structure, which may be transmitted to offspring; and by discovering the great law of "natural selection," according to which the species which are best fitted to the changed climate or circumstances by a corresponding change of structure, have the best chance in the great "struggle for life," and outlast species that cannot thus adapt themselves to changed conditions. That species may perish without any great convulsion of Nature, is proved by the extinction in historic times of that strange bird called the Dodo.

Prof. Huxley gives an instance of the changes of structure I have referred to in the case of the crocodiles, which, as a group, have a very vast antiquity. They abounded ages before what is known in geology as the cretaceous or chalk period. Between the crocodiles that lived prior to this chalk period, and those that lived in it, there is a difference in the form of the joints of the back-bone and in some minor particulars; between the crocodiles of the chalk period and those of the next or "older tertiary," there are other small differences; between the crocodiles of the "older tertiary" and those of the "newer tertiary," there are still other small differences; and so on down to the present time. Thus each epoch has had its peculiar crocodiles, differing simply in their proportions and in such structural peculiarities as can be discerned only by trained eyes. Now of two things, one. Either each in a series of twenty or more successive species of crocodiles was created afresh without parentage, or else these species were developed one out of another by the influence of gradual changes known to have gone on in the inorganic world. Men of science are rapidly coming to accept the latter alternative as the true one.

On the appearance of Mr. Darwin's book, the issue was fairly made up between the Biblical and the Development Theories; and the compromise hitherto made between science and theology fell to pieces, as every compromise between contradictory theories must in the end. Here lies the knot of the question:—Can we account for the appearance of new species of animals and plants, and the disappearance of fossil species, without miracles? The Biblical Theory says, "No." The Development Theory says, "Yes." And the battle is hot and fierce between the two. But day by day faith in miracle loses ground, while faith in law gains ground; and it requires little prophetic insight to foretell on which banner Victory will perch at last. Miracle is passing away into the same limbo which has received witchcraft and kindred delusions; and law is seen more and more clearly to be the true explanation of all seeming anomalies. Law means cosmos, order, reason; miracle means chaos, disorder, unreason. Hence he who believes in a God of Infinite Power and Infinite Wisdom should believe in law, and reject miracle. The deepest reliance and the truest science meet here on common ground, and join hands in friendly grasp over the Development Theory: for it brings the genealogy of all living beings into harmony with the peaceful course of universal Nature, and, instead of invoking the presence of God only at intervals separated by millions of years, it finds him ever present, unfolding the magnificent panorama of existence age by age, day by day, moment by moment.

Is not "development" the one word which describes the history of all that we know? What is Christianity, what is civilization, nay, what are you, and what am I, but the result of a process of gradual development? Everything of value to man in the realms of art, science, commerce, manufactures, jurisprudence, letters, religion, has come by gradual growth from small beginnings to ripened usefulness. Your own experience is a monument to the reality of gradual development as the supreme law of life. Your bodies are the complex and marvellous result of a series of slow, imperceptible changes first commenced in tiny germs: your characters are the result of the slowly increasing action and reaction between the blank capacities of a baby's mind and the educating influences about it; all that you have, all that you are, all that you see, is proof that nothing exists except as the final result of a process of development more or less long. To me, the word development is an epitome of all history, all knowledge, all experience; the unintermitting creation, the everlasting metamorphosis, the constant evolution, which mark alike the worlds of matter and of mind, are proof to me of a vast, all-including, all-beneficent law, which secures the eternal progress of the universe, and which forms the basis of the "Development Theory." For the theory which men of science apply to the production of new species of animals and plants is of universal application,—is, in fact, infinitely more far-reaching and comprehensive than was ever declared by Laplace, Hutton, or Darwin. In fact, even Herbert Spencer, who excels most of his contemporaries in firm grasp of the idea of development, falls perhaps to carry it up consistently into the highest experiences of the soul. But in time to come, this one word development will be the supreme key to all the arcana of science and to all the facts of religion, and will heal at last the long feud between the two.

It is, however, chiefly with reference to the origin and history of Man that the Development Theory has popular interest. Showing that the human race has come to its present state of comparatively high civilization from very mean and obscure beginnings, it at the same time humbles human pride and intensifies human hope. The haughty spirit which traces the origin of mankind back to a Garden of Eden and a primeval ancestor of spotless perfection is mortified and put to the blush, when science proves that the earliest known men were more savages, only one degree higher than apes and monkeys, and that in all likelihood both men and apes are descendants of common ancestors humbler still. On the other hand, if from such beginnings man has come to be what he now is, who shall venture to predict the heights of greatness to which he may yet climb in the long future before him? Modest indeed, and yet full of grand and glorious hopes, must he be who finds in the Development Theory the key to man's past and future history. In proportion as his pride of lineage is abased, will his faith in a magnificent destiny be exalted. For one, I would rather be only half-way up the ladder than find myself at the bottom, having tumbled from the top.

The two views, therefore, as to the origin of man, held respectively by the two rival theories, are in plain language these:—

The Biblical Theory teaches that, about six thousand years ago, God made Adam, the first parent of all mankind, out of the dust of the ground, somewhat as an ingenious boy moulds figures out of putty; with this difference, that God did what the boy cannot do—breathe into the heavy lump the breath of life. This first man was perfect, the highest ideal of human excellence, the lofty standard of beauty and majesty, from which to have degenerated is the great disaster of the human race. Yet it must be confessed that, even according to the Bible itself, this model man did not know the difference between good and evil, but had to learn it by eating forbidden apples; and, unless it is better to be stupid than wise, Adam was a nobler being after eating the apples than he was before. The Bible itself represents Adam as not knowing right from wrong, until after he had eaten the apples; he could not, therefore, have known he was doing wrong by disobeying God's command to leave the apples untouched. By a curious inconsistency, however, the Bible makes God curse and punish Adam for tasting the fruit, when poor Adam did not know any better; and thus it makes all human misery and sin come from the unjust curse pronounced by God upon a perfectly innocent act. Is not this clear? Until Adam had learned to know good from evil, he of course could not know it was wrong to disobey God; it was, therefore, no sin in him to eat the apples, and it was unjust in God to punish him for eating them. The Biblical Theory, therefore, apart from all scientific objections, has in itself two self-evident inconsistencies; instead of really representing Adam as a perfect type of manhood, it represents him as a big baby, not knowing right from wrong; and instead of representing God as a just and holy Being, it represents him as a harsh, unreasonable, and unjust judge. Nothing can be more plain than that the author of the first chapters of Genesis had a noble idea neither of man nor of God.

The Development Theory, on the other hand, teaches that the human race has lived on the earth hundreds of thousands of years, and brings proof of this vast antiquity of man which prejudice alone can controvert. It teaches that man is the final result of slow and insensible changes in the structure of lower forms of life, continued through uncounted ages in the past and doubtless to be continued through uncounted ages in the future. It teaches that the Divine creative activity must be looked for in the whole series of changes, from beginning to end, and not in any sudden interference with an otherwise changeless order of Nature. In the universe, all is fluent and alive with the life of God; nothing is fixed or immobile, but absolute intelligence is moulding all things to make them expressive of that which human intelligence can only in the feeblest manner apprehend. There are no rules out of which Nature must be lifted by a brawny Hercules,—no railroad tracks which can only be deviated from by dire catastrophes or cataclysms,—no tame canals which conduct the streams of Infinite Life through the same dull route forever. No,—the universe with all it holds is alive with God in every atom, and obeys the supreme law of development according to all-pervasive Thought. Hence the whole experience of the human race is a perpetual birth from lower to higher conditions, and all its woes are but parturient pangs of a nobler future. When the frequent reproach is uttered against the Development Theory that it degrades man by regarding him as manufactured out of a monkey, it is a fit reply to say the Biblical Theory degrades him still lower by regarding him as manufactured out of dirt. If the monkey is a mean ancestor, dirt is an ancestor meaner still.

But a reply to this reproach might be taken out of the Bible itself. When Elijah fled into the wilderness and sat down under the juniper tree, he is said, in the sadness of his heart, to have exclaimed,—"It is enough; now, oh Lord, take away my life; for I am not better than my fathers." The noble old prophet felt it a sacred duty to improve upon the example handed down to him from his ancestors,—felt it to be a disgrace not to be better than his fathers. But our friends who urge the Biblical Theory upon our faith are anxious to make it out that Adam was better than they, and thus to prove by chapter and verse the fact of their own degeneracy. If I believed this, I should be tempted, like honest old Elijah, to say as little about it as possible, but rather to sink away into the wilderness and pray to die. If six thousand years of probation only bring the human race to deeper degradation, the universe has hardly proved to be "a success." The Development Theory, far from taking pleasure in the thought of man's fall from nobleness and greatness, thinks, with the brave old prophet, it would be a disgrace in him not to be "better than his fathers;" and in so thinking, I hold that it honors both God and human nature. I would rather be ashamed of my ancestors, than have my ancestors ashamed of me. Better than either, let me both honor them and win my own self-respect by improving on their quality. It is, after all, man's spiritual nature which gives him dignity, not his prejudice; and this spiritual nature belongs to him now, whether he is descended from an angel, a baboon or a mud-puddle. Science aims neither to degrade man, nor yet to exalt him, neither to humiliate him, nor to tickle his sense of vanity; she aims simply and solely to discover the facts of his origin, and I have yet to learn that the truth can degrade us. It matters little to a man of sense whether his great-great-grandfather was an archangel or a chimpanzee; the important question is—"How much of a man am I to-day?" If conscience can render a brave answer to this question, we may throw our genealogies and family-trees into the waste-basket. Hence the issue between the two rival theories of man's pedigree must be settled on broader grounds than that of fancied degradation or exaltation. Science is seeking the solution of a purely historical question, and we can afford to abide the result with unruffled equanimity.

Without entering on any technical argument, I have sought to give you a bird's eye view of the Development Theory in a larger application than is commonly made of it, and to single out the chief points of difference between it and its antagonist theory. It has strong arguments to urge, and strong objections to answer; but every fresh discovery strengthens the arguments and weakens the objections. I wish now a little more definitely to show its bearings, first, with regard to the faith of the churches, afterwards with regard to a better faith.

Evangelical Christianity, as we all know, professes to be a divinely devised "scheme of redemption," for the purpose of rescuing a ruined race from the effects of the "Fall of Man" in the Garden of Eden. There would be no need of any "redemption," unless the human race were now under the wrath of God; they would not now be under the wrath of God, unless they had inherited the curse laid on their first parents; these first parents would not have incurred this curse, unless they had eaten the prohibited apples in the Garden of Eden, and thus entailed on all their descendants a lost and depraved nature. Thus through the sin of Adam came the inherited depravity of the human race, while through the death of Christ comes the only possible redemption. These two doctrines, the "Fall of Man" and "Salvation by Christ alone," are the great essential elements by Evangelical Christianity, the two great pillars of its temple. Had it not been for the "Fall of Man," there would have been no need of "Salvation by Christ;" and nothing can be more plain than that the entire fabric of Evangelical Christianity rests on the first chapter of Genesis. Disprove that, and Evangelical Christianity is undermined; its ultimate fall will then be purely a question of time. No wonder, therefore, that Hugh Miller strove so hard to prop the crumbling cosmogony of Genesis; and no wonder that his fellow-believers strive so hard to prop Hugh Miller. They perfectly well comprehend that the fate of Evangelical Christianity hinges on that of the first chapter of the first book of the Bible. With the energy of desperation, they defend the truth of its story against the accumulating demonstrations of science; but, despite all their ingenious interpretations, theirs is a "lost cause," and like that other "lost cause," is buried beyond hearing of any resurrection-trump. "Geologists," says Prof. Lesley, "read Hugh Miller's book with as much delight as do other people." It was the last struggle of orthodoxy against natural science embodied in geology. Orthodoxy may well be proud of its advocate, and apotheosize his memory; but no cause could be won so.

Fatal, however, as is the Development Theory to the faith of the churches, it is supremely friendly to the instinctive faith of outlying humanity. If the age we live in has any faith at all, it is faith in HUMAN PROGRESS; and what is faith in human progress but the Development Theory under another name? Apply to society the same law which the Development Theory, as commonly defended, applies merely to the origin of species, and you have the only possible explanation of modern civilization. Out of the unsightly roots of barbarism has grown the magnificent tree of human culture, by a process of slow development according to natural law. The spiritual immaturity of the Stone, the Iron, and the Bronze Ages, and the long ages of unrecorded savagery which must have gone before them, was the damp and cold foundation of the great Cathedral of Humanity, whose lofty pinnacles shall yet pierce millennial skies. The most extravagant hopes for the future of our race under the mark, if we are content to read the clock by centuries, in place of seconds. In our burning ardor for reform, we forget the sublime patience of God, with whom "a thousand years are as one day;" we would fain compress the history of aeons into the growth of an hour. The lover of his kind must learn from the Development Theory to measure the stages of human progress by geologic epochs,—must learn to reckon but a single one of God's moments in the stately march of the equinoxes around the circle of the zodiac. If indeed out of simian forms has come at last the noble figure of man, then out of his form modified by the imperceptible changes of long millenniums, may come a figure too noble for imagination to conceive. Races as much superior to man as man is superior to the anthropoid apes may in due time exhibit the grand unfolding of the Eternal Thought, and carry up to unknown heights the spiritual dignity of the animate universe.

In the Development Theory lie dim hints and vague suggestions, which, although invisible to-day to the eye of science, may yet be brought within the field of vision. I am not of those who rashly dogmatize about a life to come; but this I see, that, if we are permitted to extend to a higher plane of being the analogies of this, the Development Theory gives the groundwork of the only hope I cherish of immortal life. From low to higher, from imperfection to perfection, must be the life I covet, whether here or hereafter; and I wish not to live beyond the grave, unless there shall be room for endless progress in that future world,—room for development coeval with the soul itself. In that thought there is life, hope, inspiration; and in that thought I am encouraged by the spirit at least of the Development Theory. Here I see no perfect character; here I am oppressed with a sense of disproportion and asymmetry between the real and the ideal, against which something within me protests with all the energy of my being. Shall there never be a perfect soul, a noble character rounded out into lines of faultless beauty? Nay, shall my own soul never hew out of the rough marble of life's temptations a character of ideal loveliness, on which it shall gaze and say—"That beauty is my own?" Let us frankly confess it to our own hearts,—we are disappointed and dissatisfied with the best that we have done, or can ever do, in this life on earth. In the Development Theory, I find secret suggestions of ample room and ample time for finishing hereafter the task of spiritual sculpture which here we can but just begin. Eternal Progress, eternal Development,—can aught else be Eternal Life? In the great thought of unending advance from high to higher, I find the secret, consuming thirst for righteousness and peace slaked and quenched, as it were by the very water brooks of God. That, friends, is why I preach the gospel of Development.

MR. DARWIN AND FREE RELIGION.

[From the Chicago Tribune, Chicago, of January 5, 1873.]

Mr. Darwin, the great Natural Selectionist, has at last selected a creed, and, as a matter of purely local pride, it may be said that he has selected a Western creed; narrowing it down, an Ohio creed; the creed of Mr. Abbot, of Toledo, who claims to have brought the truest science and the truest religion into harmony. The correspondence which has passed between the two gentlemen settles the fact that Mr. Abbot, of Toledo, believes Mr. Darwin's Natural Selection theories to be true science, and that Mr. Darwin believes Mr. Abbot's creed to be true religion. With Mr. Darwin's theories the world is tolerably familiar; but it can hardly be assumed that many people are yet acquainted with Mr. Abbot's creed, which would occupy two solid columns of nonpareil type in the Tribune. As Mr. Abbot is confident that Mr. Darwin's scientific theories represent the probable opinions of scientific men in the future, and that his own creed is the one which is destined finally to supersede all other creeds, it will be interesting to the reader to know what that creed is, not so much for what Mr. Abbot thinks, as for what Mr. Darwin believes. Mr. Abbot's creed is like the two grains of wheat which were hidden in the bushel of chaff. In the multiplicity of words and of self-evident truths, it is not easy to find exactly what Mr. Abbot and his new disciple do believe; but, as near as we can arrive at the facts, they believe in Free Religion,—not a religion without money or without price,—but a Free Religion as opposed to Christianity; the one being declared to have its root in universal human nature, and the other in the universal God; the one having a devout reverence for God, the other having a devout reverence for nothing in particular. Mr. Abbot's Free Religion is a protest against any authority except that of morality, which is no authority at all, as authority must emanate from an authority higher than ourselves, and from a law, which Free Religion scorns, except as it emanates from our inward consciousness, the poorest of all law-makers. It implies emancipation from outward law, and voluntary obedience to inward law. Its faith rests only in man as a progressive being, and it draws its assurances of that progress from science, not from revelation. Its ideal end is the perfection or complete development of man, the individual serving the race and the race the individual; but the perfection is of the earth, earthy, and does not, except in a very blind way, contemplate any perfection beyond the limits of worldly existence, or any progress after death, the analogies for which, even setting aside revelation, which Mr. Abbot will not admit, abound in that very Nature whom he so ardently follows, and with whom Mr. Darwin is so intimate. The law of Free Religion is the still small voice of the private soul, as opposed to the universal testimony of history that it is only the blind leading the blind, over again. The effects of Free Religion are to make liberty supreme in all forms of government, science supreme in all forms of belief, morality supreme in all forms of conduct, benevolence supreme in all forms of social relations. It brings the Church, which embodies Christianity, to the level of all other institutions, the Bible to the level of all other books, Christ to the level of all other men, and elevates the individual, by means of his individual consciousness, above them all, to progress to his theoretical perfection.

In the sense in which religion is generally understood, Mr. Abbot's Free Religion is no religion at all, but rather a theory or set of theories, based on a combination of morality and science; or, more strictly speaking, morality governed by science. It is not without a certain degree of fascination, and, if realized within the lifetime of any one of us, would be recognized as Utopian to a degree which would have satisfied even Sir Thomas More himself. It is not difficult to see why Mr. Darwin has accepted Mr. Abbot's creed, for Mr. Abbot's process of reasoning on religion is virtually the same as that of Mr. Darwin on science. Mr. Darwin emphasizes the unity in science, and Mr. Abbot emphasizes not only the unity in science, but also the unity in mankind and in person, and the unity of the unities themselves. Mr. Abbot's Free Religion has convinced him that the origin of man is one in virtue of a common descent from inferior types of being, which is only Mr. Darwin's theory over again, and that the nature and destiny of the human race are one; but the only result which Mr. Abbot can achieve for man by the application of his unity is a universal brotherhood based on faith in human nature and love for all human beings. He gives us a man whose only guide is reason, and whose only goal is knowledge; whose action shall be governed by his conscience only up to the limit of moral ideas; whose character shall be irradiated with love for man; whose imagination shall never soar beyond the confines of the beautiful things of this earth; and whose passions shall be subservient only to the reason, weakest of all weak masters. Beyond this, nothing. There is no hereafter in Mr. Abbot's religious scheme, any more than there is in Mr. Darwin's scientific scheme; and if, in accepting Free Religion, Mr. Darwin means to have it understood that this is the result of his theory of selection as applied to religion, he will raise a storm about his ears fiercer than anything he has yet experienced.

And now Pittsburgh too has a Radical Club. It is true, they do not call it a club, but a society. It is the "Radical Society." But a rose by any other name smells just as sweet. The president of this new organization is Prof. A. Burt, an able and cultivated man; the secretary is Mr. Thomas W. Heatley, a young lawyer; and the members are a number of the best citizens. So, amid the ancient smoke of Pittsburgh, there will now be a new fire—the enkindling of free thought on all current and stirring themes.—Golden Age.

Smith and Jones were at the menagerie, and the conversation turned upon Darwin's theory. "Look at that monkey," said Smith; "think of its being an undeveloped human." "Human!" said Jones, contemptuously, "it's no more human than I am."

An honest country parson, who, in the time of a great drought was desired to pray for rain, answered: "I'll willingly do it to oblige you, but it is to no purpose while the wind is in this quarter."

RECEIVED.

- MOUNTAINEERING IN THE SIERRA NEVADA. By CLARENCE KING. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1872. pp. 292.
- PASSAGES FROM THE FRENCH AND ITALIAN NOTE-BOOKS OF NATHANIEL HAWTHORNE. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1872. 2 vols., pp. 396, 507.
- YESTERDAY'S WITH AUTHORS. By JAMES T. FIELDS. Boston: JAMES R. OSGOOD & Co. 1872. Ticknor & Fields, and FIELDS, OSGOOD & Co. 1872. pp. 352.
- THREE CENTURIES OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. By CHARLES DUKE YONKE, Regius Professor of Modern History and English Literature in Queen's College, Belfast; Author of "A School History of England," etc. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 549 and 551 Broadway. 1872. pp. 649.
- CHRIST IN MODERN LIFE: Sermons preached in St. James' Chapel, York street, St. James' Square, London. By the Rev. STAFFORD A. BRIDGES, M. A., Honorary Chaplain-in-Ordinary to the Queen. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 549 and 551 Broadway. 1872. pp. 408.
- THE LAST OF THE MOHICANS. A Narrative of 1757. By J. FENIMORE COOPER. Illustrated from Drawings by P. O. C. DAWLEY. New York: D. APPLETON & Co. 1872. pp. 374.
- MABEL LEE. A Novel. By the Author of "Valerie Aylmer," "Morton House," &c. With Illustrations. New York: D. APPLETON & Co. 1872. pp. 162.
- ON HEROES, HERO-WORSHIP, AND THE HEROIC IN HISTORY. By THOMAS CARLYLE. New York: SCRIBNER, WELFORD & Co. 1872. pp. 385.
- MONKS, POPES, AND THEIR POLITICAL INTRIGUES. By JOHN ALBROOK. In One Volume. Baltimore: 1871. pp. 376.
- HALF-HOUR RECREATIONS IN POPULAR SCIENCE. No. 3. The Cranial Affinities of Man and the Ape. By Prof. HEDD. VINEY, Author of "Cellular Pathology," etc. Boston: LEE & STEPHENS.
- THE "SLING AND THE STONE." Vol. V. For the Year 1871. By CHARLES VOXLEY, B. A., of St. Edmund's Hall, Oxford; late Vicar of Heading, London. Published by the Rev. CHARLES VOXLEY, Camden House, Dalwich, S. E., and TRUBNER & Co., 55, PATERNOSTER ROW, E. C. 1872. pp. 300.
- THE ALBION for April, 1872. JAMES SUTTON & Co., 23 Liberty St., New York. $5.00 a year.
- OLD AND NEW for April, 1872. Published Monthly. Boston: ROBERTS BROTHERS, 143 Washington St. $4.00.
- THE RADICAL for April. Boston: OFFICE OF PUBLICATION, 25 Bromfield St. $3.00.
- THE MONTHLY RELIGIOUS MAGAZINE AND MONTHLY REVIEW, for April. Boston: LEONARD C. BOWLER, 36 Bromfield St. $5.00.
- HUNTER'S MEDICAL SPECIALIST AND JOURNAL OF DISEASES OF THE CHEST, for March. Cincinnati: 225 West Fourth St.
- THE MEDICAL RECORD. April 1. New York.
- HANDICRAFT for March. Vol. 1. No. 1. New York: Handicraft Publication Co., 37 Park Row.
- THE INDUSTRIAL for March 1872. Richmond, Ind.: ISAAC KINLEY, Editor and Publisher. $1.50.
- THE LITTLE COMPANION for March, 1872. JOHN E. MILLER, 84 West Randolph St., Chicago. $1.50.
- AN EXAMINATION OF SOME RECENT WRITINGS ABOUT IMMORTALITY. By W. E. B. THOMAS SCOTT, Mt. Pleasant, Maine.
- A CRITICAL CATHOLICISM. CRITICIZED BY A DOCTOR OF DIVINITY, AND DEFENDED BY THOMAS LUMSDEN STUBBS. THOMAS SCOTT, Mt. Pleasant, Maine.
- THE IMPROVEMENT OF CHRISTIANITY. By FRANCIS E. ABBOT, editor of "Index," Toledo, Ohio, U. S. A. With Letters from Miss FRANCES P. CORNWELL, and Professor F. W. NEWMAN, giving their Reasons for not calling themselves Christians. THOMAS SCOTT, Mt. Pleasant, Maine.
- SHALL THE NATION, BY A CHANGE IN ITS CONSTITUTION, PROCLAIM ITSELF CHRISTIAN? A Sermon preached to the First Parish in Brookline, on February 25, 1872, by FREDERICK H. HEDGE, D. D., the Pastor. Published at the Request of the Hearers. Cambridge: Press of JOHN WILSON and SON. 1872.
- THE POSSIBILITY OF SPIRITUAL SCIENCE. A Criticism of Materialism and Exclusive Phenomenalism. By CLAY McCADLEY. Boston: LEONARD C. BOWLER, 36 Bromfield St. 1872.
- RATIONAL REFORMATION. By W. T. CLARK. New York: Office of the Golden Age. 1872.
- REFORMATION AND REVOLUTION: Fifty Aphorisms. By J. J. VAN DORTCHER, D. D., and translated by Rev. E. VANDERBEEK, Chicago. CARPENTER and SHEDDEN, 105 West Randolph St.
- AN ORATION ON THE GODS, delivered by ROBERT G. INGERSOLL, at Fairbury, Ill., Jan. 29, 1872. People, Ills. TRANSCRIPT BOOK and JOB PRINT. 1872.
- UNCIVIL LIBERTY. An Essay to show the Injustice and Impolicy of Ruling Woman without her Consent. By E. H. HERWOOD. Princeton, Mass.: CO-OPERATIVE PUBLISHING CO. 1872.
- THE SCIENCE OF MEDICINE, and the Science of Life and Theory of Disease. By Dr. A. G. LAWTON. La Salle, Ill.: KIRKPATRICK and BOWEN. 1857.
- ANNUAL ADDRESS before the Cleveland Homoeopathic Hospital College, Feb. 14, 1872. By Prof. J. D. BUCH.
- REFORM AND PURITY IN GOVERNMENT—NEUTRAL DUTIES—SALE OF ARMS TO FRANCE. Speech of Hon. CHARLES SOMER in the U. S. Senate, Feb. 28, 1872.
- SALE OF ARMS TO FRENCH AGENTS. Speech of Hon. CARL SCHURER in the U. S. Senate, Feb. 15 and 20, 1872.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending April 6th.—Rosewell 4th: $2; C. B. Lusk, $6.15; J. T. Blakeney, $3; D. C. Moore, $1.25; J. C. McLean, $1; J. N. Lyman, $50 cts.; S. R. Benson, $4; D. K. Jones, $2; Henry B. Fowler, $2; Jno. Gordon, $2; Wm. Tasker, $1; Demarest Davis, $1; J. W. Sullivan, $1; G. B. Purdy, $2; Jno. McDonald, $2; H. Michener, 50 cts.; S. A. Niver, $1; Asa G. Wait, $2.50; Thomas Hartly, $2; Alfred Buckley, $2; A. G. Weld, $2; Dr. Jno. Winslow, $5 cts.; C. W. Newton, $1.50; A. C. Lloyd, 50 cts.; P. H. Clark, 40 cts.; A. Kneass, $1.50; Marion Martin, 50 cts.; N. G. Chatterton, $2.25; J. F. Ford, 70 cts.; E. A. Babbitt, 50 cts.; Mrs. J. Harvey, $3; S. Wilkinson, 50 cts.; A. Raymond, $1; Catharine H. Browning, 10 cts.; D. M. Tredwell, $5; Jas. B. Coole, $2; Zerah Masters, 10 cts.; B. N. Adams, $5; D. Madden, 10 cts.; J. Frank, 50 cts.; A. Messer, $2; Dr. Nicholson, 50 cts.; C. M. Nye, 50 cts.; Geo. F. Wallace, $2.10 cts.; J. Green, 60 cts.; A. Talcott, $10; Geo. Cochran, $1; Mrs. M. J. Wilkinson, 10 cts.; W. Little, Jr., $20; G. F. Winfield, $3.70 cts.; W. E. Lukens, $6.35; E. Hannan, $2; J. T. Blakeney, 50 cts.; E. F. Dickinson, $3.75; Frank S. Billings, $1; Jos. Singer, $1.50; C. C. Shoum, $4.50; Frank S. Billings, $2; M. H. Ellis, $1.25; Dr. Fitzgibbon, $2; Warren Chase, $1.50; Lyman Hodsden, $2.10; N. Sullivan, 50 cts.; R. Woodward, $2; M. W. Willis, $1.50; Hon. J. C. 50 cts.; E. Harlow, $2.10 cts.; D. S. Caldwell, $1.60; E. H. Wicks, $2.50; T. L. Brown, $7; H. L. Green, $14.45; Toledo Printing Co., $10; Dr. A. A. Bell, $3.75; Milan Bentley, $2; Geo. Molnar, $2.75; P. Underwood, $4; Samuel Kense, $2.50; $1.25; F. French, $3; C. W. Newton, $1; A. W. Hawley, $1; E. S. Pier, $1.50; Rev. W. C. Outwater, $2.75; Frank B. Raze, $2; T. K. Peck, $1.15; F. H. Callahan, $2.25; D. Sandman, $1.50; Dr. J. S. Byers, $1.75; H. L. Green, $5.75; Geo. Krider, $2.10; Edw. N. Magraw, $1; J. R. Pollet, $2; Cassie Skean, 50 cts.; John Spooner, $2; W. G. Williamson, $2.50; E. C. McKibben, $1; Alex. McCann, $1; Jas. R. Stone, $10; G. K. Withington, $10; Jas. Aiken, $2; Calvin G. Gay, $1; Frank S. Billings, $10; J. Green, $1.60; John Asarin, $5.00; F. L. Lee, $2; F. L. Schuckling, 10 cts.; John Kieve, 50 cts.; R. Bond and Martin, $2.80; J. H. Hawley, $2.70; Mrs. A. L. Richmond, $1; G. W. Watly, 50 cts.; Elmira V. Howard, $1.50; W. P. Chambers, $10; Susan J. Taber, $4.

Poetry.

[FOR THE INDEX.]
"TO BE OR NOT TO BE."

Infinite God! On Thee I rest,
Like infant on its mother's breast;
Within Thy arms I calmly lie,
Nor ask to live, nor seek to die.

What e'er Thy love ordains for me
Shall by my spirit welcomed be,
Since only good from Thee can flow
To saint above or child below.

Infinite God! Eternal One,
Of all the Life, the Source, the Sun!
Thou all-pervading, wondrous force,
Propelling planets in their course,

While worlds on worlds in systems vast
Through space immeasurable are cast,
Each working out some grand design
Through laws which are but thoughts of Thine!

From Thee, O Great Eternal Good!
The smallest insect draws its food;
In Thee the lowest reptile lives,
And to thy glory tribute gives.

Then, shall not man, of noblest birth,
The crowning glory of this earth,
Within thy arms confiding lie,
Nor seek to live, nor ask to die?

E. C.

COLUMBUS, O., March, 1872.

The Index.

APRIL 13, 1872.

The Editor of THE INDEX does not hold himself responsible for the opinions of correspondents or contributors. His columns are open for the free discussion of all questions included under the general purpose.

No notice will be taken of anonymous communications.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES EACH, $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 31, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Five Hundred Shares, $50,000
THOMAS MUMFORD, New Harmony, Ind.,	One	Share, 100
D. AYRES, JR., Brooklyn, N. Y.,	"	" 100
MRS L. E. BLOUNT, Evansville, Ind.,	"	" 100
—, Defiance, Ohio,	"	" 100
—, Bryan, Ohio,	"	" 100
J. T. BRADY, Sabetha, Kan.,	"	" 100
—, Northampton, Mass.,	"	" 100
MAX PRACHT, Cincinnati, Ohio,	"	" 100
O —, Boston, Mass.,	"	" 100
H. HETTINGER, Toledo, Ohio,	"	" 100
C. POLSON, Zanesfield, Ohio,	"	" 100
B. C. EASTMAN, Palmyra, Mo.,	"	" 100
J. O. MARTIN, Indianapolis, Ind.,	"	" 100
L. T. LYER, Detroit, Mich.,	"	" 100
E. W. MEDDAUGH, Detroit, Mich.,	Two	" 200
A. POLSON, Boston, Mass.,	Two	" 200
W. F. HEIKES, Dayton, Ohio,	"	" 100
HIRSH COLE, Susq'n Bridge, N. Y.,	One	" 100
SAMUEL COLE, Susq'n Bridge, N. Y.,	"	" 100
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass.,	Two	" 200
B. F. WOODARD, Livonia, N. Y.,	One	" 100
H. A. MILLER, Osborn, Ohio,	Two	" 200
J. W. BARTLETT, Mt. Carroll, Ill.,	One	" 100
OSCAR ROOS, Taylor's Falls, Minn.,	"	" 100
MRS E. S. MILLER, Geneva, N. Y.,	"	" 100
JAS. R. STONE, Cincinnati, Ohio,	"	" 100
D. K. LINES, " " " " " " " "	Five	" 500
A. TAPP, " " " " " " " "	One	" 100
S. L. WILDER, " " " " " " " "	"	" 100
PETER H. CLARK, " " " " " " " "	"	" 100
G. K. WITTINGTON, " " " " " " " "	"	" 100
J. T. BUTTON, " " " " " " " "	"	" 100
WALT. F. AUSTIN, Pittsburgh, Pa.,	"	" 100
MRS C. E. NOYES, Cincinnati, Ohio,	Two	" 200
JAS. FISCHER, Steubenville, La.,	One	" 100
O. H. BOLTSMAN, Pittsburgh, Pa.,	"	" 100
L. VON BLEISINGER, N. Y. City,	Five	" 500
W. H. BOUGHTON, " " " " " " " "	One	" 100
W. P. CHAMBERS, " " " " " " " "	"	" 100
TITUS L. BROWN, Binghamton, N. Y.,	"	" 100
		$25,500

A four-page SUPPLEMENT is issued with the present number of THE INDEX, containing various "Notices of the Press" which have been accumulating during the past two years and a quarter; and also containing a two-column advertisement of choice books for sale by Mr. H. S. Stebbins, of Toledo. The attention of book-buyers is specially called to this list; and we advise them to preserve this SUPPLEMENT for future reference.

"Chi non sa niente, non dubita di niente—He who knows nothing doubts nothing," says the Italian proverb. We must know enough to doubt before we can know enough to believe.

ACEPHALOUS REFORM.

Rev. Thomas J. Mumford, who has recently become the editor of the Christian Register (Unitarian) of Boston, has the following kindly paragraph in the issue of that paper for March 30:—

"On account of its warfare upon Unitarianism and Christianity, our relations to THE INDEX are necessarily hostile; but we wish to absolve ourselves from all suspicion of unfriendly feelings towards its bold, able and devoted editor-in-chief. While we regard many of his opinions with hearty dislike, we sincerely admire the courage and frankness of Mr. Abbot himself. He has amply earned the right to be the acknowledged leader of the Free Religious movement, by his toils and sacrifices in its behalf. We are astounded and grieved by his course in holding the religion of Jesus responsible for the monstrosities of Calvinism and the errors of Romanism; we fear that his feelings are sometimes too much excited for his mind to act with entire calmness and fairness, and that he takes a somewhat morbid view of the theological situation; but his sincerity is unquestionable, and his fearlessness and uncalculating devotion to what he considers right are worthy of respect and emulation."

1. Mr. Mumford has been for years a valued personal friend, and in private life no one could be more estimable or lovable than he. In his journalistic writings, also, we doubt not he intends to be always fair; and it is because we believe this that we have passed over in silence many coruscating paragraphs from his pen which are surcharged with unmeant misrepresentation. It is his misfortune to be gifted with rare wit; and while we most sincerely "absolve him from all suspicion of unfriendly feelings," we very much regret that he sometimes seems more eager to "make a point" against the radicals than to "see the point" of radicalism itself. We never complain of hard hits or keen thrusts, provided they are also just. Yet earnest argument, deserving earnest reply, is ill met by squibs; and when, instead of discussing essential thought, the brilliant paragraphist shows up side-issues to his readers in the grotesque reflections of his convex mirror, Truth fails to recognize her own features, and turns disappointed away.

2. Mr. Mumford's generous approval we are glad to receive, for life has no finer pleasure than the esteem of the truly good. But he makes it painful by exaggeration. Considering that the Free Religious movement is essentially a protest against the leadership of persons in favor of the leadership of ideas, to say that any one has "earned the right to be the acknowledged leader of it" is tantamount to saying he has earned the right to stab the cause he pretends to serve. Whenever any man is indeed "acknowledged" as its "leader," the Free Religious movement will have become a spent wave; and the day for a new protest will have dawned. We say this in no mock-modest mood. If ever the conceit of leadership begins to poison with its falsehood our public utterances, we charge our friends, out of regretful remembrance of the better spirit that once animated them, mercifully to forget us, and to remain true to the cause of impersonal principles which we too once faithfully served. Other causes have occasionally had their "lost leaders;" but to the cause of Free Religion let every "leader" be "lost!"

3. Furthermore, we cannot rest under this oblivion of the higher deserts of others. If the question is raised of pre-eminent service, and that is all that our friend intends by his language, let us remind him of Emerson, Bartol, Weiss, Frothingham, Higginson, Johnson, Potter, Wasson, Morse, and the rest. By the side of such men as these we are only a raw recruit. So far as our common cause permits a "leader," Mr. Frothingham stands confessedly at our head as President of the Free Religious Association; but no man could presume less than he on the pre-eminence thus secured to him by his own merit and long fidelity, and by the glad suffrage of his comrades. Every adherent to the cause of Free Religion has something peculiar and precious in his own thought which it would be simple treason to truth to waive or hide out of deference for any "leader;" and it touches the very heart of this cause that we all unite to affirm unflinchingly the Democracy of Thought. Unlike other religious organizations, which emphasize only the uniformities of beliefs among their members, the Free Religious Association emphasizes the differences as well, and demands from all its members respect for the mental rights of each. Freedom and Fellowship in Religion—that is its platform; and no one could step upon it honorably who was scheming in his heart for the crown of "leadership." It may be impossible to realize the dream of a great religious advance without a recognized head; it may be a mere absurdity to try to dispense with Lords and Saviors; but we ask all friends and foes alike, to pay that heed which truth demands to our fundamental principle that Free Religion can have no personal "leader," but, if possible at all, must exist only as a great, free Commonwealth of Mind.

MR. BUTTS' PLAN.

Thanks to the good-will and generosity of our friends, the plan proposed by Mr. Asa K. Butts in THE INDEX, No. 117, has already resulted at present writing (April 8) in the addition of seven hundred names to our subscription list. Most of these, moreover, have been obtained by canvassing, not by vicarious payment; and the probability is therefore great that nearly all of those who thus receive the paper on trial will become permanent subscribers. In consideration of this fact and the great alacrity manifested by our readers in the work of enlarging our circulation, we have concluded to extend the limit originally fixed for the experiment from April 15 to May 1. No further extension will be made. But at the expiration of this period, May 1, we shall publish a complete list of the persons who have sent us names, with the number of names sent by each, unless otherwise directed by the parties concerned. Copies of the small SUPPLEMENT containing directions will be mailed to any one on application. We feel greatly encouraged by this prompt and friendly response, and take it as a proof that the cause represented by THE INDEX is taking deep root in the popular heart. Till the first of May, then, the proposition to send THE INDEX to clubs of five or more NEW subscribers at half price for three or six months will remain in force. If possible, get all trial subscribers to pay their twenty-five or fifty cents for themselves. They will be much more likely to read the paper with interest, and renew their subscriptions at regular rates when the term of trial expires.

THE INDEX IN ENGLAND.

It is pleasant to find that THE INDEX is receiving recognition abroad.

The March number of the London Reformer, the monthly organ of English Secularism edited by the famous George Jacob Holyoake, devotes more than a page to a frank and discriminating criticism of THE INDEX, which we shall republish as soon as may be. We regret it was not received in time for insertion in our SUPPLEMENT this week.

Thomas Scott, Esq., of Ramsgate, London, has kindly sent us, from time to time, packages of the liberal tracts of which he is the well-known publisher; and we have just received from him a copy of his beautiful reprint of "The Impeachment of Christianity," attached to which is the letter of Prof. Newman printed in the Radical for April, 1870, and also the letter of Miss Frances Power Cobbe printed in the first number of THE INDEX, giving their reasons for not calling themselves Christians. (It may be well to state that we are now distributing the second ten thousand of this tract, the orders for which are continually pouring in.)

From the Rev. Charles Voysey we received by the same mail a copy of the fifth volume of his "Sling and Stone." In the preface to which he kindly says:—"I have little to add to this Volume by way of Preface, except to record my thanks to the Editor of THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio, for having already published in that paper nearly all that this Volume contains."

The substantial value of these various recognitions will be readily appreciated, and will stimulate us all to renewed exertions in the support and improvement of a paper which is making itself felt more and more on both sides of the ocean.

One more exception—this time unsolicited. In Col. Higginson's article in THE INDEX, No. 118, p. 101, the types made a blunder which, if uncorrected, may involve our much-suffering friend in a prosecution for blasphemy; and this thought drives out of our head all regard for rules. He did not mean "the Father," but "the Fathers," in his closing paragraph—not God, as the reader might infer, but the prosy old "patriotic" fellows whose stupid theologizings are taken by Catholics and Episcopalians as of authority second only to that of the Scriptures. Hitherto we have been a stout disbeliever in the devil; but it takes the "printer's devil" to account for such a blunder as that.

MORE PETITIONS.

By carelessness for which we are not responsible, the manuscript containing the list of counter petitions for last week was lost; and below, therefore, is given the list for the two weeks ending April 6.

Messrs. Friedrich Schönmann-Pott, L. Diamant, and others, San Francisco, Cal., send five hundred and nineteen names; Mr. O. W. Seymour, Flint, Mich., one hundred and eighty-two; Mr. J. Sedgwick, Painesville, O., twelve; Mr. John Sherman, Circleville, O., twenty-four; Mr. N. F. Hilbert, Winona, Minn., eight; Mr. Julius Waterman, Plymouth, Vt., forty-five; Mr. D. D. Lum, Portland, Me., twenty-three (from Ferry Village); Mr. James Douglass, Milwaukee, Wis., eleven; Mr. H. Edger, Brentwood, Long Island, sixteen; Mr. E. C. Sly, Minneapolis, Minn., twenty-four; Rev. J. L. Hatch, Westboro', Mass., two hundred and forty-eight; Mr. J. D. Batchelder, Nottingham, N. H., thirteen; Mr. S. A. Niver, Groton, N. Y., forty-one; Mrs. S. L. Woodard, Deer Plain, Ill., twelve; Prof. J. E. Oliver, Ithaca, N. Y., forty-five; Mr. C. L. Roberts, Yates City, Ill., thirteen; Mr. D. B. Morton, Groton, N. Y., thirty; Mr. Gilbert Billings, Chicopee, Mass., six; Mr. F. B. Page, West Somerset, N. Y., eleven; Mr. Nathan Shaw, Rootstock, O., one hundred and four; Mrs. Annie L. Magnus, Kendallville, Ind., one hundred and one; Mr. O. L. Pond, Camptonville, Cal., four; Mr. H. O. Bigelow, Salt River, Mich., seventy-two; Mr. T. Brown, Colorado City, Col., nineteen; Mr. James Aiken, Mishawaka, Ind., sixty-four; Dr. J. C. Michener, Adel, Iowa, one hundred and two; Rev. Chas. G. Ames, San José, Cal., thirty; Mr. M. A. Root, Bay City, Mich., forty-five; Mr. W. C. Ives, Peterboro', N. Y., one hundred and sixty-five; Mr. J. D. Zimmermann, Union City, Mich., eighty-four; Mr. Washington Pierce, Minneapolis, Minn., one hundred and four; Mr. David L. Galbreath, Winona, O., ten; Mr. C. W. Newton, Castleton, Ill., twenty-two; Rev. H. J. Hudson, Brush's Mills, N. Y., eighty-four; Mr. E. W. Mescham, Fredonia, N. Y., one hundred and twenty-three.

IN THE INDEX, No. 117, the number of names sent by Mr. G. W. Welty, Dundee, O., should have been reported as one hundred and forty, instead of forty only.

The number of names thus far acknowledged in THE INDEX is over TWENTY-SEVEN THOUSAND AND FIVE HUNDRED.

Commenting on the fact that twenty thousand names had been reported in these columns in protest against the proposed Christian Amendment, the Philadelphia Christian Statesman of April 1 says:—"The editor of THE INDEX seems not to be aware that in the years 1868-9 petitions were poured upon Congress from all parts of the country, in behalf of the proposed amendment. When wisdom it wise to enroll our forces in a petition, we shall be happy to compare forces with the opposition." The same paper quotes articles from the Wellsboro Advertiser, the Christian Synagogue, and the Daily Patriot (San José, California), all favoring the proposed amendment.

We renew our appeal to all earnest liberals to solicit names on this protest. The number of petitions received is somewhat falling off, although constant demands are still making for the printed headings. Promptitude is desirable. We respectfully request those papers which have promised to send their lists to THE INDEX to do so now, including a statement of the total number of names in each case. Of course due credit will be scrupulously given.

We are sorry to see a disposition on the part of some to consider the remonstrance as unnecessary. If the revolutionists succeed in enlisting on their side the Young Men's Christian Associations and other ecclesiastical organizations (and they are trying to do this), they can easily obtain names on their petitions by the hundred thousand. The dictate of simple common sense is to forestall them, and thus bring to bear against them the power of a great public opinion already publicly expressed. Many Orthodox persons will sign the remonstrance to-day. Wait long enough, and they will be dragooned into support of the measure in contemplation. We unhesitatingly stake our reputation for insight into the tendencies of the times on the prediction that within a very few years this Christian Amendment movement will be the great absorbing question of American politics. It is faulty to despise the gathering cloud because it is to-day "no bigger than a man's hand." Years ago, even before we had ever heard of this "National Reform Association," we held the same opinion concerning the general movement it represents. Slavery once abolished, this is the next great issue in the order of development. Do not, friends, fall into the same mistake as in 1861, and be caught unprepared when the time for action comes.

FAIR PLAY FOR THE RAJAH.

A man may be an East Indian, and a prince, and an educated man, and a "heathen,"—and still have a right to stand up in London and testify to a fact. Sectarial papers can hardly be expected to admit this, when the fact happens to go against them. But the Independent is not a sectarial paper, and often sets noble examples of fairness. It is a pity therefore that it should denounce "A. Jayram Row," from Mysore, for using the following words at St. George's Hall in London, one Sunday evening:—

"Among the millions of India the number of educated natives who have become Christians would fall short of the number of one's fingers. The only persons whom the missionaries claim are the Pariahs, not one of whom could possibly state any point of divergence between the abandoned and the embraced faith. No instance has ever been known of a missionary even attempting to convert a learned man or Pundit."

I call it denunciation, when this plain statement is not met by refutation, but by this style of criticism:—

"Such an act was worthy of a specimen of Indian royalty and a Brahmin of the highest caste, conscious of his superiority to all the rest of humanity, proud of his aristocratic rank above his own people, and conceited enough intentionally to affront a Christian assembly."

Then the critic enumerates eight highly educated men who have embraced Christianity in Hindustan. If he had named two more, the statement would be an offset to that of the Rajah, who probably has but ten fingers; but unhappily he does not. He mentions Mohammedans and Parsees, in addition, but not another representative of Brahminism. He therefore concedes, substantially, his adversary's case.

It does not appear that the Rajah made this statement in any insolent way. He was invited to speak, and he stated what he claimed to be facts. It does not appear that he sneered at the Pariahs, as the Independent declares,—saying, "If Mr. A. Jayram, Rajah of Mysore, pleases to sneer at these as Pariahs, he is quite welcome to do so; but let him remember that the souls of these men are just as valuable in the sight of God as those of high caste Hindus, Pundits, or princes." Very probably. But there is no evidence that the East Indian orator in any way showed his need of this admonition. He was speaking to a certain point; the inadequacy of Christian missions to reach the cultivated Oriental mind. If this statement is false, it should be deliberately and carefully refuted. If it is true, we ought to know it. It has long been stated by Protestants that Roman Catholic missions thrive in direct ratio to the ignorance of the converts. If the same is true of Protestant missions, let the American Board govern itself accordingly.

T. W. H.

A CARNIVAL OF SUPERSTITION.

LONDON, March, 4, 1871.

A short time ago, being in Rome, I was shown by De Rossi, the distinguished antiquarian, a plate of lead which had been dug up out of a Gnostic tomb. It was probably placed there in the time of later Imperial Rome. It was covered with figures, the serpent with head rayed like the sun oddly confused with Christian symbols; and the Greek inscription, so far as it could be made out, was an imprecation against the fever as the work of a demon. From looking on that leaden plate to arriving in London was a passage over between forty and fifty generations. What magnificent achievements did I witness on that journey! In a few minutes I plunged through the Alps over, which Hannibal toiled with such difficulty; I sped on wings of steam through splendid cities and teeming fields; greeted my family many hours before reaching home with obedient lightning for my messenger; then I came to London to find that, with all this magnificent progress in physical things, this nation was religiously just where those were who put on the leaden plate in ancient Rome that prayer and imprecation against the fever. The giant of civilization no sooner enters his temple than he becomes again a dwarf. It is atheism to suggest that the fever demon is only bad drainage. The Prince's typhus is still deemed substantially the work of the god Typhon, from whom its name came. The cure is prayer. The nation goes to St. Paul's Cathedral to thank God for having removed it. This is where the Nineteenth Century finds us,—a cultivated people with a religion worthy only of Chimpanzees.

The thanksgivings to Heaven which this people has been offering up extended to the close of yesterday, which was a field-day of Cant and Superstition in the Churches. The De Rossis of the future will perhaps unearth newspapers as they now do old leaden plates, and they will find from them what the national religion of England in 1871 nominally was. One may, on this Monday morning, honestly blush in advance for the results of such an investigation. It will come forth to the light of day that men of culture—men educated at much cost, through years, at Oxford and Cambridge—were ready to get up in fine pulpits, in Royal Chapels, in Old Westminster Abbey itself with the memorials of thinkers, philosophers, poets, all around them, and attempt to flatter Jehovah, to do the handsome thing by him, and to show forth his amity toward the aristocratic régime and princely blood. In Westminster Abbey the Rev. Canon Prothero preached from the text (Matt. xii, 25):—"And Jesus knew their thoughts and said unto them, 'Every kingdom divided against itself is brought to desolation, and every city or house divided against itself shall not stand.'" "It stands simply thus," says the Canon; "here are two kingdoms, the kingdom of God and the kingdom of Satan, opposed in every sense to each other." He then went on to show that the illness of the Prince of Wales and his miraculous recovery represented a clever and telling blow aimed by God at the kingdom of the Devil. That Devil appeared, in the sequel, to be dissimulation toward monarchy. By this event the country has been again united. Incredible as it may seem, nobody in the crowd shouted out any angry rebuke of this blasphemy; nobody left the building. At the Chapel Royal, Whitehall, Dr. Hook, Dean of Chichester, took for his text the fifth commandment:—"Honor thy father and thy mother, &c.," and proceeded to declare that the sovereign was the parent of the nation. "The powers that be are ordained of God," said the Dean. "The authority they possess is not a concession from us. It is a Divine appointment. The notion of a social contract between ruler and ruled is baseless. The duty of obedience to the ruling authorities does not rest on choice. To the rulers appointed over us obedience is due, not because they are good, but because they are in loco parentis, appointed over us by God. The ruler might do wrong, as a parent might; but as the child is not a proper censor of its parent, so the subject is not a proper censor of the sovereign." And so went on a sermon which could not have been worse than any which tickled the ears of Charles I in the same place, before, with the scaffold for a pulpit, the people taught him a different lesson. But I cannot go on with further illustrations of the besotted performances of yesterday. They were nearly all alike. No sane word in any pulpit.

If anything could add to the diabolicalness of the exhibition which English religion has made of itself, it is the shrewd commercial spirit, which has mingled with all this piety. Tradesmen, whose establishments have enjoyed the patronage of the Prince have sent around printed circulars asking congregations to show their thanks to God by patronizing and aiding those establishments. The Truss-manufactory sent a lithographed request for a thank-offering even to South Place Chapel. The Bishop of Rochester improved the occasion to try and get subscriptions for the repair and decoration of St. Paul's Cathedral. In his sermon there yesterday the Bishop said:—"Our prayers for the recovery of the Prince have been answered. Should we not, therefore, make a thank-offering—something to testify to the truth of our feelings, and something to which men might point in after ages? What more appropriate work of this kind can be undertaken than the decoration of the House of God, the central place of worship in this great city, where the great ones of the land have united to offer their thanks for the mercies vouchsafed to us?" This appeal had a strong effect. The collection was large, and we are told to-day that the repairs of St. Paul will at once be pressed to completion. So long as the appeal—it has been going on for years—was made simply in the name of Almighty God, the work stood still; but now that the Deity has been re-anforced by the English throne, he is likely to succeed.

There is one thing that has abundantly appeared in all this. It is idle to think that England will ever be a Republic, or a really self-governing nation, until its church is overthrown. These priests perceive clearly the profound connection between religious superstition and political superstition. The Archbishop of Canterbury is the obverse of the throne; when one falls, the other will, not before. The clergy have eagerly seized on the reaction against the republican agitation to receive the idea of the divine right of kings, and they see very well that the Church gains from that as much as the aristocracy. They have availed themselves of the recovery of the Prince just as the Roman Catholic Church avails itself of a winking Madonna. Here is a miracle sent to overwhelm a sceptical generation, and to show what divinity doth hedge about a king, at one stroke. The divine potency of the Church's prayers, and the divine favoritism to ward royal blood, are both supernaturally proclaimed. Republicanism at once sinks below par. For it is on such occasions that one sees the worst side of human nature, that where appears those gregarious habits which ally men with flocks and herds of animals. A great old humorist—I will call him Smelfungus—illustrated the easy relapse of the people to a herd, by telling me a story of a scene he remembers having witnessed in his native Scotland. "A shepherd was taking his drove of sheep to town. They all came to a fork of the road. The leading sheep raised its eyes, looked down the wrong road, thought it had caught sight of something very important that way, something visible to its own wisdom, hid from the common herd, and off it started that new way. The whole flock started to follow. The shepherd took his stand and tried to drive them back, vainly; on they must go where the first had gone. The shepherd made a bar of his staff; but they jumped over it, spattering the poor fellow with mud from head to foot, until he was glad to rush one side. But now a phenomenon. After the shepherd had withdrawn, and the sheep came to the point where the staff had been held to bar the way, each one still leaped into the air at that place just as if the stick were there still. And so they continued, clearing the imaginary obstacle, and rushing in fulfillment of their great ovine genius and purpose along the road that led Nowhither!"

"And," added the old man, after his loud laugh and after that deep sigh which generally follows his heartiest laugh, "and, when you come to think of it, there was but the light of one sheep's head in the whole of that 'popular movement!'"

M. D. C.

DOGMATISM.

Douglas Jerrold said, "dogmatism is puppyism gone to seed." He might have said, dogmatism is puppyism come to glory; for what goes to seed in the judgment of rational men, in the judgment of irrational men blooms immortal. A dogma is a doctrine exalted to power; a dogmatist is not one who holds a doctrine however firmly or stubbornly, but one who imposes a doctrine on the mind as a law. It is guilt to disobey. The Christian Register calls the INDEX an intensely dogmatical sheet. If it were, its editor, who is alone responsible for its spirit, would crucify the very soul of his free religion, once a week, and every week afresh.

Is the INDEX dogmatic? Definite it is, decided, firm, unyielding, a bit oracular possibly, at all events positive,—but does it try to impose its convictions on others, or make it a crime in others not to entertain them? Does it appeal to any authority but that of reason, or to any standard but that of truth? Does it find fault with the free exercise of reason on the part of those from whom it most widely differs? man of positive ideas must needs be positive in asserting them. To make them clear he must define them sharply—and if he defines them sharply, he builds a wall between them and other uncongenial opinions. If his dividing line is an arbitrary one, and if he, knowing it to be such, stations along it a police force of prejudice, superstition, tradition, crude public opinion, to warn off the claimants of their just rights—he does what Romanism does, what Protestant "orthodoxy" does, what the dogmatist of every school does; but if he stakes out his ground after the most accurate survey he can make, and invites his neighbors to employ a competent surveyor to stake out theirs, his precision of terms, in other words, of boundaries or limits, is a credit to him, not a reproach; his obstinacy is all in the service of equity.

An ancient statute provided that the penalty of death should be inflicted on him who proposed an alteration in it, whether the alteration commended itself to reason or not. Christendom makes such a statute of its dogma by branding as a sinner and handing over to a mightier than human avenger the man who tries to amend it. But the old code, in spite of the penalty, perhaps on account of the penalty, by people who resented the injustice of the penalty and hated the code for its menace, was altered, modified and gradually repealed, with very small loss of life on the part of the reformers. So the dogma of Christendom will be altered and perhaps reformed, or abolished altogether, by men whom its assumption renders impatient and tempts to be angry. If Christianity is fiercely and recklessly attacked, it has only its own ministers to blame. Arrogance begets arrogance, unreasonableness excites the spirit of unreason. Wherever one sets himself up as lord, another plots insurrection. A domineering faith alienates its own right-minded friends, who rebel, when imposed on their will, the doctrine they might accept, if addressed to their intelligence.

Let dogmatism give place to reason, and a new order of controversy will come in. The war spirit will cease; wiles, stratagems, ambushes, false reports, lying representations, cunning concealment of one's own weakness, polite undervaluing of the enemy's strength, will be at an end, and truth, not triumph, will be the object sought.

A friend suggests that closer definitions would increase unity; that we differ because we do not understand one another; we use words without weighing their meaning, use the same word in two or three different senses, and, not agreeing on a sense, disagree among ourselves. But this is the chief reason why people agree, not why they differ. It is precisely because they repeat the same language that they fancy themselves to be cherishing the same beliefs. A few vague expressions like "Savior," "Redeemer," "Christ," "Lord," are cloaks that cover more sins than charity. The deadliest foes are detected snuggling together under these theological sheets. The apparent unity of Christendom is an illusion encouraged by the intellectual twilight we choose to live in; a few honest definitions would dispel it in a moment, and show us detached groups of sects, quite heterogeneous and distinct where we thought there was a church. Sentiment loves to confine, to cover up differences and bring out points of sympathy,—a good work when true, not false, sentiment does it; an excellent work when done in the interest of knowledge, and not in the interest of policy. Intellect loves to define, to bring out differences, to untwist cords,—a good work, too, when done in the interest of truth, and not in the interest of polemic. "Betwixt us be truth," should be the motto of all combatants. Intelligence, conviction, earnestness, enthusiasm, all can write it, and all can honor it; dogmatism alone cannot. The first condition of mutual understanding is mutual willingness to understand; but this mutual willingness implies a concession of equality before the tribunal of reason; unless this equality be admitted, unless all opinions be allowed, nay invited, to stand and plead their own merits, it is absurd to talk about fairness, candor, or justice; the candor of the weaker or less popular party will be rebuked as dogmatism, the insolence of the stronger or more popular party will pass for conviction. We would recommend a re-perusal of the fable of the wolf and the lamb.

O. B. F.

Another victim of the slain hydra of Slavery is Capt. John O. Wallingford, of Dover, N. H., who died in that city, March 23, of a disease undoubtedly contracted in the Port Hudson campaign. After serving his first term, he re-enlisted; and the day before he left home for his perilous service at the front, in September, 1864, we married the brave young soldier to one who now mourns his early death. A sad, yet heroic day! We shall never forget it. Only a few weeks ago, we sat by his bedside, and marked with admiration the quiet fortitude with which he faced death in the chamber as he had faced it on the field. But we thought he would recover. There shone out of his eyes such a grand and pure vitality that we could not think the end so near. But it was the vitality of soul and mind, rather than of body, which lit up his face when we said that his illness was a continuation of his long sacrifice in the camp. His warfare is over, his sacrifice complete, his victory won. Honor to the noble dead!

What a sociable paper THE INDEX is getting to be! When I sit down quietly on Sunday morning to read it, I feel as if I were having a chat with wide awake people all over the West and even in India and England. It is almost as good as a meeting of the Radical Club. The recent comparison between Mr. Beecher's and Mr. Büchner's views of Immortality was very amusing. It reminded me of an old story. A sanctimonious parson said to a wild youth, "God will send you to Hell." "Well," replied the youth, "if God sends me to Hell, he'll fix it somehow so I can stand it." Was not that faith?

I ought to make honorable apology to Mr. Collyer for my criticism of the commendation bestowed by THE INDEX on his conduct at the Chicago fire, by stating that, though he unfortunately lost his manuscripts, and his children saved some play-things, it was by no means through any purpose of his, and he heartily endorsed my objection to the praise bestowed on such an act. There is one comfort in the loss of his manuscripts. Good as they undoubtedly were, he yet lives to give us still better.

E. D. C.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

MABEL LEE (D. Appleton & Co.) belongs to "Appleton's Library of American Fiction." It is by the author of "Valerie Aylmer," "Morton House," etc.—Price $1.00.

THE LAST OF THE MOHICANS (D. Appleton & Co.), by J. Fenimore Cooper, is one of the best of those romances of Indian life which, despite the protest of common sense, poetize savagery and make civilization look flat and mean by its side. But one must read it when very young to feel the charm in full. Too much of Sir John Lubbock takes all the illusion out of it. When a year or two ago we saw Red Cloud and his dirty warriors and squaws gulping beefsteak at a railroad eating-house, there was little to remind one of Uncas or Magua, Chingachgook or Tamenund. But Cooper's skill in throwing the idealizing light of imagination over the aborigines and their melancholy fortunes cannot be called in question.—Price 75 cents.

A POSITIVIST PRIMER (David Wesley & Co., New York), by C. G. David, is a little work which has commanded our sincere respect in the perusal. It consists of fourteen conversations on Comte's "Religion of Humanity," with an Appendix. If we had space and time at command, we should gladly make an elaborate review of it. But small as it is, it is too large to be reviewed here. There is a world of thought in these few pages, not altogether unmixed with a certain superciliousness which seems in some degree to characterize all Comtists, as it notably characterized Comte himself. It is a dangerous thing to be a "disciple." We never yet saw one big enough not to be hurt by that relationship; and Mr. David is no exception. But while we find our own ideas clashing on every page with those advanced, the sparks elicited are luminous with instruction. It is the fashion to ridicule Positivism on its "religious" side; even John Stuart Mill could not utterly abstain. But singular as it is, it is a most profitable subject for study. Comtism is thoroughly and irreconcilably at odds with fundamental American ideas; but there are aspects of it from which Americans can learn something. This little book is a useful companion to Comte's translation of Comte's "Catechism of Positivism," for it touches especially on some peculiarly American problems from a Comtist point of view.

The present Positivist "pontiff" or "head of our church" is M. Pierre Laditte, a poor man in Paris who lives by his labor. Other influential Positivists are Dr. Robinet, Comte's biographer, who will take no fee from the poor and only sixty cents a visit from the rich (enough, one would say, to ensure him a large practice), and Dr. Richard Congreve, Prof. Bealy, Dr. J. H. Bridges, Mr. Frederic Harrison, all of England. Mr. David estimates the number of thorough-going Comtists in all the world as possibly two hundred, though "hundreds of thousands" accept the philosophy while rejecting the religion (p. 111).

In our opinion, there is nothing absurd in the admission that Comtism is a religion, although the ideas of a personal God and a personal immortality are rigorously excluded. To be sure, we consider it exceedingly narrow in consequence of this rigorous exclusion; but it is genuinely religious within its own limits. The essential element, self-dedication to an ideal, is present in it; and there can be no question that its influence is singularly humane and humanizing. As usually happens, its narrowness and inadequacy crop out in its negations. Negations are the only things it is safe positively to negate. But we must refer all our readers who are interested in Positivism to this little work, as well worthy of their attention.—Price $1.00.

All the preceding for sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

Advance sheets of a new book by Mr. Giles B. Stebbins, of Detroit, have been kindly sent for examination, but we must defer all notice till we have the entire work before us. It is to be entitled "Chapters from the Bible of the Ages," and will aim to give for popular use some of the most inspiring words of ancient and modern prophets.

Communications.

RECTIFIED.

Boston, March 31, 1872.

MY DEAR ABBOT:—

Let me own the magnanimous notice, in THE INDEX, of "Radical Problems;" and also the justice of the particular criticism you make. It refreshes me to be, once at least, fairly hit. You are right; and I was wrong. I should have said, and will in the next issue of my book say, scissors instead of "sceptica." My meaning shifts not; but my language was untrue. What I would say is, that the denying spirit,—Goethe's Mephistopheles, he that scouts and flouts the Ideal, the unseen Truth, Beauty and Goodness, call it God or what you will,—cannot be a true and perfect man.

In all love your

C. A. BARTOL.

P. S. Please correct errors of any sort in my hastily sent lecture (the mail would not wait). Where I say, "God is no tautologist," add this: "When God made a woman, he did not intend to make a man over again"—and oblige your

C. A. B.

[If the above addition had been received in time, it would certainly have been inserted. But the lecture was already printed. We thank Dr. Bartol for his handsome acceptance of the one criticism we felt obliged to make on a book of rarest "sweetness and light;" and we rejoice to be assured that the apparent exception was verbal only.—Ed.]

DEMOCRACY ON TRIAL.

Like Mr. Wasson, I too have my friend who believes in Democracy, in a genuine Democracy as yet afar off, and in the promise only of its fulness and strength.

My friend, through all the oligarchical period of our country, when a handful of Southerners ruled and the nation was under their lash, was naturally on the defensive, and in the interest of the all against the few.

Believing so entirely in the right of every man to a foot-hold and a free-hold on this planet, he could not be silent in the presence of slaves. He must preach his true Democracy into unwilling ears, must "criticize Congress and parties," until that justice should be done which brings down the heavens to earth.

History shakes the head at such impatient generalizers as Mr. Wasson. American politics are at school, as yet in but the middle of the alphabet. With all the rapid strides the nation has made in ten years to a better understanding of the word, true Democracy is not yet.

The law Salique obtains. Does Mr. Wasson believe that the majority of American women "are morally incapable of choosing a true welfare"—that they distinctly would "prefer debased conditions" in politics?

"Undeveloped in mind" they may be as yet; "inhumanly ignorant," perhaps; but surely the impulses of womanhood may be trusted, we will not call them "divine," but the human, the feminine. Not exceptional womanhood that stands out here and there, phosphorescent and horrible, but average womanhood, as given to the world for better, for worse.

Perhaps that is the trouble, after all, with the American effort after Democracy. Tried in the fire of searching thought it comes out of the crucible sorry stuff, indeed, but with gleams of the pure gold here and there, to show what the result will be when the true elements of the process are found.

Is it objected that women have already taken notable part in political agitations to the confusion of order and peace? Were the Dames de la Halle, the French women who cried "bread! blood!" to be trusted in the dark days of 1789? What sedative did they bring to the seething cauldron of the State?

If all the women of France,—not alone the Erlands and De Stuels, but the tender gentlewomen and the motherly peasant-women as well,—had been granted a hearing, would not the mercy of the one band have tempered the frenzy of the other? Would not the fine ladies have given a lesson, and taken one too, from the fierce cry of outraged womanhood?

And in our own decade, if the frantic hands of Southern women fanned the fires of strife, did not the steady, moral purpose of the women of the North bear down upon them until the day was won?

There is no safety in half measures. It is the short chopping waves that are so troublesome, so disastrous to delicate stomachs, in the narrow channel aristocracy delights in.

Out in the broad ocean the full swell of the wave is not uncomfortable to the hardy sailors who handle the vessel. Educated Americans are too content to be passengers merely, and sit walling and groaning over every lurch of the ship. If they would but understand that sailing is their business too—that their place is at this rope or that wheel, or to keep the cabin windows bright and the decks clean! There is even room for "paint," I believe, to make the wood last longer and keep it sound.

Captains they cannot all be; but they may all be willing seamen, qualifying for the emergencies of storms.

My friend is right to keep his faith in Democracy,—not the false-faced creature of America's past, but the growing and glowing promise of the future. The sculptor gives many a sharp blow with his chisel before the perfect statue stands revealed. So my friend will not spare a single touch or cut incise, but he will keep the fair ideal ever in his sight.

SERENA.

THE REAL TYRANT.

CLEVELAND, March 20, 1872.

FRANCIS E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Really, I was quite surprised at your remarks in reply to the criticism of the Toledo Blade in your issue of the 18th instant. I certainly have not the ability to appreciate the respect you profess for the "personal character" of those most actively engaged in a "most outrageous attempt to destroy the political and religious liberties of all non-Christians," and a "most infamous endeavor on the part of the Christian Church to usurp the whole power of the government." It seems to me, Sir, far from easy, however desirable, to separate those people from their manifest characters, as thus displayed. What sort of "best motives" can men have, whose "natural conscience" is so perverted that they no longer have any "perception of justice or equal rights," and are seeking to "make themselves tyrants and oppressors" of all who dare to entertain any but their own thoughts? Collectively, too, a dangerous party, they are "endangering the peace of society." Why, dear friend, they are the very cream of society; indeed they constitute in a large degree what is called the best society, the lights of the world, and the very salt of the earth. I further think that you have been somewhat "taken in" by outward appearances, such as their fine clothing, sleek looks, respectable mannerisms, and Pharisaical cant.

Again, if their "natural conscience" is so badly perverted, what can remain to them that is entitled to be called conscience or deserving of respect? What, I would ask, do you find in or about those men that so challenges your respect as to induce the application of such courteous and respectful terms as you employ in your address?

Surely, Sir, if those men retain the regard of their fellows, and can gain even the respect of their foes in this matter of their infamous deeds, performed and contemplated, they will feel themselves shielded from all risk of harm and even encouraged to the accomplishment of their earnest but devilish purpose. Honestly, friend, is incompatible with such characteristics as you point out, and can hardly be a constituent element of their character. Whilst I would strenuously shield them from all personal injury to the extent of my ability and influence, I would at the same time literally overwhelm them with the contempt their conduct justly inspires.

Pardon the liberty taken, and accept my sincere regard.

S. N. WILSON.

[There is no need for any apology. What we publish we expect to be criticised; and we never wince at honest criticism, especially when offered in the good spirit of our correspondent. The point he has raised is a fair one, and deserves to be considered.

Mr. Buckle, in his "History of Civilization in England," Vol. I, pp. 132-136, makes a powerful plea in defence of the excellent private character of the Spanish Inquisitors and other religious persecutors. We regard it as a just one. We agree with Buckle, Townsend, Prescott, Llorente, and others, that persecution does not prove personal wickedness in the persecutor.

But the indignation not justly to be directed against conscientious persecutors, and would-be tyrants in the name of Christianity, we would direct with ten-fold energy against the system of beliefs which thus proves itself the enemy of mankind. Let it blaze with hotter flames against the ideas that make the moral sentiment itself an instigator to injustice and cruelty. Study and observation have alike taught us that, while Christians are very often most excellent people, and while certain parts of Christianity are worthy of all veneration, the general influence of Christianity as a system represses progress, discourages science, and above all tramples on freedom. Not without regret, therefore, we accept the work of active anti-Christianism, together with the odium and hatred this work necessarily involves. But we mean to do this unpalatable work without violating the principles which impose it; and especially we mean to guard ourselves against the temptation to hold individuals responsible for outrages which are justly chargeable only to the great superstition that enslaves them. That is the real tyrant. Against that, then, we have drawn the sword, and flung away the scabbard.—Ed.]

JUDAISM AND IMMORTALITY.

FRIEND ABBOT:—

Was Judaism a "religion devoid of all faith in immortality?" Was there no reference to a future state beyond, or after, the grave? Neither embodied nor purely spiritual? Noyes' translation of the Prophets reads:—

"And ye shall know that I am the Lord when I have opened your graves, O my people, and shall bring you up out of your graves, and shall put my spirit into you, and ye shall live." (Isaiah 56:1.)

"I will ransom them from the power of the grave. I will redeem them from death: O death, I will be thy plagues; O grave, I will be thy destruction." (Isaiah 38:10.)

"He will swallow up death in victory: and the Lord God shall wipe away tears from off all faces." "And it shall be said in that day, Lo! This is our God. We have waited for him, &c." (Isaiah 25:8.)

"And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake: Some to everlasting life, and some to everlasting shame and contempt: And they that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars, forever and ever." (Daniel 12:3.) Noyes says this translation is "absolutely correct."

Dr. Noyes' translation of the Psalms reads:—

"Thou wilt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me in glory." (David.)

In the second book of Samuel is recorded a narrative of the sickness and death of a child. David "fasts and weeps," to propitiate Divine favor, during the time of sickness. After death, the king re-assumes his wonted cheer and eats and wishes, saying (the sons being one of immortal hope):—"Can I bring him back? I shall go to him, but he shall not return to me."

Again, Elijah having gone "up into heaven," it is proposed to search for him, lest the body may really have been cast "upon some mountain, or into some valley." Elisha says—search not. But searching "three days," and "finding him not," Elisha again says:—"Did I not say—Go not?" And this account of the translation into heaven was certainly familiar to the readers of the Hebrew Scriptures.

How is this? These writings certainly indicate some sort of an idea of immortality.

Respectfully and inquiringly,

WM. C. OLIVER.

Boston, March, 1872.

"A SUDDEN JUDGMENT."

Under the above caption, a paragraph has been going the rounds of the papers, and was recently sent me by an over-zealous Orthodox friend, clipped from a Canada Journal. The paragraph is as follows:—

"An awful thing has happened in Harrisburg. A man was accused by his wife of infidelity to his marriage vows, when he replied that he 'hoped God would paralyze his tongue if he was guilty.' He had scarcely finished the sentence when his tongue refused to perform its natural functions."—Courier-Journal.

The following foot-note was appended to the clipping which my friend sent me—"Struck dumb by natural causes!"

It would seem, from musty volumes of religious anecdotes which used to furnish the Sunday mental pabulum of our fathers and mothers, that such miraculous visitations used to be much more common once than they are now. Certainly "natural causes" were less understood then than now, and public sentiment both demanded and religiously believed such tales as the above. Nor was there any difficulty, when there was a demand, in furnishing a supply.

The friend who kindly sent me the paragraph in question desires to know whether the person (admitting the fact) could have been struck dumb by "natural causes." I say emphatically yes, if any such misfortune happened. There is no reason to suppose a miracle to have taken place. Fear might temporarily paralyze the tongue. We may suppose the man guilty of the alleged crime, and we may suppose a brief lingual paralysis as the result of fear and remorse at the thought of the infidelity and the perjury. "Natural causes" can sufficiently explain the fact, if it be a fact.

But is it a fact? In what "Harrisburg" did this event happen? Where is the Courier-Journal published that records the sudden judgment?

It is surely not too much of a concession to free-thinkers, that their Orthodox friends who recommend to their notice widely circulated newspaper statements, like the foregoing, should be required to substantiate such statements by giving not only the name of the town, but the name of the county and State where the event is said to have happened; also the date, and the names of responsible parties that vouch for the truth of the miraculous narration.

If our Orthodox friends triumphantly parade instances of "signal answers to prayers" (as they are prone to do), let them know that, to carry any weight with sceptics, such statements must be substantiated by testimony that would at least be sufficient to satisfy a jury in court.

M. D.

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, on REPRESENTATIVE PAPERS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird's-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Year of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents concepts of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his benefice by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages containing the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no slier, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the system of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six Copies Fifty Cents; Twelve Copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single Copies, Five Cents; Twelve Copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, stated and answered from a Bible standpoint, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROSVENOR, for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio.

SOW THE SEED!

THE "IMPEACHMENT OF CHRISTIANITY," published in the first number of the third volume of THE INDEX, has been electrotyped, and an edition of Ten Thousand Copies has been printed in the form of

A Cheap Tract for Gratuitous Distribution!

It is intended to circulate One Hundred Thousand Copies during the current year. In order to accomplish this purpose, we must rely upon the co-operation of our active sympathizers.

☞ Packages of these TRACTS, containing any desired number of copies, will be mailed to any address on receipt of enough money to defray postage, and whatever additional sums, large or small, the generosity of distributors may prompt them to add.

Of course, money will be needed to carry out our intentions; but we urge every one who believes that THIS TRACT WILL DO GOOD, and who is willing to distribute copies of it, to send in an order at once, even if unable to donate more than the simple postage and the time required for distribution. Do not hesitate because you cannot give more. We are convinced more than ever by the character and objects of the late Cincinnati Convention, that such plain speech as this TRACT contains is greatly needed at the present time. In the name of Christianity,

A most Dangerous Attempt is now Making to Subvert the Religious Liberties

of the American People; and the mighty magic of that name is still powerful over multitudes even of otherwise liberal minds. Let the world learn that the protest made against Christianity is not made by hatred of Goodness and of Truth, but rather by a love for those that can no longer be satisfied with shame. He woefully misjudges this Tract who thinks it has no higher aim than to "make a sensation." It was meant to tell needed truth so plainly that it must be heard. And it will be heard. All we ask is—give it a chance.

☞ Address your orders to THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio

☞ The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT. This series contains in the aggregate two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, 90 St. Clair street, Toledo, Ohio.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice President.
P. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, New Bedford, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
ASA K. BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
P. H. BATESON, " "
CALVIN CONR, " "
EDWARD RUSSELL, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

Name	Address	Shares	Amount
D. E. LOCKE	Toledo, O.	Twenty	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER	" "	Fifteen	1,500
C. CONR	" "	"	1,000
EDWARD RUSSELL	" "	"	1,000
P. E. ABBOT	" "	Forty	4,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY	" "	Ten	1,000
GEORGE M. BATESON	" "	"	1,000
P. H. BATESON	" "	"	1,000
E. F. BATESON	" "	"	1,000
H. E. HOWE	" "	Three	300
W. O. FINE	" "	"	300
J. M. RICHARDS	" "	"	300
V. KEENE	" "	"	300
ALANSON WOOD	" "	"	300
WILLIAM KRADE	" "	Five	500
J. G. HOLEWANTH	" "	One	100
JOS. E. MARX	" "	"	100
C. AUGARD	" "	"	100
ASA K. BUTTS	New York, N. Y.	Thirty	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON	New Bedford, R. I.	Two	200
ALICE COCHRAN	Brooklyn, Pa.	Five	500
GEORGE HADLEY	Cincinnati, O.	Two	200
Mrs. A. HALL	Defiance, Mich.	One	100
G. N. JENNINGS	Northampton, Mass.	"	100
J. SEDGWICK	Tonika, Ill.	"	100
CARL POST	Palmer, Mich.	Three	300
HENRY MILLER	Monroe, Mich.	One	100
L. B. SUTHERLAND	Sacramento, Cal.	Five	500
J. L. WHITING	Quincy, Mass.	One	100
LOUIS BRISTOL	Boston, Mass.	"	100
J. E. SUTTON	Croydon, N. H.	"	100
S. I. DUKER	Olathe, Kan.	"	100
J. M. HADLEY	"	"	100
S. L. HILL	Florence, Mass.	Ten	1,000
W. H. SPOONER	Haverhill, Mass.	Two	200
JOS. E. BARKETT	Boston, Mass.	"	200
E. W. WALK	La Grange, Ind.	"	200
FRANK PRATHER	Boston, Mass.	Five	500
E. F. DIMMOCK	Wellsville, Kan.	One	100
J. T. DICKINSON	New York, N. Y.	Two	200
W. J. POTTER	Middlefield, Ct.	Fourteen	1,400
W. C. OLATTE	New Bedford, Mass.	Three	300
W. C. GARDNETT	Eastlandville, Ind.	"	200
Mrs. M. C. PARKER	Boston, Mass.	"	200
Mrs. S. E. EMERSON	Dover, N. H.	One	100
Mrs. E. EMERSON	"	"	100
W. H. DOWNER	Birmingham, Ct.	"	100
R. B. SMITH	Lansing, Mich.	"	100
R. B. SMITH	Warren, Pa.	"	100
W. C. BOWEN	Idaho, N. Y.	"	100
WM. CLARKE	Toledo, O.	Three	300
C. L. SMITH	"	One	100
J. N. LYMAN	Cincinnati, O.	Twenty	2,000
L. G. FELICE	Monroe Centre, Pa.	One	100
A. FOLSON	Boston, Mass.	Three	300
L. O. BARR	Colebrook, Conn.	One	100
E. E. SWEET	Boston, Mass.	Five	500
ELIZABETH WRIGHT	"	"	500
E. B. WARD	Detroit, Mich.	Twenty	2,000
A. D. WILT	Dayton, O.	One	100
S. S. BONES	Keokuk, Iowa	"	100
WM. JONES	Peekskill, N. Y.	"	100
S. H. DARR	Oskaloosa, Iowa	"	100
J. H. YORK	Dover, N. H.	"	100
JOS. HAYES	"	"	100
G. P. FOLSON	"	"	100
"A FRIEND"	"	"	100
Mrs. H. E. PERKINS	"	Two	200
O. GREEN	Boston, Mass.	One	100
WILLIAM GREEN	Orange, N. J.	"	100
"A FRIEND"	Lowell, Mass.	"	100
D. B. STEWART	Bristolboro, Vt.	"	100
Mrs. F. W. CHRISTIAN	New York, N. Y.	"	100
C. W. PARCOT	Kelley's Island, O.	Two	200
EDW. M. DAVIS	Philadelphia, Pa.	One	100
Mrs. LUCRETIA MOTT	"	"	100
Mrs. M. A. WHIGHT	Jersey City, N. J.	"	100
A. S. BROWN	Worcester, Mass.	"	100
EDWIN BROWN	"	"	100
R. P. HOLLOWELL	Boston, Mass.	Five	500
BENJ. RODMAN	New Bedford, Mass.	Three	300
H. B. CLARKE	"	"	300
FRANK J. SCOTT	Toledo, O.	Six	600
M. L. HOLBROOK	Houlton, Me.	One	100
W. H. BOUGHTON	New York, N. Y.	"	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON	"	"	100
B. G. BUENERT	Webster, Mass.	Two	200
J. E. FOLLETT	Winona, Minn.	One	100
JOS. WARBASSE	Newton, N. J.	"	100
T. M. LAMB	Franklin, Pa.	"	100
W. H. DYER	Worcester, Mass.	"	100
W. H. SPALDING	Paris de Chien, Wis.	"	100
LOUIS BELMONT	Duluth, Minn.	"	100
LEWIS KURTZ	Philadelphia, Pa.	Two	200
SAM'L WARBASSE	Anguilla, Kan.	One	100
W. L. HATNER	La Fayette, N. J.	"	100
W. E. EMERSON	Amesbury, Mass.	"	100
C. E. BOWEN	Boston, Mass.	"	100
Mrs. I. THOMSON	Dover, N. H.	Two	200
BENJ. HOLLOWELL	Sandy Spring, Md.	One	100
Mrs. M. E. VAN RENSSLAER	N. Y. City	"	100
R. B. STONE	Aberdeen, Miss.	"	100
WM. ROTCH	Fall River, Mass.	Two	200
Mrs. J. WHITAKER	New Bedford, Mass.	Five	500
S. B. ROPER	Northampton, N. Y.	One	100
Mrs. R. D. FRANCIS	Boston Highlands, Mass.	Two	200
CHAR. BOWSALL	Salem, N. Y.	One	100
G. H. BRIDGE	Amesbury, Mass.	Two	200
J. T. CLARSON	"	"	200
C. W. NEWTON	Castleton, Ill.	One	100
HENRY KIEFT	Toledo, O.	Two	200
OTTO KLEIN	"	One	100
R. G. NEUBERT	"	Two	200
A. BUNKER	"	"	200
TOLEDO PRINTING CO.	Detroit, Mich.	Thirty	3,000
T. K. PAGE	Co. Toledo, O.	Thirty	3,000
WESTMINSTER	Westminster, Ct.	Two	200

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 23 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public attention to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of New Bedford, Mass.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HOLLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
Mrs. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

Now Ready!

R. G. INGERSOLL'S GREAT ORATION,

"THE GODS."

PRICE—Fifty Cents.

☞ Send orders to

LOCK BOX 454,

118-119.

Peoria, Illinois.

JUNIOR UNMASKED; or, THOMAS PAINE the author of the "Letter of Junius" and the "Declaration of Independence." A DEMONSTRATION. Royal 16mo. pp. 322. Price, $1.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price. Address JOHN GRAY & CO., 113-3m* P. O. Box 269, Washington, D. C.

AGENTS WANTED FOR "JESUS." By Charles F. Deane, D.D. His Divinity established and Rationalism routed. The most popular and rapidly-selling religious work ever issued. ☞ For Circulars, address D. S. PUBLISHING CO., N. Y., Cincinnati, Chicago or St. Louis. 117-123.

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

IT is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

☞ Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio.

"The Word,"

A MONTHLY JOURNAL OF REFORM.

Edited by E. H. Heywood.

AND to be issued by THE CO-OPERATIVE PUBLISHING COMPANY, Princeton, Mass., May, 1872. Though not its organ or responsible for its action, "THE WORD" will zealously defend the principles of the Labor Reform League, and give in its first number a brief statement of its proceedings and purposes as reported by its Executive Committee. To the many intelligent lecturers and writers in behalf of Labor, Woman's Rights and Peace Reform, we shall render all possible assistance in diffusing their ideas; and we solicit their friendly aid, and the aid of all lovers of Equity, to enable us, by securing subscribers, to speedily place our venture on a self-supporting cash basis.

TERMS: 75 cents annually, payable in advance; 5 copies, $3; 10 copies, $5; 20 copies, $10; 50 copies, $23.50; 100 copies, $40.

☞ Address "THE WORD,"
Princeton, Mass.

A BOOK FOR THE TIMES!

"THE CLERGY A SOURCE OF DANGER TO THE AMERICAN REPUBLIC." Sold by Subscription only. ☞ Agents Wanted!

Address W. F. JAMIESON,
117-120, 19 N. Jefferson St., Chicago, Ill.

The Index.

SUPPLEMENT.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, APRIL 13, 1872.

WHOLE No. 120.

NOTICES OF THE PRESS.

The various criticisms, favorable, unfavorable or non-committal, which are contained in the following "Notices of the Press," are left to stand solely on their own merits, without disclaimer, acceptance or comment on our part. Many more might have been collected; and only a portion of those on hand are here reproduced. Some of them make spicy reading; and the readers of THE INDEX may derive some amusement from this curious reflex of the times, illustrating the kind of impression made on contemporary thought by our radical little sheet.—EDITOR OF THE INDEX.

[From THE ISRAELITE, Cincinnati: edited by Rabbi Isaac M. Wise. February 24, 1871.]

We must say that among the many exchanges we receive it is one of the most ably conducted and worthy of patronage.

[From THE AVALANCHE, Pottersburg, Michigan, January 20, 1872.]

The Toledo INDEX opens its third volume with a grand editorial splurge, "The Impeachment of Christianity." If the editor thinks he has made a new proclamation, he is greatly mistaken. For 1871 years the world has been trying to impeach Christianity, and the fact that the effort has dwindled down to the puny INDEX is sufficient evidence of its futility. Christianity is bound to grow.

[From THE RADICAL, Boston, for April, 1872.]

We repeat of our proposal to print reports of the lectures at Horticultural Hall; for as we read them in THE INDEX, their merit appears such that we would have our readers enjoy the same privilege. And we suggest to those who have not already subscribed for THE INDEX that they do so at once; or, if they cannot, that they at least procure the numbers containing this course of lectures. They will find, by doing so, how well a little money can be disposed of.

[From THE TIMES AND REPUBLICAN, Vicksburg, Mississippi, of November 6, 1871.]

THE INDEX.—We are in receipt of a copy of a weekly publication under the above caption, published in Toledo, Ohio, and devoted to the interests of free religion. It is an eight paged paper, got up in a workmanlike manner, full of truly interesting reading matter, and if we are to judge from the list of contributors, promises to take a position in the front ranks of religious journals in the West. Its subscription is but two dollars per annum.

[From THE JACKSON HERALD, Jackson, Michigan.]

We received a curious paper, THE INDEX, with a request to notice. Therefore we noticed, that it was a paper devoted to the destruction of the Christian Religion. Indeed its motto is "Free Religion." It impeaches Christianity in five or six distinct counts, and sustains some of the counts with almost convincing sophistry. We are sorry to say that the paper shows ability in its editorials, and has great power for harm.

Is the world getting better when such papers as THE INDEX, Woodhull's Weekly, The Golden Age, Day's Doings, Police Gazette, and the Standard can get support enough to live?

[From THE DAILY CHRONICLE, Washington, D. C., of March 8, 1871.]

THE INDEX is a weekly paper, published at Toledo, Ohio, and edited by Francis E. Abbot. It is a handsome quarto sheet, bold, vigorous, able, free, radical, courteous, and scholarly. It disclaims the authority of the Bible and the name of Christianity, and is the exponent of "reason" and rationalism. It claims that the world is passing "from Christianity to Free Religion," and it "aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible." When this exponent of "Free Religion" has lived as long and gained as wide a circulation as the Bible—the exponent of Christianity—we will be ready to make it our "transition" index. Copies of this paper are for sale at Parker's and Shillington's.

[From THE CRUCIBLE, Baltimore, Md., edited by Rev. Moses Hull and Mrs. A. L. Ballou, January 15, 1872.]

THE INDEX, Toledo, Ohio.—As a consistent organ of Free Religion and Free Thought, this paper is absolutely the ablest weekly now printed.

In the last number we notice an announcement which will make it indispensable for the coming year. The Boston Horticultural Lectures are to be published in full exclusively in THE INDEX. Every well-posted radical knows what is the quality of these Essays from the deepest thinking minds of the time.

[From THE NEW COVENANT, Chicago, Illinois, of January 27, 1871.]

THE INDEX, the organ of Free Religion, published in Toledo, Ohio, is just entering on its second volume. The editor, F. E. Abbot, is a frank, honest man, we have not a doubt, and presents the Deistic view of religion very ably, both editorially and otherwise. We are sorry to know that there is any call for such a sheet, but inasmuch as there are those who have no better religion, we are glad that Mr. Abbot undertakes to feed them. We hope the result of his labors will be to create in them a hunger and thirst for better bread and purer water.

[From THE KANSAS ADVERTISER, Topeka, Kansas.]

THE INDEX, of Toledo, Ohio, bold and aggressive in waging the war of truth, offers the thoughts of earnest minds upon the religious and social questions agitating this era. Its watchword is "prove all things," and we wish it every success, so long as it "holds fast to that which is good."

Send five cents for specimen copy.

We are in receipt of a late No. of this new and very promising sheet. In typography and general execution it is altogether praiseworthy. It is edited with marked ability, and devoted emphatically to freedom of thought and expression, an advocate of political equality, and complete religious liberty. Published by the Index Association at Toledo, Ohio, at $2 per annum.

[From THE CONNEAUT REPORTER, Conneaut, Ohio, of October 28, 1871.]

THE INDEX.—This paper is an organ of those who call themselves the advanced school of thinkers, especially upon religious subjects. They disclaim allegiance to Christianity, as being antiquated, and look for a new development of religious belief. While we do not agree with its views, we are not afraid of them. If Christianity is true, it can defend itself from criticism; and if it is not true, the sooner we find it out, the better. In any event, the paper will do good, as it will serve as a pruning-knife to lop off the false excrescences of faith and dogma that have fastened upon the true faith, and that it cannot injure; and the examination will make Christians more circumspect and tend to develop a still truer ideal of Christian perfection.

In order to place the publication upon a sure financial basis, a mutual stock company has been formed. It is published at Toledo, and is edited by F. E. Abbot.

[From THE SUNDAY LEADER, Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, of September 17, 1871.]

It is rather a singular fact, but a fact nevertheless, that large and influential as is the unorthodox element in this country, its newspaper organs have generally proved pecuniary failures for want of support, while the organs of the sects, which are generally edited with a tithe of the brain or energy, flourish and grow fat as surely as they are started. The latest ventures in the rationalistic line are no exception to this remark. The Boston Radical failed once, and is now only kept up by persistent bolstering. The Modern Thinker, Comtean organ of America, never issued but one number. THE INDEX, of Toledo, Ohio, is a gallant attempt to overcome the influence of this apparent law, and make a success where all others have failed. It is not a pecuniary success as yet, but energetic efforts are in progress to make it so, and the friends of liberal religious views everywhere are urged to assist it in these efforts. We imagine that even those whose liberality cannot go the length that Mr. Abbot, the editor of THE INDEX, would carry it, may yet wish to the extent of a subscription to see his venture live.

[From THE GOLDEN AGE, New York City: edited by Mr. Theodore Tilton, March 20, 1872.]

THE INDEX rejoices in contributions from Prof. Newman and Rev. Mr. Voysey, of England. It publishes the lectures given at Horticultural Hall, and almost every number contains something of sterling value. We have the least possible sympathy with the "Christianity" it relentlessly attacks, but regret that it feels called to attack Christianity itself. Mr. Abbot is a very able, conscientious, devoted man, of the heroic type, and his success in securing a fund of $50,000 for the support of his paper is a deserved recognition of his fidelity to his convictions and high-toned character. But we never read his paper without feeling that a man who was made for a college professor has got into an editor's chair where he does not belong, and is making altogether too costly a sacrifice for the sake of an idea which is of little practical importance, if it is true. The religion better than Christianity will include all that is best in Christianity, and that is good enough for anybody, and the best the world has had or is likely to get for a millennium or two.

[From THE OBSERVER, Bowmarville, Ontario, Dominion of Canada, February 15, 1871. "Organ of the Bible Christian Conference.")

THE INDEX.—A weekly paper devoted to Free Religion, published by the Index Association, at Toledo, Ohio, (United States). Terms $2 per year. Honesty compels us to say, that with this publication we have no sympathy, when the editor invites us to abandon the Christian Religion and accept in lieu thereof "Free Religion." We beg respectfully to decline his invitation. The chief features of the "Free system" are "The supremacy of liberty in all matters of government, the supremacy of morality in all matters of conduct, and the supremacy of benevolence in all social and personal relations. It puts the Church on the level of all other institutions, the Bible on the level of all other books, the Christ on the level of all other men, leaving them to stand or fall by their intrinsic merits or demerits." And for this monstrosity we are asked to abandon that which we have proved to be no cunningly devised fable. We beg to be excused, and sincerely hope the converts made by the Index Association will be few, very few; and far, very far between.

From THE CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, Raleigh, North Carolina, February 1, 1871.]

THE INDEX, published at Toledo, Ohio, edited by a Mr. Abbot, comes to us asking for a notice. It is nothing more than a bold, brazen-faced advocate of infidelity, wearing the cloak of what is called "Free Religion." It esteems the Christian Church to be merely a human institution, denies the inspired authority of the Bible, repudiates the Divinity of Christ, and talks largely about the "supremacy of science in matters of belief."

We suppose this paper aims to overturn Christianity, so firmly established in the world. It has undertaken a huge task—a task equal to the old woman who vainly attempted to sweep back the flowing tides of the ocean, when they came rolling in upon her feet. An Indian chief, fretted by the heat of a tropical sun, spring upon his feet and let fly his arrow at the sun. The arrow returned and clove the head of the archer, but the solar orb went on rejoicing in his bright mission of illuminating the world. So Mr. Abbot may let fly his editorial arrows from the bow of infidelity, but the great central sun of Christianity will go on with increasing splendor in the grand mission of enlightening, purifying and making happy the moral and intellectual world.

The iron clad ship of the Christian system, freighted with the precious hopes of humanity, has floated down the stream of Time amid the waste and wrecks of ages; and having shed unscarred the solid shot and bomb-shells fired from such batteries as Home, Voltaire, Gibbon, Volney and Paine, will likely survive the bird-shot attacks of THE INDEX.

It is passing strange, however, that men pretending to search for religious knowledge should cast aside the authoritative teachings of the Bible. Such men are like the mariner who casts overboard the guiding compass and relies upon the uncertain conjectures of human reason.

Men may throw overboard the unerring guidance of the inspired Scriptures; they nevertheless are compelled to make the voyage over the stormy sea of life, and without the chart and compass of this book are likely to wreck their immortality ere they reach the shining shore of eternal happiness.

[From THE REPUBLICAN, New Orleans, Louisiana, of February 4, 1871.]

THE INDEX, a weekly paper devoted to Free Religion, is published by the Index Association, at Toledo, Ohio, and is for sale by George Ellis, opposite the Post-office. From its prospectus we learn that "THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love."

[From THE WESTERVILLE BANNER, Westerville, Ohio, of October 27, 1871.]

Accompanying a late number of THE INDEX, is a Supplement sheet addressed "To the friends of Liberty and Light," which has for its object the solicitation of subscriptions to the "Index Association." This is an incorporation with a capital stock, present and prospective, of $100,000, to be paid in annual instalments of ten per cent, upon the stock subscribed. The shares are $100 each. THE INDEX is edited by Francis E. Abbot, and published at Toledo, Ohio. It is a radical religious paper, claiming to be an exponent of free thought, free speech and free religion. It has not reached the end of its second volume; but owing to its free toleration of every shade of religious opinions, and its able management in the hands of Mr. Abbot, assisted by able corps of editorial correspondents, embracing several among the ablest writers of the day, it has gained quite an extensive circulation and influence in many parts of this country and in Europe. The object in the foundation of the stock company is to give it still greater prestige, and make it the grand medium for the exposition of the principles it advocates. Its friends are responding liberally to the call, and the stock subscription is rapidly growing.

[From THE CHRISTIAN UNION, New York City; edited by Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, January 3, 1873.]

THE INDEX, printed at Toledo, O., comes every week to meet a curiosity that never tires. For it undertakes to expound a religion of which Christianity is but a species, or even but a variety, a mere "sport." It disowns all churches; it sets aside every distinctive doctrine held hitherto in churches, and is as remote from our centre of religion as Uranus is from the Sun. But there it rolls, and we suppose must have reasons of its own, and something satisfying. Its temper is mainly good, its sincerity unquestionable, and its ability greater than in such a field we should have supposed possible.

MR. DARWIN'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS.—Mr. Abbot publishes in THE INDEX extracts of letters from Mr. Charles Darwin, in which that gentleman expresses his substantial agreement with Mr. Abbot's Truths for the Times. This work consists of two series of brief propositions upon religious subjects. It is a compact exposition of "free religion," as Mr. Abbot holds it. We shall not attempt to compress still further this condensed creed, by assuming to give its substance; but this may without injustice be said of it, that by its definitions "free religion" declares itself not only un-Christian but even anti-Christian. Its gospel is one of self-culture exclusively. It is not in terms atheistic, and we find the expression "spiritual oneness with the infinite One;" yet the idea of a personal God seems altogether excluded, and there is certainly no recognition of any super-sensuous influence upon man. Mr. Darwin's adherence to this school will hardly be matter of extreme surprise, but will certainly occasion much regret to numerous readers of his works.

[From THE LIBERAL, Chicago, Ill., of March 1, 1870.]

THE INDEX.—We acknowledge with pleasure the receipt of a copy of this new journal, published at Toledo, Ohio, under the editorship of Francis E. Abbot. From articles by Mr. Abbot, and reports of some of his discourses, which we had previously seen, we expected to find in his journal sincere and valuable contributions to reformatory literature. A very brief examination of THE INDEX satisfies us that it is better and fairer than we dared hope. It is, in a certain sense, bound by a platform to "religion," and a department of the paper is under the control of the officers of the Free Religious Association, of Boston; but we ought to add that the editor of THE INDEX defines religion to be "the effort of man to perfect himself." If there were a general agreement that this should be considered religion, and sufficient moral justification for all, a great difficulty would be removed. THE INDEX seems to be pledged, by its definition, to oppose dogmatic creeds, to justify free thought and to aid in pointing out how we may improve and develop ourselves, by individual means and by social and political arrangements. To this field of labor we welcome it, and we trust that it will achieve success. We perceive that the editor concludes one of his articles with the words, "God help the right." We hope we have no disposition to begrudge Mr. Abbot his right to keep one of the deceptions of theology as a memento of his early training; but, deeply convinced that in the future we must say, "Man, help the right!"—deeply assured that the sufferings of the human race can only be relieved by science and purely human, not theological thought, we hope Mr. Abbot will prove himself a reformer of capacity to stand up against even the dogma of Theism, or the assumption of it, or of anything but the correlative rights and duties of humanity.

[From THE ORANGE CHRONICLE, Orange, New Jersey, of January 21, 1871.]

THE INDEX is an eight-page weekly, edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot, Toledo, Ohio, and devoted to "Free Religion." Its price is two dollars a year, and its columns are pressed down and running over with vigorous and original thought. F. E. Abbot represents the extreme wing of the radical Unitarian ministers; and for many years a pastor in that denomination, he now discards the terms Reverend and Christian, and, with all his natural energy and enthusiasm, gives his cultured powers to the proclamation of a new gospel, which he claims is based on the principles of human freedom. "Free Religion," he says, "emphasizes the Unity of the Universe, the Unity of Mankind, the Unity of the Person, and the Unity of the Unities." Mr. Abbot has announced, as associate editors during the coming year, Rev. O. B. Frothingham, Colonel T. W. Higginson, Rev. William J. Potter, and Richard P. Hallowell; and the readers of THE INDEX are likely to see an able exposition of this new phase of religious opinions.

[From the same, October 12, 1871.]

The publishers of THE INDEX appeal for subscriptions toward starting a new weekly liberal journal "to emancipate America from Christian superstition." It is to be hoped that it will not be of the same style of "liberality" as THE INDEX.

[From THE SUNDAY REPUBLIC, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, of February 11, 1873.]

We have been kindly furnished with specimens of a newspaper published in the West, and, of course, having a branch office in New York City, which, we believe, will do a vast amount of injury to the morals of our people, in proportion as it is spread before them. The publishers also print and scatter broadcast tracts, pamphlets, &c., most demoralizing in their tone, questioning the authenticity of the Bible, disputing the divinity of Christ, and denying boldly and plainly that Christianity is accomplishing any good in the world. But what we want to deal with at the present time is the insolence of the editor who prints his euphonious name in large capitals at the end of an article denouncing as revolutionary and outrageous the proposed amendment acknowledging God in the Constitution. He works himself into a pitiful paroxysm of alarm over what will probably ensue (according to his reasoning), if the projected amendment were to succeed, and he frantically calls upon all liberal-minded citizens to sign counter-petitions and forward them to him. The main cry used by the journal referred to is that all men are guaranteed immunity in worshipping God according to their inclination; but they are evidently under the impression that this also gives them the privilege of trying to destroy all other forms of religion but their own, which is in reality none at all, for they fill every page with a nauseating mixture of profanity, infidelity, implety, and atheism. To the well-informed Christian, such papers are harmless; but to the weak-minded or wavering, they are deadly poison to mind, heart, and soul.

[From THE BROOKLYN DAILY EAGLE, Brooklyn, of January 27, 1873.]

FREE RELIGION

flourishes, according to its organ. THE INDEX, indeed, does not publish impressive statistics of membership or encouraging weekly lists of converts to the freshest faith—or faith negation, as evangelical critics might say. But it announces a great and increasing demand for its issues. THE INDEX is still fishing for sensational scientists. A little while ago, as we duly reported, it captured Darwin, who rejoices in his descent from the historic ape.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL

is not so easily caught, and declines, on the ground of pre-occupation, to put his views on religion in an essay for THE INDEX. The Professor bites, however, and sends a short apologetic note, disclaiming "want of sympathy with the earnest work." Of this bite the organ makes the most. The question whether

LONGFELLOW IS A FREE RELIGIONIST

is an interesting one, and will command attention for THE INDEX article by Rev. E. C. Towne, who holds that Longfellow is a very Free Religionist, and says that in his latest poem, "The Divine Tragedy," the poet has presented a "Jesuitism" which is "only the shrunken letter of the old story, decently and tenderly laid out, a beautiful corpse, with a few fresh, sweet flowers cast about the forever still and lifeless form." Attention will also be directed to Frothingham's

"SHORT STUDIES OF CHRISTIANITY"

—Iconoclastic, destructive and offering nothing in place of the system he would overthrow. After reading the paper it is impossible not to ask Mr. Frothingham, "What are you going to do about it?" The same research which satisfied him that existing Christian forms are only the remains of pagan superstitions, running back to remote antiquity, must also have shown him that mankind everywhere, and in all ages, has needed and insisted on having a religion. How will Mr. Frothingham persuade mankind to do without a religion now? In the meantime, if a secular suggestion be permitted, our dull orthodox journals would better answer the men of the Free Religious movement, instead of "pooh-pooh"ing and ignoring them.

[From THE PEORIA REVIEW, Peoria, Illinois, of February 14, 1870.]

We have received copies of THE INDEX, a new organ of free religious expression, published at Toledo, Ohio, and edited by F. E. Abbot. The prospectus says: "THE INDEX will aim, above all things, to increase pure and genuine religion in the world,—to develop a nobler spirit and higher purpose, both in society and the individual. It will aim at the same time, to increase freedom in the world,—to destroy every species of spiritual slavery, to expose every form of superstition, to encourage independence of thought and action in all matters that concern belief, character and conduct."

The celebrities of the free religious movement will be heard through this new medium. THE INDEX is issued weekly at $3.00 a year.

[From the same, February 23, 1870.]

We have received a copy of THE INDEX, a newspaper devoted to free religious thought, and published in Toledo, by the Blade Co. It is edited by the famous Francis Ellingwood Abbot. To a man up a tree, it looks as if the Rev. Francis was fishing in a mud-puddle expecting to catch trout. He begins by stating several propositions, the gist of them being that no one knows what he believes, and cannot find out.

[From the same, January 20, 1873.]

We acknowledge the receipt of the first number of the Toledo INDEX, the organ of the Free Religionists of this country, for 1873. We noticed some months ago, in these columns, the fact that a stock company was being formed—capital $100,000—for the assurance of its future publication. We see, by the present number, that $52,000 of this stock has been subscribed, and the Association assumes publication of the paper, trusting soon to receive subscriptions for the remaining $48,000. THE INDEX still remains under the editorial charge of Mr. Francis E. Abbot, whose bold and outspoken utterances in the past have done so much to popularize its peculiar theological views. Among its contributors are T. W. Higginson and O. B. Frothingham, and other rationalists in various parts of the country, whose names are not unknown to fame. Although not in complete sympathy with the leading ideas of THE INDEX, we wish it all the success that its typographical excellence, freshness, freedom of speech, and fearless presentation of truth, merit.

[From THE SALT LAKE TRIBUNE, Salt Lake City, Utah; edited by Mr. E. L. T. HARRISON, July 16, 1870.]

THE INDEX, published every Saturday by the Index Association, at Toledo, Ohio. $2.00 per annum.

We cannot give our readers a clearer idea of the views and purpose of this ably-edited and thoroughly but not rudely "iconoclastic" little sheet, than to quote from its own standing and concise announcement:—

"The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences, than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity."

THE INDEX accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights and Brotherly Love."

"These be brave words," and the spirit in which its editor, Mr. F. E. Abbot, addresses himself to his work is thoroughly earnest and sincere. THE INDEX was commenced with the present year, and already ranks foremost among the issues of the so-called infidel press. Unlike that old and sturdy friend of religious liberty, the Boston Investigator, THE INDEX regards free thought not as an end in itself, but as the agency whereby alone Free Religion shall be established. "If we aim," says the editor, "to make one thing clearer than another, it is that Religion is deeper than mere thought, whether free or otherwise, and that it is rather the devotion of all our powers to the best and highest ends. This practical devotion of self to goodness, usefulness and truth, is an effort after perfection—not merely a thought. Call it what you please, it is this that we believe in and work for; and when we call it Religion, we do so because it seems to us the real fact which underlies historical religions in all their earnest and living forms."

[From the same, January 14, 1871.]

Last week we presented a most able article entitled "The Future of Religious Organization," from the pen of Mr. Francis E. Abbot, editor of THE INDEX, a journal expressly devoted to the interests of the Free Religious Association. Among the most significant marks of the times is the rise of this Association. It is composed of many of the most eminent thinkers of the day—Ralph Waldo Emerson, we believe, among the rest, who have thrown off the mental shackles of orthodox Christianity and formed an Association under the above name for "the scientific study of Theology." This body of thinkers are not secularists or cold sceptics. While they believe in free thought, they also believe in "cultivating the religious sentiment, developing the religious belief, and deepening, extending and beautifying the religious life."

But a few years ago, it was a hazardous thing to be a free thinker on religious subjects, and but few men of eminence dared to avow themselves on the unpopular side. Now, so progressed is the age, and so wondrously changed the condition of society, that the most profound and original thinkers of our time combine together to build up a society the chief features of which, as stated by Mr. Abbot, are—"Liberty in all matters of government, and the supremacy of science in all matters of belief. It puts the Church on the level of all other institutions, the Bible on the level of all other books, the Christ on the level of all other men, leaving them to stand or fall by their intrinsic merits or demerits." As still further stated by the editor of THE INDEX, the Free Religious Association "requires that the intellect shall count all questions open that are not shut by positive demonstration, that it shall reject all answers which have no better basis than ignorant assumption or dogmatic authority; and that it shall seek answers to all questions through the patient study of universal Nature according to the laws of scientific thought."

Has not the age wondrously advanced, when the leading minds of the day can thus question the unreasoning dogmas and creeds at the feet of which the wealth, intelligence and influence of the civilized world have hitherto helplessly bowed, and still retain their position in the social world? This Free Religious Association is one of the indications of a world-wide movement for the mental emancipation of the race now penetrating every avenue of society. Here in Utah we have been similarly stirred. The Platform of the Utah Reformers is one in spirit with that of the Free Religious Association. We hail them as brethren in the grand cause of human emancipation. We have methods of our own in accomplishing our object, but our aim with theirs is the demolishing of superstition, and the elevation of reason and the spiritual nature of men as the supreme arbiter as to what is divine truth, over and above all, creeds and priestly assumptions.

INFIDELITY.

[From THE REVIEW AND JOURNAL, Franklin, Tennessee, of January 18, 1873.]

We are in receipt of a number of THE INDEX, a newspaper published at Toledo, Ohio, and at New York, devoted, as it expresses itself, to "Liberty and Light." The most prominent article in the paper is headed "The Impeachment of Christianity," which article is divided under different headings as follows: 1, I impeach Christianity in the name of human intelligence; "2, I impeach Christianity in the name of human virtue;" "3, I impeach Christianity in the name of the human heart;" "4, I impeach Christianity in the name of human freedom;" "5, lastly I impeach Christianity in the name of humanitarian religion."

In the South, at least, this impeachment of the Saviour of mankind will be sufficient to prevent the paper from being patronized, but in the North, doubtless, the publication will pay. The worst infidels of all generations have acknowledged the code of values found in the Bible, the best ever framed by human intelligence, and while they have denied that it is inspired by Divine wisdom, they have been content to ascribe to it the character of a well-written tale. But THE INDEX goes further and classes its strivings as the most degrading, corrupt and arbitrary known to the world.

We make no effort to refute or contradict the utterances of the paper. We wish simply to keep it out of the reach of those youthful minds likely to be tampered by the foul heresies it advocates, and we decline to place it on our exchange list.

ALL CHRISTIANITY BE ABANDONED?

[From THE DAILY PANTAGRAPH, Bloomington, Illinois, of October 15, 1871.]

The Pantagraph has received from one of the chiefs of one of the States to the east of us, a copy of a weekly newspaper, which appears to have been published for some year and a half past, and the object of which is alleged to be "to reform the world in the name of Christianity." Accompanying this paper is a carefully prepared prospectus for the extension of its circulation, and having a pointed request, say "please notice, and send marked copy." An examination of this paper and prospectus shows that design is to benefit the world by abolishing Christianity, though nothing else is offered in its place, except that all are to do "that which seemeth in their own eyes." We are sorry to be compelled to add that the paper is well gotten up in its animal department, presents a good appearance, appears to be conducted with ability; and as is shown in the prospectus, thirty thousand dollars have been subscribed for the purpose of increasing the sales of the publication, "in order," as the prospectus says, "to prepare the public mind beforehand for the work of action," for it is declared that "a conflict of most formidable scale is evidently impending between the religious matters between the progressive and reactionary parties, and it must manifestly work itself out in direct political issues; the Sunday question, bible-in-schools question, the Christian Constitutional amendment question, and so forth, have only to be agitated; and every discerning man perceives that the sure but slow development of these similar controversies must shake society to its very foundations!" Very well. The Pantagraph does not seem to assist in this effort to shake society to its foundations, and bad as the world is, we do not propose to attempt its reform "outside of Christianity"—at least when nothing better—even nothing at all—is in its place.

It is not necessary to justify this refusal to join the ranks against Christianity by any defence of its dogmas and sects. We offer no such defence. But history of the human race has proven any one in the character of mankind, it is that without the aid of religion they become ravening wolves, without obligations of duty, conscience or responsibility. It certainly cannot be said that this is a good time to overthrow all religious sentiment, and to trust to that pretended "innate goodness" for which the prospectus before us demands "liberty." The vilest superstition ever known among men not actually savages is better than no religious convictions; just as bad laws and a bad government are better than anarchy and no law. And the whole morality of every people, by which they are elevated above the beasts, and obey fixed laws of right and wrong, springs from and is involved in their religious faith.

Rather than no religious convictions, give us Mohammedanism, Buddhism, Mormonism or Confucianism; and rather than abandon Christianity, even as a civilization wholly for this world, give us the worst shades of Catholicism of other days. What would the hundreds of thousands of Roman Catholics in this free land be without any religious restraint? What would the hundreds of thousands of Protestants be without the restraining influence of such Christianity as they possess? Let desolated Chicago answer, as the Godless men who infest her ruined streets exhibit their devilish brutalities. Let the thousands of lawless men and women everywhere who, being without any religious, even without any superstitious restraint, are preying like wolves upon their fellow men, answer.

We must decline to give even the name of that paper which asks our aid in its attack upon "the foundations of society."

THE INDEX—FREE RELIGION.

[From THE CHRISTIAN OBSERVER, Caledonia, Kentucky, of January 23, 1871.]

The editor of THE INDEX, published at Toledo, sends us a copy and requests a notice. It is devoted to Free Religion, which is defined by its advocates thus: "It puts the Church on a level with all other institutions, the Bible on the level of all other books, the Christ on the level of all other men, leaving them to stand or fall by their intrinsic merits or demerits." We have less respect for those who take this half-way position by allowing the Bible to be the equal of all other books, than we have for those who denounce it as a fable—"a fabrication of falsehoods."

They claim the right to believe whatever in the Bible meets their views, and the "freedom" to reject the remainder. Like the Koran, they court the friendship of those who revere the teachings of the sacred oracles, while they are in hearty sympathy, if not in league, with the libertinism which "free love" not only tolerates but advocates. The holy institution of matrimony is declared a nullity, and the most sacred obligations which that institution imposes are set at naught. Christianity, in the highest sense of that term, is a free religion, but its freedom does not consist in its toleration of such views as free thinkers, free lovers and their likes are wont to infuse into the public mind. Personally, we wish the editor of THE INDEX well, but in his advocacy of "free religion" he must, as he is doubtless able to do, get along without either our sympathy or encouragement.

FREE RELIGION.

[From THE CATHOLIC ADVOCATE, Louisville, Kentucky, of January 23, 1871.]

One of the most pernicious perversions and corruptions of the age is that of language. Men have lost the meaning of words.

In the writings of modern infidels, superstition means religion, religion is atheism; scepticism is faith in man and faith is doubt of the supremacy of human nature. It is difficult to imagine anything more disloyal and unworthy than this habit of employing words in a sense precisely the reverse of that which custom and usage have given to them.

They speak most respectfully of religion, and yet deny God; reject Christ and the immortality of the soul, and hold that these negations are religion.

They speak most reverently of Christianity and at the same time time insinuate that all the positive teachings of the Christian religion are superstitions.

One need read only a few pages of Buckle or Huxley in order to perceive the double-dealing which underlies the whole process of this school of writers. We have received a paper called THE INDEX, published in Toledo, Ohio, and devoted to the advocacy of Free Religion.

In glancing over the columns of this sheet one immediately perceives that by free religion is meant naked atheism.

In the synopsis of free religion, found on its first page, we are informed that Christianity, which inculcates, as articles of faith, the fall of Adam, the everlasting punishment of the wicked and salvation through Christ alone, is the worst enemy of liberty, science and civilization, because it is organized de spite of man. But free religion, placing the Church on the level of all other institutions, the Bible on the level of all other books and Christ on the level of all other men, is the best friend of progress of every kind, because it is organized with man.

For faith in God, free religion substitutes faith in man. It denies God that it may deify man, and in rendering divine homage to man it legitimizes all the evil and corrupt passions of the human heart.

Free religion also holds the Darwinian theory of the origin of the human race through descent from inferior types of being, or in other words it teaches that man, having first been a tadpole, became a monkey and then wore off his tail by sedentary habits.

Heine, the famous German wit and poet, says of himself that, when he heard shoemakers and tailors, enveloped in the fumes of strong tobacco, arguing against the existence of God over their beer, it worked upon him like an emetic, and he became a believer.

Did Darwin and Huxley know that THE INDEX, published in a town which like a mushroom grew but yesterday from out the swamps, is engaged in teaching the backwoodsmen of the far west their infidel and materialistic theories, it might suffice to convert even them.

THE INDEX.

[From THE COLDWATER SENTINEL, Coldwater, Michigan, of March 25, 1870.]

Francis E. Abbot, one of the participants in the Free Religious movement inaugurated in Boston, in the summer of 1868, at that time minister of the Unitarian Society, Dover, New Hampshire, having advanced to a position not occupied by the most liberal of the organization with which he was identified, although supported by a large majority of his immediate society, led to litigation, and the Supreme Court of that State sustained an injunction prohibiting the said "Abbot and all other persons to occupy said meeting-house for the purpose of preaching and inculcating disbelief and denials of tenets held by the Unitarians, or teaching doctrines subversive of the fundamental principles of Christianity."

The Unitarians are thus protected by law against heresy in Unitarian pulpits in that State.

We read Mr. Abbot's address at the Free Religious Convention, and were charmed with its originality, its literary merits, its boldness of expression, the earnestness and the sincerity of its author. Its peculiar and objective feature, as we now recollect, was the repudiation of all systems, whether Jew, Christian, Mohammedan or by whatever name, as possessing a monopoly of religion; that religion was older than either, natural to humanity, not dependent upon systems, sects or creeds—these being simply the envelopes, man-made, rude or skilful, depending upon the condition and culture of its authors.

The Unitarian Society of Toledo, Ohio, invited Mr. Abbot to become its minister, knowing his peculiar views. Mr. A. declined the invitation unless the organization would divorce itself from Unitarianism and change its name to "The First Independent Society, of Toledo, Ohio." This the Society did by a vote almost unanimous. Settling to his work with a society in sympathy, he found his field too narrow, although it included the usual Sunday meetings, Sunday schools, week evening meetings for discussions, evening schools, sewing schools, etc., and THE INDEX is the medium selected to give his teachings a wider field and a larger auditory. It is a neatly printed quarto sheet, one department being in charge of Wm. J. Potter, Secretary of the Free Religious Association. It is published every Saturday at the "Blade Printing House." Terms $2 a year. Those who desire liberal reading, free thought, fearless investigation unhampered by past traditions or authorities, will be pleased with it. Mr. Abbot is a man of rare culture and eminently a thinker (qualities accorded to him by those who repudiate his position) which are guarantees of literary excellence, a high and cultivated tone.

[From THE PRESENT AGE, now of Chicago, Illinois, April 2, 1870.]

We call attention to an advertisement in another column headed "Abraham Lincoln's Religion." THE INDEX, as the reader will learn, is a weekly paper in quarto form, almost faultless typographically, on book paper a little more than half the size of The Present Age, at $2 per year. No. 13 is before us, sparkling with gems of noblest thought for the progressive mind. We have perused each number with interest and welcome THE INDEX as a co-laborer in the great humanitarian work in which we are engaged. It is the organ of the "American Free Religious Association" of which O. B. Frothingham is President. We have seen no recognition of "spirit communion" or an intimation of the views of the editor as to the relation existing between the two worlds, but we recommend it to every spiritualist and advocate of a religion better adapted than is the Christian to the present wants of humanity.

The following words of the editor in the number before us, clearly indicate the aims of THE INDEX, and its prominent contributors,—

"We believe THE INDEX is accomplishing the work at which it aims. It is opening a great question in the public mind—whether Christianity is the best religion of which man is capable, or whether another is not dawning upon the world. Setting up no new 'authority,'—publishing no new Bible and proclaiming no new Christ,—it summons the human soul to trust itself, to assert its own freedom, and to use its freedom in the purification of character and the elevation of society."

[From THE HOUSEHOLD MESSENGER, London Ridge, N. H., of December, 1871.]

From Toledo, Ohio, we have received a very able radical paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion, entitled THE INDEX. It is edited by Rev. F. E. Abbot, formerly pastor of the Unitarian Church at Dover, New Hampshire.

Has for contributors some of the most learned divines in England and this country.—Leader, Donaldsonville, Louisiana.

Able writers.—Lopore Herald, Lopore, Indiana.
It evinces considerable ability.—Universalist Herald, Nolasuga, Georgia.

Deserves to be in the hands of every thinker in the land.—Monitor, Portland, Maine.

Radical in its views, and permits perfect freedom to all contributors.—Republican, Toledo, Iowa.

The most honest, thoughtful, and conscientious of these [radical or "infidel"] sheets.—Zion's Herald, Boston.

THE INDEX under his charge cannot fail to make its mark in the world.—Sturgis Journal, Sturgis, Michigan.

Denounces prayer as a stupid and most harmful superstition. What next?—Christian Advocate, Nashville, Tennessee.

It is the exponent of the liberal Unitarian [?] doctrines, and is sharp as a two-edged sword.—Telegram, Richmond, Indiana.

It is an exponent of the views of the more radical portion of the Free Religious party.—Lorain County News, Oberlin, Ohio.

It is neatly printed Subscribers must expect the most perfect freedom of expression.—Daily Leader, Bloomington, Illinois.

We wish it all the success that its neat appearance, freedom of speech, and fearless presentation of truth merits.—Centralia Sentinel, Centralia, Illinois.

A well conducted weekly journal A thorough advocate of free thought, free expression, free religion.—Dakota City Mail, Dakota City, Nebraska.

It makes a very neat appearance, and is well filled with interesting matter. We hope the paper may meet with a good reception, and be liberally sustained.—Investigator, Boston, Massachusetts.

The paper is in the hands of able men, and is getting a large circulation. The matter it contains is always such as men of thought are inclined to read.—Yates County Chronicle, Penn Yan, New York.

The pondering and solemn-browed INDEX, denying Christianity on the one hand, Judaism on the other, and meditating on the regeneration of the world by Free Religion.—Golden Age, New York City.

Though holding ideas of our own not in accordance with some of the thoughts published in this paper, we think it contains some of the most Rational Rationalism we have ever met with.—Streator Gazetteer, Streator, Illinois.

We are glad that it is so outspoken and straightforward at the start, and that it has thus done not a little to make clearer the lines that separate those who have no real fellowship with each other.—Liberal Christian, New York City.

About to begin its third volume under the editorship of one of the most fearless and scholarly exponents of liberal thought, Francis E. Abbot, assisted by many of the ablest radical writers.—Baraboo Republican, Baraboo, Wisconsin.

T. W. Higginson, E. E. Hale [?], and other eminent writers, are also on the editorial staff. The paper is of marked ability, and we would recommend it to all who are interested in the cause.—Weekly Republican, Marysville, Missouri.

Without endorsing or condemning the doctrines promulgated by THE INDEX, we may truthfully say that the paper is edited with distinguished ability, and is becoming a "power in the land" in the peculiar field it has marked out for itself.—Cairo Paper, Cairo, Illinois.

The Toledo (Ohio) INDEX, which is published by the Free Religious Association and edited by Francis Ellingwood Abbot, is one of the ablest liberal papers of the country. Although a new journal, it has already attained a large circulation.—The Iconoclast, Washington, D. C.

An ably conducted Free Religious Journal. Contributed to by such great minds as Wm. J. Potter, O. B. Frothingham, T. W. Higginson, and other fine liberal writers. The paper is already self-sustaining, and from its rapidly increasing circulation doing much good in the cause of Religious Liberty.—Daily Times, Council Bluffs, Iowa.

THE INDEX is now over a year old, and probably no paper ever published gained such a notoriety, and among the liberal minds of the day such a general appreciation, as has this paper in this time. Among the liberal theological students of the age, none in our opinion ranks higher than the young man who conducts THE INDEX.—Nineteenth Century, Dayton, Ohio.

THE INDEX, the able organ of the Free Religionists, attacks the Rev. A. D. Mayo, Old School Unitarian, of Cincinnati, Ohio, for his insinuation that his less orthodox brethren are free lovers. The statement is certainly false; there is no decent pretext for making it, and Mr. Mayo appears to us to violate the obligations of his profession in neglecting to retract his charge. Theologians have our full permission to carry on their war of opinions as they please, but an attempt to slander the morals of men like Frothingham, Weiss, Wasson, Potter, Abbot, and Higginson, calls for the reprobation of the secular press.—Daily Times, Leavenworth, Kansas.

BEST THOUGHT OF THE AGE.

Science, Philosophy and Religion!

THE READERS OF THE INDEX ARE TOO WELL acquainted with the character of the BOOKS in the following Catalogue to render any comment on their value necessary. They have been selected as the ABLEST recent Contributions to POPULAR SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION, with a few Miscellaneous Selections of Essays, Biography, Travels, &c., of an interesting character. Any of these Books, or will be sent post-paid on receipt of the Publisher's price, by addressing

Any Book Published in the United States!

HENRY S. STEBBINS,
Bookseller and Publisher,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

To parties who prefer paying Express charges (in most cases NOT EXCEEDING SEVENTY-FIVE CENTS), we make the following liberal offer:—

For $10, Books amounting to $11.25 may be Selected
 " $15 " " " $17.25 " "
 " $20 " " " $23.00 " "
 " $25 " " " $29.00 " "

HENRY S. STEBBINS,

TOLEDO, OHIO.

THE ORIGIN OF SPECIES, by CHAS. DARWIN. New Edition, with numerous Illustrations. Price.....$2.00
 THE DESCENT OF MAN, AND SELECTION IN RELATION TO SEX, by CHAS. DARWIN, 2 vols.....$4.00
 NATURALIST'S VOYAGE ROUND THE WORLD, by CHAS. DARWIN.....$3.00
 THE GENESIS OF SPECIES, by ST. GEORGE MITCHELL. Illustrated.....$1.75
 MAN'S PLACE IN NATURE, by PROF. HUXLEY.....$1.25
 ORIGIN OF SPECIES, by HUXLEY.....$1.00
 LAY SERMONS, ADDRESSES AND REVIEWS, by HUXLEY.....$1.75
 MORE CRITICISMS ON DARWIN, &c., by HUXLEY.....80c
 ORIGIN OF CIVILIZATION AND PRIMITIVE CONDITION OF MAN, by SIR JOHN LUBBOCK. Illustrated.....$2.50
 PRE-HISTORIC TIMES, by SIR JOHN LUBBOCK. With numerous Illustrations. 640 pages. 8vo.....$3.00
 PRIMITIVE MAN, by LOUIS FIQUET. Numerous Illustrations.....$4.00
 THE WORLD BEFORE THE DELUGE, by LOUIS FIQUET. Illustrated. New Edition.....$3.50
 FRAGMENTS OF SCIENCE FOR UNSCIENTIFIC PEOPLE, by PROF. TYNDALL. Illustrated.....$3.00
 HOURS OF EXERCISE IN THE ALPS, by TYNDALL. Illustrated.....$2.00
 HEAT AS A MODE OF MOTION, by TYNDALL.....$2.00
 LIGHT SCIENCE FOR LEISURE HOURS, by PROF. PROCTOR.....$1.75
 OTHER WORLDS THAN OURS, by PROCTOR. Illustrated.....$2.50
 CHIPS FROM A GERMAN WORKSHOP, by MAX MUELLER. 2 vols.....$7.50
 LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF RELIGION, by MAX MUELLER. Just published.....$2.00
 THE LIFE THAT NOW IS, by ROBT. COLLIER.....$1.50
 STEPS OF BELIEF, by JAMES FREEMAN CLARK.....$1.00
 ORTHODOXY: ITS TRUTHS AND ITS ERRORS, by the same.....$1.75
 THE CRITICAL DOCTRINE OF A FUTURE LIFE, by W. R. ALGER.....$0.50
 THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH, by LOUIS FIQUET. Just out.....$1.75
 RADICAL PROBLEMS, by C. A. BARTOL.....$2.00
 THE HISTORY OF EUROPEAN MORALS, by W. E. LUCKY. 2 vols. 8vo.....$6.00
 PROSE WORKS OF RALPH WALDO EMERSON. Two vols.....$5.00
 SOCIETY AND SOLITUDE, by the same.....$2.00
 EDUCATION—INTELLECTUAL, MORAL, PHYSICAL—by HERBERT SPENCER.....$1.25
 FIRST PRINCIPLES, by HERBERT SPENCER.....$2.50
 ILLUSTRATIONS OF UNIVERSAL PROGRESS, by SPENCER—a selection of his best Papers.....$2.50
 THE PRINCIPLES OF PSYCHOLOGY, by SPENCER. Volume I.....$2.50
 RECENT DISCUSSIONS IN SCIENCE, PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION, by SPENCER.....$1.00
 SHORT STUDIES ON GREAT SUBJECTS, by PROCTOR. First and Second Series, each.....$1.50

HISTORY OF ENGLAND, by FROUDE. 12 vols. Popular Edition.....$15.00
 THE EARTHWARD PILGRIMAGE, by M. P. CONWAY. (London Print).....$2.75
 AMERICAN RELIGION, by JOHN WATSON.....$1.50
 NATURE AND LIFE, by ROBT. COLLIER.....$1.50
 FORCE AND MATTER, by BUSCHNER. (London Print).....$2.75
 THE MATERIALISM OF THE PRESENT DAY, by PAUL JANET.....$1.50
 THE DEBATABLE LAND, by ROBERT DALE OWEN.....$2.00
 THE TEN GREAT RELIGIONS, by JAMES FREEMAN CLARK.....$2.00
 THE HEAVENS—an Illustrated Hand Book of Popular Astronomy, by AMES GULLERMIN (London), full of fine Illustrations. Price reduced to.....$4.50
 THE EARTH—A Descriptive History of the Phenomena and Life of the Globe. By ELIASH RECLUS. Translated by the late R. B. Woodward, and edited by Henry Woodward. With 234 Maps and Illustrations, and 23 Page Maps printed in Colors. 8vo., Cloth.....$5.00
 AMONG MY BOOKS, by JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL.....$2.00
 BOOKS AND READING; OR, WHAT BOOKS SHALL I READ? by NOAH PORTER.....$2.00
 TOPICS OF THE TIMES, by JAMES PARTON.....$2.00
 TABLETS, by A. BARNES ALCOCK.....$1.50
 SPECTRUM ANALYSIS IN ITS APPLICATION TO TERRESTRIAL SUBSTANCES, by DR. H. SCHWENK. Fully Illustrated. Reprinted from English Edition.....$4.00
 LYELL'S ELEMENTS OF GEOLOGY. Student's Edition.....$2.00
 SCHWEGLER'S HISTORY OF PHILOSOPHY. With annotations by J. H. STUBBS. (English Edition).....$3.00
 ORIGIN AND DEVELOPMENT OF RELIGIOUS BELIEF, by S. BAKED GORDON, M.A.
 Part I—HEATHENISM AND MOBAISM.....$2.00
 Part II—CHRISTIANITY.....$2.00
 LEGENDS OF OLD TESTAMENT CHARACTERS, by S. BAKED GORDON.....$2.00
 PHASES OF FAITH; OR, PASSAGES FROM THE HISTORY OF MY CREED, by FRANCIS W. NEWMAN.....$2.00
 THE PRINCIPLES OF POLITICAL ECONOMY, by JOHN STUART MILL. Cheap Edition.....$2.50
 THE ANATOMY OF VERTEBRATED ANIMALS, by PROF. HUXLEY. Just out. Illustrated.....$1.50
 THE SENSES AND THE INTELLECT, by ALEXANDER BAILEY, M.A. Third Edition. 8vo.; 676 pages.....$5.00
 LEAVES FROM THE BOOK OF NATURE, by SCHALL DE VRIES.....$1.50
 AMERICANISMS, by the same.....$3.00
 YESTERDAYS WITH AUTHORS, by J. T. FIELD—very interesting Reminiscences.....$2.50
 LEADERS OF PUBLIC OPINION IN IRELAND, by W. E. H. LEUCKY.....$1.75
 MEMOIRS OF SOCRATES FOR ENGLISH READERS. Just out.....$1.25
 CHINESE CLASSICS—CONFUCIUS AND MENCIUS. Half Morocco.....$2.50
 VOLTAIRE—An Essay on Life and Character of—by JOHN MORLEY. Reprinted from English Edition.....$3.50
 LIFE AND CORRESPONDENCE OF THEODORE PARKER, by JOHN WATSON. 2 Vols., Large 8vo.....$4.00
 BACON'S ESSAYS, with Annotations by WHEATLY. One thick volume; good print.....$3.00
 ELEMENTS OF INTELLECTUAL SCIENCE, by NOAH PORTER, President Yale of College.....$2.00
 AUTHORITY AND CONSCIENCE—A Free Debate. Edited by CONWAY MORSE. London print.....$2.75
 DISCOVERY OF A NEW WORLD OF BEING, by GEORGE THOMPSON.....$3.00
 THE WORKS OF THOMAS CARLYLE, Popular Editions, only Ninety Cents per volume, as follows:
 ON HEROES AND HERO WORSHIP. 1 Vol.
 SARTOR RESARTUS. 1 Vol.
 JOHN STERLING. 1 Vol.
 THE FRENCH REVOLUTION. 3 Vols.
 LIFE AND LETTERS OF OLIVER CROMWELL. 2 Vols.
 THEIR WEDDING JOURNEY, by W. D. HOWELLS.....$2.00
 AROUND THE WORLD, by E. D. G. PAINE. Fully Illustrated.....$3.00
 THE LAND OF DESOLATION—Observations and Adventures in Greenland, by ISAAC J. HAYES. Illustrated.....$1.75
 THE ANNUAL RECORD OF SCIENCE AND INDUSTRY FOR 1871. Edited by SPENCER F. BAIRD. Just out.....$2.00
 TRAVELS IN JAPAN. Edited by HAYARD TATLOW.....$1.50
 TRAVELS IN ARABIA, by the same.....$1.50
 MOUNTAINEERING IN THE SIERRA NEVADA, by CLARENCE KING.....$2.50
 THE SCIENCE OF NATURE VERSUS THE SCIENCE OF MAN, by NOAH PORTER.....$1.00
 HISTORY OF RATIONALISM IN EUROPE, by W. E. H. LEUCKY. 2 Vols. 8vo.....$4.00
 SOCIAL STATICS, by HERBERT SPENCER.....$2.50
 THE DIVINITY OF CHRIST—An Examination of Liddon's Bampton Lectures.....$2.00
 WAR AND CULTURE, by ARTHUR HELPS.....$1.50
 CHRISTIAN THEOLOGY AND MODERN SCEPTICISM, by THE DUKE OF SOMERSET.....$1.00
 HAND-BOOK OF LEGENDARY AND MYTHOLOGICAL ART, with numerous Illustrations, by C. E. CLEMENT. (Very valuable).....$3.25
 THE SUBTERRANEAN WORLD, by GEO. HARTWIG. (English Edition.) One thick volume Illustrated. Reduced to.....$5.00
 HALF HOURS WITH THE BEST AUTHORS, with Biographical Sketches, by CHAS. KNIGHT. 6 Vols.....$9.00
 THREE CENTURIES OF ENGLISH LITERATURE, by CHAS. D. YONGE.....$2.00
 RAWLINSON'S MANUAL OF ANCIENT HISTORY. (English Edition.) 8 vo.....$3.00
 RAWLINSON'S FIVE GREAT MONARCHIES OF THE ANCIENT EASTERN WORLD. 3 Vols. 8vo. Over 1000 Illustrations.....$15.00
 TAINIE'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LITERATURE. 2 Vols. 8vo. (No library complete without it.).....$10.00

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, APRIL 20, 1872.

WHOLE No. 121.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ARBET, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS PROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD F. HALLGREN, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHERRY, ROY CHARLES VOTSEY (England), Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), MRS. MORRISON D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
F. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

[FOR THE INDEX.]

Character and Work of Jesus.

A SERMON BY THE REV. CHARLES VOTSEY, PREACHED AT ST. GEORGE'S HALL, LONDON, NOVEMBER 13, 1873.

"I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father which hath sent me."—(The Fourth Gospel, V: 30.)

As a sequel to the last two discourses, it may be useful to pursue our examination of the life and character of Jesus of Nazareth. We have so far broken the ties which bound us to Christianity as to take up a position not only perfectly independent of it, but unmistakably antagonistic to it.

All the churches and sects of Christendom, including a large portion of the Unitarian Church, agree in regarding Jesus as more than man, as having been divinely commissioned in quite an exceptional manner to the work of a prophet or teacher of religion. Even this slender fibre of the parting cable we must not scruple to break, or else we shall find in it a spell strong enough to entangle us in a dangerous proximity to superstition, which will involve our placing Jesus not only at the head of a long line of the world's benefactors, but on a pinnacle by himself, in a category from which every other human name will be excluded.

Were we to retain this last remnant of the old idolatry, we should find ourselves using the name of Jesus in our devotions in a way in which we should not venture to use the name of any other human being; we should also be driven to apply the epithets Lord, Redeemer, Saviour to him, when we should shrink from applying these epithets to any one else. Though the Theist may have ever so exalted an opinion of the human excellence of Jesus, yet one thing he cannot do—he cannot refer to Jesus in any terms which the Christian or half-Christian would misunderstand as a tacit agreement with the last shred of Orthodox belief on this point.

If we are told, in reply to this, that there never was before or since so perfect a human being as Jesus, then our answer must be—the New Testament actually records some human imperfections in him. If, however, fighting with our weapons, they say: "We do not believe that part of the New Testament which records his imperfections," the manifest inference will be that their ideal of Jesus is purely imaginary; and, on the same principle, we should be at liberty to strip off all blemishes in biographies which were not infallible, and might say of Moses, Confucius, Socrates, or of any one else, that he was a perfect man. It is not by any means a difficult task to write a biography which our contemporaries would consider to be perfectly blameless. It would be impossible to write one which posterity would equally regard as perfect. No doubt the writers of the Gospels thought they had left not a single stain upon their biographies of Jesus, but the steady onward march of humanity has raised the standard of virtue since those early times, and we now have to condone what they regarded as praise-worthy, and to condemn what they condoned. The day must come at last for revising the verdicts of by-gone generations; when even the disciples of one of the world's noblest and best of men hesitate to take his language of denunciation and scorn upon their own lips, and when even they who worship him as God are driven by the altered conditions of society to explain away some of his plainest precepts, or to treat them with open disregard. Even the example which once thrilled a whole generation with admiration is afterwards looked upon with a calm curiosity, and hardly an effort is made to imitate or to reproduce it.

We should, however, be equally in the wrong were we to follow in the steps of those who call Jesus "Lord, Lord," and yet do not the things which he bids them, or to rush into the opposite extreme of depreciating the great merit of Jesus and his work. It is for us to measure him not by the standard of our own times, but of his own. It is our duty to endeavor to recall his position, the state of his country and people as he wandered over the hills and plains of his native land, the constant agitation then going on to shake off the Roman yoke, the hindrances to their faith and religion which were perpetually begotten by the formalism and exclusiveness of the Jewish hierarchy; in short, to deal with his memory as we would that other men should deal with our own, and give him credit for having done his best in a great and terrible crisis to serve his fellow-men. If, in tracing the course of his life or the conflicting records of his sayings, we find it hard to ascertain the truth, it will only be fair to give him the benefit of the doubt so long as we are not entering upon the inquiry with foregone conclusions, and are not determined to make him out to have been perfect in spite of every testimony on the other side.

The simplest key to the character of Jesus is, I think, given us in our text: "I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father who hath sent me." Rightly or wrongly, he seems to have been persuaded that he had a call of duty to which every other consideration was to give way, and in this particular I cannot discover any important variation in the narratives; they all alike testify that he proclaimed himself the Servant of God, and here and there are very distinct declarations of what he considered God's service to consist in. "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance." "The Son of Man is come not to destroy men's lives, but to save them." In other words, he felt himself called to serve God by serving men—to do the Father's will by doing good to the brethren. This he did in two principal ways: by his words and by his deeds. Of his actual deeds we can say little or nothing, because hardly a single benevolent action is recorded of him which is not more or less mixed up with miracle. He is said to have fed the hungry, to have healed the sick, restored sight to the blind, hearing to the deaf, reason to the insane; under his magic touch the lame walked, the lepers were cleansed, and even the dead restored to life. We can only dimly imagine that he was one of the Therapeuts of the age, and did work some cures according to the pathological twilight of those times. More than this is hopeless conjecture, as every act of his benevolence has been shrouded in unbelievable myth.

But under this subject we must include his ordinary demeanor to the people around him. There was a charming worldliness and freedom in his social habits for which the over-good people condemned him. By his friendliness with the outcasts of society he added to the odium with which society regarded him, and I think we are justified in saying that Christendom owes to the example of Jesus every effort which has from time to time been made to raise the lower classes from their miserable poverty and degradation. Nor can we forget that the people who now take the best care of their poor are the Jews. Few as they have been and far between, the Howards and Elizabeth Frys of the western nations caught the inspiration of their tremendous love and sympathy from the example and precepts of the Prophet of Nazareth—the friend of sinners.

Nor can we fairly separate this noble feature in his life from that beautiful religious belief in the Fatherhood of God, which was the motto of his mission. In him that doctrine first took practical shape, and developed into a world-wide brotherhood. No one was to him an outcast—no one was too far gone astray to be his friend. Every one, however defiled with the mire of sin, or bespattered with the world's scorn, could find a seat by his side and a welcome to his heart. In spite of all his blemishes, he was and is still the most friendly of men—the man in whom met the greatest powers of self sacrifice and sympathy, manifested by his bursting through every social barrier that he might kindle love and hope in a despairing heart. Greater to me is this heroism than even his faithfulness as a martyr and his obedience unto death. For a hundred that will die for the truth, there is only one who will spoil his own life and ruin his social position by contact with the degraded.

It might be urged that, because Jesus was born in a humble position, this habit of his associating with outcasts was an easy one. But such an objection is only based upon the assumption that society in Judea and Galilee was like our own. Even if the parents of Jesus were very poor people, there is not a grain of evidence to show that they belonged to an inferior caste. Every one learned some useful occupation, and even the highly cultured Paul was a tent maker. The evidence tends to lead us to regard Joseph and Mary as persons of some consequence, related by blood to the priests, and as rearing almost as much as did the Pharisees the eccentricities of their son. In fact Jesus outraged religious rather than social feeling, although in truth the social and religious were then nearly identical. It was against the law and customs of the Jews for Jesus to touch the leprous and converse with Samaritans, as it was against the whole national soul for him to consort with the Publicans, whom the Jews not unreasonably both detested and despised.

We have also other indications that the social position of Jesus was not a lowly one, for he is constantly represented as addressing the chief priests and scribes and lawyers as their equal, and the Roman Centurions are reported to have spoken to him with the utmost courtesy. His position as a sort of wandering friar may also have added to, instead of diminishing the public respect; as is the case now all over the East, where the religious orders are treated with the utmost deference. This brief digression is so far pertinent inasmuch as there is a school of critics who have, it seems to me, unfairly disparaged this really beautiful trait in the character of Jesus, the theological effect of which is only just now, after eighteen centuries, beginning to bear fruit. We are only just now awakening to the belief that men of every clime, of every race, of every creed, are alike dear to the one God and Father of us all. But this despised Galilean Jew had believed it, and acted upon it, and been hated and murdered for it nearly two thousand years ago.

Every time he took to his brotherly bosom the forlorn outcast, the pagan and fraudulent publican, the hated Samaritan and the dog of a Canaanite, he struck a blow at the pride and exclusiveness, not only of his own people, but of the Christian people and Christian churches, which have done and are doing in his name the exact opposite of that which he commanded and taught them how to do.

Under the subject of the deeds of Jesus, we must, of course, include the great work of preaching and teaching in which the last three years of his life were spent.

Though we cannot, on this occasion, enter into any minute examination of his doctrines, his precepts and his denunciations, we must take into consideration the enormous benefit which he conferred upon mankind through his active and aggressive attacks upon the errors and vices of the age in which he lived. It must have required no little moral courage to unmask the hollowness of the religious profession which filled the air around him, to speak almost scornfully of those rites and ceremonies which the Pharisees had been wont to look upon as the most important part of their duty to God, to throw discredit upon the occupation of the scribes and lawyers and to accuse them of trampling upon that Sacred Book over which their lives were spent, to charge them with making the Word of God of none effect by their traditions.

These attacks upon what seemed to him only huge hypocries were further aggravated by his open violation of Sabbath observance. To look now at the way in which the Sunday is observed in Scotland—a way, however, utterly unlike the Jewish,—one would never have believed that Jesus, who is one of the Gods in that country, left behind him such an unsparring rebuke of Sabbatarianism. Indeed, from all we can gather regarding Jesus' own conduct and speech about the Sabbath, we only wonder that Christians have been able to preserve the day even as a day of rest from labor. Jesus said nothing in its favor, and did all he could to undermine public regard for it. It is, I think, most fortunate for us that the Jewish reverence for the Sabbath as a day of rest did survive the hostile teaching of Jesus, till Sabbath observance became incorporated into the laws of Christian lands. But we ought, nevertheless, to confess our obligations to Jesus for giving a heavy blow, if not a death blow, to the superstitious regard for the Sabbath as a day on which amusement is unlawful. His reply on one occasion to a remonstrance from the Pharisees was a direct contradiction of the statement in the Fourth Commandment, that God rested on the seventh day from all his work. "My Father," he said, "worketh up to this moment." He could not have said more plainly, "God never rested, nor rests at all;" and the corollary to that is, that God never gave to men the Fourth Commandment as we have it.

The attitude of hostility to the corruptions of his time, which brought down upon him the anger of the whole Jewish hierarchy, and at last ended in his accusation and death, was in itself a benefit to mankind. Even supposing that he was too hard upon the chief priests and scribes and rulers, that he did not make sufficient allowances for their antecedents and surroundings, yet the attack was made in a righteous cause. He sought only to set free the minds and souls of his countrymen who were overshadowed by a heavier tyranny than that of the Roman Conquest. They were bound hand and foot to a ceremonial as useless for moral purposes as it was wearisome. They were growing more and more unhappy under their self-righteous routine, the more exclusive and proud that their observances made them. They clung round that Temple of theirs in Jerusalem till they forgot that their God was the Creator and Ruler of the wide universe. They offered their prayers and paid their tithes with painful punctiliousness, till they forgot that "the Most High dwelleth not in temples made with hands, neither is worshipped with men's hands, as though He needed anything who giveth to all life and breath and all things."

But the work of Jesus was to bring out into the pure air of heaven men and women who were growing pale at heart with the confinement of the stifling sanctuary—to bring out into the glorious sunshine of the Father's universal presence those poor souls who were getting darker and colder and more sad from day to day in the dim religious light of Levitical ceremony. And for this we thank him with our hearts' best approval. We are glad to know that he never flinched nor wavered, that he went on proclaiming to the last the universal love of the Father in Heaven, who only wanted men to be good and holy, and who did not want their fastings and long prayers and long faces. We are delighted and honored to think that another great soul was added to the ranks of those who fought valiantly for truth, for liberty of soul from priestly tyranny, and that he died—a sword in hand—as brave men should die, with his face to the foe.

These were the deeds for which we bless his memory, and which the world is only privileged to witness at rarest intervals. And the secret of his strength and fidelity lay in that determination of his which I took for my text, "I seek not mine own will, but the will of the Father who hath sent me." All the great and noble deeds which have adorned humanity have been done by the power of this principle. When a man has once mastered himself, so as to give himself up, as it were, to a Will higher and better than his own, to be taught and led and commanded what to do and how to do it; when he makes it his constant duty and delight to ask God for heavenly wisdom and strength and fortitude to carry him through duties which are toilsome and dangerous; when he resolves to fight the battle out to its bitter end from no other motive in the world than to do what is right and to speak what is true, then that man is wielding a power which the world, and more especially the Church, can but ill measure and can only feebly resist. He has given himself away to God and to God's cause, and along with that has cast away the chief elements of his own weakness and has broken down the greatest hindrances to his success. A new power has possessed him; a Divine impetus throbs in his veins, and an iron strength and stability plants every footstep in his march.

But vast and rare as is such power, and magnificent as are its achievements, it does not make any one wholly free from error in judgment, nor absolutely perfect. It has been more than once coupled with great ignorance and even with superstition, and often with the faults common to fanaticism; from some of these Jesus himself was not free, and therefore our admiration for his true nobility is very properly chastened by a due recognition of his failings, so that our homage may not degenerate into idolatry. But when all has been said on both sides, we are forced to admit that the world has been advanced wherever the spirit of Jesus, as it were, re-appeared. Wherever a true surrender to the Father's will—i. e., a firm and unflinching devotion to a righteous cause, has brought one of our fellow-men into mortal conflict with the powers of falsehood and corruption around him, his life has been a burning and shining light on the gloom of humanity and his death has shed its lustre from generation to generation.

"Beloved, let our light as shine before men that they, seeing our good works, may glorify our Father who is in heaven."

A clergyman wished to know whether the children of his parishioners understood their Bible. He asked a lad whom he found one day reading the Old Testament, who was the wickedest man. "Moses, to be sure," said the boy. "Moses!" exclaimed the parson, "how can that be?" "Why," said the lad, "he broke all the commandments at once."

THE IMPRACHMENT OF CHRISTIANITY.

[From the American Christian Review of Cincinnati, April 2, 1878.]

Such is the ominous title of a tract published by the Index Association, Toledo, Ohio, and written by the notorious infidel, Francis E. Abbot, editor of THE INDEX. This is tract No. 10 from a list of 100, now circulated all over the land for the enlightenment of the masses, and as preparatory of the dethronement of Christ, if we are to judge correctly of the purport of this audacious and blasphemous tract. The author has a large job on hand. Unless he procures help, I can hardly believe that he ever will finish the task gratuitously assumed. He proposes to himself to take a tilt against the bosses of Jehovah's buckler. He has pronounced the death-knell of Christianity—to day, he says, it "is dying a lingering death." It can not be that Mr. Abbot imagines himself the False Prophet of John the Revelator—Antichrist—the apostle of prophecy who is destined to inaugurate that inauspicious period when the red horses of carnage shall plunge through blood as high as the bridle bits. Now just listen one moment, and be astonished, oh, ye heavens, as the great Red Dragon thus utters his voice: "I IMPEACH CHRISTIANITY BEFORE THE BAR OF CIVILIZED MANKIND."

"And I summon it to appear before the high tribunal of humanity to show good cause why it should not stand condemned and sentenced by the Judge." Now, I am somewhat curious to know whether Christianity will appear at the summons of humanity. Mr. Abbot commands Christianity to come and answer to his solemn charge. I think I see it coming, coming. I presume he intends to cut its throat when it does come. The prosecutor, or rather inquisitorial general, has published his "High Commission," but he has not yet informed the public where he intends to erect his "Star Chamber." Possibly Toledo is to be the honored place. One thing in the programme is fixed, which is, that "Humanity" is to wear the remine in the judicial proceedings.

The first count in his indictment is this: "I impeach Christianity in the name of human intelligence, because it is the great organized Superstition of the Western World, perpetuating in modern times the false beliefs, the degrading fears, and the benumbing influences of the Dark Ages." Now, if by these assertions the writer means priestcraft, hierarchical despotisms, and the asceticism of monasteries, I give assent to his indictment; but if he refers to that divine system of things of which Christ is the author, then most heartily do I dissent from his false conclusions. The gentleman is guilty of the charge of confounding the base perversions of priests and the traditions of a hireling clergy with the pure and spotless religion of Jesus Christ. He is well versed in the phenomena of a perverted Christianity and with the contradictions of clashing sects, who, I am exceedingly sorry to admit, in their ungodly rivalries spend much more time in their aspirations for ecclesiastical supremacy than in their endeavors to unite conflicting parties and subserve the common interests of humanity. In this view of the case Mr. Abbot has my sympathy, small as it is. But I seriously doubt whether he ever studied the divine system with a view of ascertaining its essential truths and of establishing its stupendous and glorious facts. It is alleged, on good authority, that Tom Paine wrote his Age of Reason, in Paris, without having in his possession a copy of the Bible, the disorganized state of society in France at that time rendering it impossible, so it is said, for him to procure a copy. Neither Voltaire, Tom Paine, nor Hume, understood the Christianity of the New Testament. And I am of the opinion that Mr. Abbot does not. He is too well acquainted with its perversions.

Mr. Abbot asserts that Christianity "is the great enemy of science." We deny that the Bible is opposed to science. It is opposed to false science and false philosophy, but recognizes everything that is pure and beautiful in nature, and everything that is morally sublime in man. He asserts that Christianity "withdraws attention from the natural affairs of this life," and "concentrates all its earnest thoughts on a future life." Asceticism does this, but the teaching of Christ and his Apostles insists on the cultivation of our talents here; enforces the doctrine that he who does not labor and earn his bread by the sweat of his face shall not eat; that Christians must be "diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord;" that they are to "use this world as not abusing it;" that each one shall "attend to his business and not go about as a busy-body;" that each one shall "abide in the occupation into which he has been called;" having "promise of the life that now is, and that which is to come." These Bible statements flatly contradict the unfounded assertions of the great impeacher, which fact conclusively proves that he is ignorant of the contents of the Bible; and if not ignorant, then he wilfully bears false witness.

2. "I impeach Christianity in the name of human virtue, because it appeals to hope and fear as the supreme motives of human conduct, holds out promises of an eternal heaven as the reward of obedience to its commands, utters threats of an eternal hell as the punishment of disobedience to them, makes its appeals to human selfishness as the proper spring of human action," etc., and that consequently it "destroys the disinterestedness of all high morality." All of which is simply a caricature of the Bible, and in positive contradiction to the teaching and example of Christ. Why does not the great impeacher give his proofs as he goes along? Not one word does he give. Is this what he calls honorable? Is this a specimen of his "human virtue?" Who ever taught a higher, a nobler, a grander morality than the Author of Christ-ianity? Did he not oppose and expose all wrongs, all oppression, all hypocrisy, and all manner of ungodliness, and did he not inculcate continually purity, chastity, sobriety, truth, justice, mercy, love unfeigned? Did not Christ, and does not Christianity now, make its appeals to the highest intelligence of which man is capable, and hold out a motive power for the development of noble manhood which in its nature and purpose transcends all the dreams of humanitarism? Is it only when wicked men totally disregard the long suffering of infinite love and compassion, and refuse to practise virtue, and trample truth under their feet, and scorn the message of salvation, that an offended God reveals to them a hell of torments. The principles of the moral government of God are, the protection of the innocent from the ravages of the wicked, and the punishment of the wicked in vindication of his eternal principles of justice. No human government could stand one day that dared to eliminate these elements of civil government.

"Because it teaches that the virtue of the 'Savior' can be a substitute for the virtue of the saved—that the 'sinner' can be made pure by the righteousness of another." Christianity teaches no such thing. It teaches that we are saved through Christ by means of the gospel; that sinners come into Christ by obedience of the truth; that sinners must reform their lives; that they must "work out their salvation with fear and trembling;" that they must "save themselves" by the practice of Christian virtue and the cultivation of all their talents.

"Because it teaches that the natural penalties of wrong doing can be escaped by 'faith in Christ.'" This is a very partial statement—it is but a segment in the circle of the plan of salvation. Not only must we have faith in Christ as our prophet, priest and king, but "without holiness no man shall see (enjoy) God." Christ said there is no peace without purity. "Blessed are the pure in heart."

"Because it enjoins self-abhorrence as the first condition of the salvation it offers,"—makes the denial of all "worth or worthiness" in mankind the first step in the Christian life, and teaches that Christ will save those alone who have lost all faith in themselves." This is another gross and malicious perversion of the truth. I challenge the great self-constituted impeacher to find such a doctrine in the Bible. The doctrine of Christ is the only doctrine that ever touched the deep depths of the soul of man, and raised him to the dignity of noble manhood. He asks the world to come to him as the infallible teacher. The "self-abhorrence" he taught, was to abandon sin, murder, robbery, deceit, hypocrisy, sinful lusts, and the practice of every vice. Instead of leading men to "lose all faith in themselves"—except in the fact of procuring the means of salvation for themselves—the doctrine of Christ, above all other doctrines, inspires man with self-reliance, self-assertion, and a holy, lofty ambition which find no parallel in all the annals of time. All the deeds of earth that have ever made themselves worthy of record have been achieved by men of faith—by men who received their inspiration from the Word of God—by men who seized God's revelations of truth as their only hope, because on the low plane of uninspired manhood there was found nothing but the blank of moral desolation.

This "Impeachment of Christianity" is on a par with the Pope's infallibility. But I am not yet through with this twin brother of the Pope. He needs a little more jolting and sifting. I am not yet half way through this fulminating bull of excommunication.

MR. ABBOT IMPEACHES CHRISTIANITY.

BY PROF. D. H. WHEELER.

[From the Milwaukee Index, January 26, 1878.]

The accused is certainly great; Mr. Abbot admits it. Only great lawyers plead great cases; Mr. Abbot is therefore a great man—at least he must think so. What an Alpha of a fellow he must be who can say: "I impeach Christianity before the bar of civilized mankind!" You never heard of him? Not heard of Francis E. Abbot, editor of one of the other Indexes and chief of the apostles of Humanitarian Religion and Radical Religion and the Religion of the Future!

Then I cannot undertake to tell you how great a man Mr. Abbot knows himself to be; only Francis E. Abbot can do that. You can guess that he must have a perfectly immense self-consciousness when you know that he so solemnly impeaches Christianity. Seriously, what a self-conceited owl a man must be to undertake such an impeachment and to put it into such a form! An ounce or two of sense and a little real culture would keep a man from such a combination of stupidity and bad taste.

Four, yes five, are the victims of Christianity. They are Human Intelligence, Human Virtue, the Human Heart and Humanitarian Religion. All these our Religion has wronged.

Ridiculous as the charge is, there are fools to applaud the assailant, and even Abbot may lead men who are ignorant astray. Therefore briefly of his essay.

1st. His definition of Christianity is inadequate. It is "the great system of faith and practice which is organized in the Christian Church." This excludes, I suspect, all that we regard as essential to Christianity. That is to say, a system of faith and practice ordained in heaven, revealed on earth, and imperfectly represented in organized churches; and a life divine in the human soul, sustained by a worship whose place is the mind and heart of each believer, whose altar-fire is the Holy Ghost, whose light is the Bible, whose sublime object is likeness to a holy God!

Please don't impeach that, Mr. Abbot. As for our human organizations to help ourselves and our fellows to personal experience of the blessings of Christianity, you may hammer away at them while there is breath in your little body, if only you will now and then give us a hint toward better organizations. The ideal church, the Lord's bride, is in the consciousness of every believer, something other and oh! how far above that temporal form which "the Church" assumes among sinful men.

2nd. After such a radical failure to identify the accused, it is a piece of pure good nature to go on with the trial. But Mr. Abbot, poor man, has done his best; he only knows Christianity in its visible forms.

Human Intelligence, it seems, is a victim to Christianity. "It is the great organized Superstition of the Western world." The argument is "Dark Ages," "Enemy of Science," "Foe of Progress," "concentrates attention on heaven and so obstructs enterprise." Anybody can say all the first parts. I believe I have heard them before. If Christianity caused the "Dark Ages," why did not the light ages kill it and what caused the light ages? A very little historical study will show Mr. Abbot that Christianity—even his type of it—has thrived as never before in the last century. As for the enemy to science, will Mr. Abbot tell us who founded and who maintain our colleges and where the science of our time got its culture and its brains, if not in the shadow of Christian altars? Mr. Abbot may not be blame-worthy for not knowing things; but he is for pretending to know them.

3rd. Human virtue is also a victim. "It appeals to hope and fear as the supreme motives of human conduct." Not quite so rash, fellow traveller. Did you ever read: "That ye may be like your Father which is in heaven?" If "hope" embraces that, and the like of it, perhaps it will serve as well—as Mr. Abbot's Alpine motives.

"It teaches that natural penalties can be escaped by faith in Christ," that the law of "cause and effect" is not hold in the moral world." Once more suggest the New Testament. "Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap." Christianity does indeed (blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ!) teach us how to escape out of ourselves (the flesh) into a better self (the Spirit) through the dear faith that Divine Love became incarnate for our salvation. And if Mr. A. ever gets to the big head enough to see himself a poor sinner in need of great help to "escape the penalties," he also say "I thank God, through Jesus Christ our Lord."

4th. The Human Heart is also a victim. Human emotions, it seems, are subordinated to "an unnatural love of Christ as the Savior of souls." Please Mr. A., and as the Lord from heaven." Really it is too late. What right has the Lord and Savior of souls to love? How perfectly plain it is that Christianity never love their parents or their children or their neighbors! The first thing a man does when he becomes a Christian is to beat his wife, murder his friends, or cheat his nearest neighbor out of a hundred. Mr. A. has not read the golden text, "thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," nor this, "stand, love your wives," nor much more to the purpose. Nor has he studied home life.

5th. Human Freedom is also a victim. Wherever Christianity lives, Freedom dies." You see Mr. A. the respect in which simpletons hold strong opinions. A sensible man of less genius would have pointed to a good deal "mixed," and, inasmuch as freedom has a trick of dying under every form of religion, of course something else must do the killing. I suppose that Freedom died several times before Christianity was born in Bethlehem, and on the day it seems to thrive now in Christian countries, at the same time, and not to thrive in any non-Christian country.

Humanitarian Religion is a victim. Poor I am sorry for her. I don't just know the woman, but she is some friend of Mr. Abbot's, and Humanitarian are terms with which Mr. A. is fast and loose. For example, Christianity is only "human," but some other "human" is its enemy and this human is "humanitarian." The gist of it, I suppose, that Mr. A., being human, dislikes men and likes of some other men who also are human. He may call his girl by any name; but if human and his is human, we confess to a sort of variation. Mr. A. on one side and some well-to-do people on the other—say St. Paul, Wesley, and I—don't just see Mr. Abbot's chances as good as he thinks them to be.

6th. A cause for profound grief that the age is such iron-clad ignorance, or brutal bias as this man betrays. And for my part, Mr. A. is a better illustration of the depravity of uneducated men than even Jim Fisk; to blaspheme things consecrated by the tenderest emotions of human souls, one must be bad to the heart of humanity. I respect an intelligent and sceptic. Mr. Abbot is only a puzzler who two or three rhetorical tricks, a man without the feelings or the decencies of culture.

STON, ILL.

Forman Macleod was on a Highland loch storm came on which threatened serious consequences. Dr. Macleod, himself a large, powerful man accompanied by a clerical friend of diminutive and small appearance, who began to speak to the boatmen of their danger, and proposed that all present should join in prayer. "Na, the chief boatman: 'let the little ane gang but first the big ane maun tak an oar.'"

A NEW FREE RELIGIOUS MOVEMENT.

[The subjoined article from an Oskaloosa (Iowa) paper has been received from Mrs. W. E. Shepherd, of that town, and we reproduce it in the hope that the earnestness and activity it describes may provoke to similar enterprises in other localities. We congratulate our friends in Oskaloosa on their movement, and hope it will be as well sustained as it has been bravely begun.—Ed.]

"Organized Iniquity" is the name that some persons have given to a society recently organized in Oskaloosa. The facts are as follows: Many persons who claim to be "liberal," and many who are said to be "superstitious," and many who are known to be "sceptical," have long felt the need of a creedless society, in which there is an asylum for all. Accordingly, informal meetings were held and a liberal interchange of views soon led to the organization of THE FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY OF OSKALOOSA, the object of which is IMPARTIAL INVESTIGATION of all subjects, whether religious, political, moral or scientific, with a view to arriving at the truth in all things if possible, and disenthraling the minds of men, women and children from superstition and error. The officers of the Society consist of one Umpire or President, one recording and one corresponding Scribe, and one Treasurer, whose duties are the same as those common to the same in all parliamentary bodies. A few persons who were enthusiastic in the cause shouldered the responsibility to rent a room and furnish it with a stove, chairs, &c. The first regular meeting was held in Independent Hall (third floor, west end of Crookham's Block) at 2½ o'clock p. m., on Sunday, March 24, on which occasion Mrs. Adelaide Comstock delivered a lecture. On account of the limited notice and the inclemency of the weather, on the appointed day, there were but twenty-two persons present. Interesting remarks were made by numerous persons in attendance, and more than sufficient money to pay the Hall rent for one year was raised in a few moments; besides which many other assurances were given that other and abundant aid will be forthcoming. The appointed hour for regular meetings is 2½ o'clock p. m. on each Sunday. Mrs. W. E. Shepherd read a lecture ("The Dove's Departure") at the next meeting (last Sunday at 2½ o'clock), and a general interchange of religious views was indulged in. Jews, Gentiles, Christians, Mohammedans, Buddhists, Mormons, Catholics, Protestants, Infidels, Atheists, Sceptics, Rationalists and "the heathen Chinee," are considered members in good standing, so long as they behave themselves as upright creatures. In short, there is no proscription for opinion's sake; and the idea that citizens should be injured in their business and social standing in society because of the belief or non-belief of this or that doctrine, or the free expression of honest convictions from a rational standpoint, is totally condemned.

CHICAGO'S SINS.—Mayor Mason has issued a proclamation recommending that all the inhabitants of this city observe the present day as a day of humiliation and prayer. Among other very proper reasons for this course, his Honor suggests that we should humiliate ourselves "for those past offences against Almighty God to which these severe afflictions were doubtless intended to lead our mind."

The past offences, in our judgment, consisted of pine shingles and other combustible material in the quarter where the fire first got its foothold, not to mention the wooden roof over the pumping works. But if any moral transgression is chargeable with the burning down of the city, we submit that it is the city ordinance altering the fire limits, four or five years ago, so as to enable certain owners and purchasers of old wooden buildings in the central portion of the city to move them down toward Polk street bridge, for the accommodation of harlots.—Chicago Tribune.

A saddler in Detroit has a monkey who usually sits in the shop on the counter. A countryman came in one day while the proprietor was in the back room, and seeing a saddle that suited him, asked the price. Monkey said nothing. Customer said "I'll give twenty dollars for it," laying down the money, which monkey shoved into the drawer. The man then took the saddle, but monkey mounted him, tore his hair, scratched his face, and made the frightened rustic scream for dear life. Proprietor rushed in, and wanted to know what the fuss was. "Fuss!" said the customer, "fuss! I bought a saddle of your son, sitting there, and when I went to take it, he would not let me have it." The saddler apologized for the monkey, but denied the relationship.

An honest Highlander, a genuine lover of sneeshin, at the door of a hotel observed a magnificent man in full tartans, and noticed with much admiration the wide dimensions of his nostrils in a fine upturned nose. He accosted him, and, as his most complimentary act, offered him his mull for a pinch. The stranger drew up, and rather laughingly said: "I never take snuff." "Oh," said the other, "that's a peety, for there's grand accommodation!"

A negro who was suspected of surreptitiously meddling with his neighbor's fruit, being caught in a garden by moonlight, nonplussed his detectors by raising his eyes, clasping his hands, and piously exclaiming, "Good Lord! dis yere darkey can't go nowhere to pray any more widout being 'sturbed'."

Voices from the People.

[EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.]

"I don't renew my subscription for THE INDEX because I like it, but partly because I like you, and partly because I get more help for my sermons from THE INDEX than any other weekly paper. You will of course let me say why I don't like THE INDEX. 1st. I think it better to reform and liberalize Christianity, than to put a new religion in its place. I see no harm or inconsistency in retaining the name in the sense that Parker did, and that those members of the Free Religious Association do who are enrolled as Unitarian clergymen. To me Christianity is the religion which Jesus founded and other teachers, especially Theodore Parker, have organized and developed in many forms; of which I think Parker's thus far the best, at least good enough to work for still. 2nd. If, however, you are right in proclaiming a new religion, I think you would serve its cause better, if you would give much more of your strength and space to inculcating and expounding it, and much less to attacking Christianity. Depend upon it, there are people enough all ready to abandon every existing form of Christianity, as soon as they can be satisfied that they can have any better form of faith, but yet resolved to cling to any form of faith, even what they know to be a poor one, rather than not have any at all. I would give a great deal to have you keep in mind Comte's great maxim—'On ne détruit que ce qu'on remplace.' We can not destroy anything except by building something better in its place. I know you have a better faith to teach than the common one. I wish you took more pains to teach your own faith, and less to criticize your neighbor's. I see many things in your paper which seem to me so quarrelsome and vindictive, as to be utterly unworthy of you. I mean such things as allowing a contributor to say unrebuked that the leading Unitarians were fools or knaves, or as talking editorially of Jesus being snubbed and hustled about by Towne. I would not let any one speak thus of you; if I could hinder it. Your taking so much notice of Towne's article and so little of the accompanying one by Miss Cobbe on Prayer pained me very much, for it proved that you were more anxious to pull down than to build up, to hurt your opponents than to help your friends. There is such deep need of a paper which will teach spiritual faith and untraditional morality that I am sorry to have THE INDEX fall so far short of this great work."

"May be you think I am somewhat tickle, ordering you to stop the paper, and then writing for it so quickly again. But I can't do without it, and my Methodist mother says she wants it too. Hope you will receive enough subscription to your stock to make the paper a permanent thing."

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the Oskaloosa, in the new EXCHANGE BUILDING on St. Clair Street, opposite the WHEELER OPERA HOUSE, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending April 13th.—G. W. Welby, 50 cts.; S. Hoag, 50 cts.; C. L. Roberts, 50 cts.; F. E. Baker, 25 cts.; L. A. Harbaugh, 25 cts.; J. C. Allen, 45 cts.; R. L. Houghton, 50 cts.; L. T. Womack, 15 cts.; G. B. 15 cts.; J. F. Ford, 25 cts.; Chas. H. White, 25 cts.; N. F. Thornton, 50 cts.; L. O. Baes, 25 cts.; Francis A. Rose, 25 cts.; W. H. Prentice, 25 cts.; B. P. Horton, 25 cts.; S. Newell Hamilton, 25 cts.; Wm. W. Scott, 25 cts.; D. B. Norton, 25 cts.; P. W. Fuller, 50 cts.; Jno. F. Chandler, 25 cts.; Joseph Shuler, 50 cts.; D. K. Jones, 50 cts.; W. H. Lyon, 25 cts.; Geo. W. Jones, 10 cts.; Jno. C. Ochiltree, 50 cts.; H. S. Ranyan, 25 cts.; G. W. Mend, 50 cts.; Dr. Oliver, 10 cts.; Dr. G. A. Bartol, 25 cts.; H. D. Wertz, 50 cts.; D. G. Francis, 25 cts.; Richard M. Lucas, 50 cts.; Thos. Davis, 25 cts.; W. F. Jamieson, 25 cts.; D. Keimer, 50 cts.; B. F. Horton, 25 cts.; T. G. Hovey, 25 cts.; Rev. F. M. Holland, 25 cts.; J. M. Blakesley, 25 cts.; Dr. J. C. Fischer, 25 cts.; M. E. Taylor, 25 cts.; C. C. Slocum, 25 cts.; Rev. W. C. Gannett, 25 cts.; Harrison Wood, 25 cts.; W. C. Rust, Jr., 25 cts.; G. W. Rice, 25 cts.; G. B. Darrow, 25 cts.; C. P. Burghardt, 25 cts.; J. T. Blakeney, 25 cts.; Geo. A. Newman, 25 cts.; T. M. Lamb, 25 cts.; H. S. Crosby, 10 cts.; J. A. Treat, 70 cts.; Henry K. Oliver, 25 cts.; Jonathan Hestland, 50 cts.; Frank S. Billings, 50 cts.; J. J. Elebas, 10 cts.; J. W. Graham, 50 cts.; C. C. Glogston, 25 cts.; Geo. Reidler, 15 cts.; Milan Bentley, 25 cts.; E. M. Tate, 25 cts.; Mrs. Theodora B. Shepherd, 25 cts.; C. B. Darrow, 25 cts.; W. G. Wilkinson, 25 cts.; E. Hannum, 50 cts.; G. O. B. Gill, 50 cts.; M. H. Conaway, 25 cts.; Geo. Chamberlin, 25 cts.; Chas. A. Miller, 15 cts.; R. Ashley, 25 cts.; Dr. F. Goodyear, 25 cts.; M. E. Taylor, 25 cts.; Parker Pillsbury, 25 cts.; C. B. Holloway, 25 cts.; N. S. Townshend, 25 cts.; Ada G. Chapin, 10 cts.; J. H. Bowditch, 50 cts.; H. L. Green, 15 cts.; Wm. Dudgeon, 50 cts.; Ephraim Rulor, 10 cts.; A. J. Grover, 25 cts.; Wm. Ingram, 25 cts.; Wm. Peter, 25 cts.; Jas. Hamilton, 10 cts.; R. H. Royce, 50 cts.; H. L. Green, 50 cts.; J. F. Woodard, 25 cts.; R. H. Ramsey, 15 cts.; C. C. Slocum, 50 cts.; C. T. Fowler, 25 cts.; J. W. Bigelow, 25 cts.; Wm. Orest, 25 cts.; Dr. H. K. Price, 25 cts.; G. Clark, 15 cts.; F. M. Tate, 25 cts.; J. W. Sunderlin, 50 cts.; H. L. Sweet, 15 cts.; Rev. J. M. Barnes, 25 cts.; W. F. Freeman, 25 cts.; H. Moore, 25 cts.; Wm. H. Downes, 25 cts.; James Whittier, 50 cts.; D. W. Northup, 50 cts.; W. R. Thompson, 10 cts.; J. F. Robinson, 50 cts.; L. A. Foster, 10 cts.; J. M. Cobb, 25 cts.; Thos. Evans, 25 cts.; Benj. Rodman, 25 cts.; E. R. Leland, 25 cts.; James MacAllister, 25 cts.; G. M. Lawlor, 25 cts.; H. C. Spencer, 25 cts.; Wm. Becker, 25 cts.; H. Friend, 25 cts.; Wm. Ellis, 25 cts.; Mrs. G. D. Norris, 25 cts.; N. Van Kirk, 25 cts.; Daniel Andrews, 25 cts.; Goldsmith & Co., 25 cts.; James Douglas, 25 cts.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

Poetry.

THE HINDU SCRIPTIO.

"I think till I weary with thinking,"
Said the sad-eyed Hindu king;
"And I see but shadows around me, Illusion in every thing."

"How knowest thou aught of God,
Of his favor or his wrath?
Can the little fish tell what the eagle thinks,
Or map out the eagle's path?"

"Can the finite the infinite search?
Did the blind discover the stars?
Is the thought that I think a thought,
Or a throb of the brain in its bars?"

"For aught my eye can discover,
Your God is what you think good—
Yourself flashed back from the glass
When the light pours on it in flood."

"You preach to me to be just;
And this is his realm, you say;
And the good are dying of hunger,
And the bad gorge every day."

"You say that be loveth mercy,
And the famine is not yet gone;
That he hateth the shedder of blood,
And he slayeth us every one."

"You say that my soul shall live,
That the spirit can never die—
If he were content when I was not,
Why not when I have passed by?"

"You say I must have a meaning—
So must dirt, and its meaning is flowers;
What if our souls are but nature
For lives that are greater than ours?"

"When the fish swims out of the water,
When the bird soars out of the blue,
Man's thought may transcend man's knowledge,
And your God be no reflex of you."

—From the London Spectator.

The Index.

APRIL 20, 1872.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

CAPITAL, $100,000.

SHARES EACH, $100.

The Association having assumed the publication of THE INDEX, the Directors have levied an assessment of ten per cent. on each share for the year ending Oct. 31, 1872. All future subscriptions are subject to this assessment. Not more than ten per cent. on each share can be assessed in any one year. By the original terms of subscription, the Directors are forbidden to incur any indebtedness beyond ten per cent. of the stock actually subscribed; and this provision will be strictly complied with. It is very desirable that the entire stock of the Association should be taken, and subscriptions are respectfully solicited from all friends of Free Religion.

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

ACKNOWLEDGED elsewhere, Five Hundred Shares, $50,000
THOMAS MUMFORD, New Harmony, Ind.,	One Share,	100
D. AYRES, JR., Brooklyn, N. Y.,	"	100
MRS L. E. BLOWN, Evansville, Ind.,	"	100
—, Defiance, Ohio,	"	100
—, Bryan, Ohio,	"	100
J. T. BRADY, Sabetha, Kan.,	"	100
—, Northampton, Mass.,	"	100
MAX FRACHT, Cincinnati, Ohio,	"	100
O—, Boston, Mass.,	"	100
H. HYTERMAN, Toledo, Ohio,	"	100
C. FOLSON, Zanesfield, Ohio,	"	100
S. C. EASTMAN, Palmyra, Mo.,	"	100
J. O. MARTIN, Indianapolis, Ind.,	"	100
L. T. IVES, Detroit, Mich.,	"	100
E. W. MEDDAUGH, Detroit, Mich.,	Two	200
A. FOLSON, Boston, Mass.,	"	100
W. F. HEIKES, Dayton, Ohio,	"	100
Hiram W. Coit, Sup't's Bridge, N. Y.,	One	100
RAMUEL COIT, Sup't's Bridge, N. Y.,	"	100
CHARLES NASH, Worcester, Mass.,	Two	200
—, Livonia, N. Y.,	One	100
S. F. WOODARD, Osborn, Ohio,	Two	200
H. A. MYLES, Mt. Carroll, Ill.,	One	100
J. W. BARTLETT, Dover, N. H.,	"	100
OSCAR ROSS, Taylor's Falls, Minn.,	"	100
MRS E. S. MILLER, Geneva, N. Y.,	"	100
JAS. R. STONE, Cincinnati, Ohio,	"	100
D. K. INNES, " " " " " "	Five	500
A. TAFT, " " " " " "	One	100
S. L. WILDER, " " " " " "	"	100
PETER H. CLARK, " " " " " "	"	100
G. K. WASHINGTON, " " " " " "	"	100
J. T. SUTTON, " " " " " "	"	100
WALT F. AUSTIN, Pittsburgh, Pa.,	"	100
MRS C. E. NOURSE, Cincinnati, Ohio,	Two	200
JAS. FISCHER, Shreveport, La.,	One	100
G. H. HOLTZMAN, Pittsburgh, Pa.,	"	100
L. VON BLESINGHOE, N. Y. City,	Five	500
W. H. BOUGHTON, " " " " " "	One	100
W. P. CHAMBERS, " " " " " "	"	100
TITUS L. BROWN, Binghamton, N. Y.,	"	100
A. McD. YOUNG, Milwaukee, Wis.,	"	100
G. W. PECKHAM, " " " " " "	"	100
C. T. HAWLEY, " " " " " "	"	100
WM. BECKER, " " " " " "	"	100
MRS G. D. NORRIS, " " " " " "	Five	500
W. H. SHERMAN, " " " " " "	One	100
ROBT. C. SPENCER, " " " " " "	"	100
C. M. LAWLER, " " " " " "	"	100
E. R. LELAND, " " " " " "	"	100

$56,800

On our first page is published this week the third of the seven manuscript sermons contributed to THE INDEX by the Rev. Charles Voysey, of London, on the general question—"What think ye of Christ?" The first sermon of this series was printed in our issue of January 27; the second in that of February 3; and (owing to an accidental disarrangement of the manuscripts) the fifth in that of March 23. The fourth, sixth, and seventh will be published hereafter.

ARGUMENT AND DENUNCIATION.

Usually it is held to be the sign either of a bad cause or a feeble mind to have recourse in a discussion to personal denunciation instead of courteous argument. But this, it seems, is a mistake. It now turns out that denunciation is the only expedient, safe, or high-minded course to adopt.

In another column a moral lecture is administered to the editor of THE INDEX by Mr. J. M. McKim, of the New York Nation, for criticising Mrs. Woodhull's social theories without impugning her personal character. The lecture is well written. Its language is well chosen; its style is unexceptionable; its forms of expression are meant to be respectful. But, when closely examined, the moral position it assumes is as indefensible as that of Mrs. Woodhull herself. We propose to give a little attention to this extraordinary production.

"With apologists for lewd freedom," says Mr. McKim, "I have no controversy; my concern is with those who apologize for the apologists." And he then proceeds to deal with us as belonging to the class of persons thus designated. He reprimands us in the tone of a superior for admitting sincerity and conscientiousness in one whose theory we explicitly disowned, and presumes to characterize this admission as an "apology" for "apologists for lewd freedom."

We credit Mr. McKim with entire unconsciousness of the deep disrespect which his words express. We make allowance for him precisely as we made allowance for Mrs. Woodhull. But we shall not allow him unreprieved to assume to address us as from a superior moral plane. Towards misguided enthusiasm for liberty, no matter how offensive the shape it wears, we will exercise forbearance to any extent; but towards self-righteousness and pharisaism we have none to exercise. Let self-appointed censors once for all understand that, when they speak upon the free platform of THE INDEX and presume to address those they find there in any other tone than that of recognized equality, they will be at once called to order as violators of decorum and the common courtesies of debate.

This premised, we proceed to the consideration of the subject before us.

The burden of the complaint made against THE INDEX is that it published Mrs. Woodhull's letter without an "adequate corrective," and thereby "gave scope to its doctrine and away to its evil influences." Mr. McKim considers that our reply left her theory "unrefuted." He is, of course, at perfect liberty to entertain this opinion; and if he imagines he can refute the refutation, we will give him any reasonable amount of space in our columns for that purpose. Meanwhile, when we inquire for the particular inadequacy which has given rise to this opinion, we find it in the alleged fact that we "bore testimony to the personal purity and conscientiousness" of Mrs. Woodhull, though "knowing nothing of her personally," and thereby "added to the power for evil of the plea by increasing the prestige of the pleader." Lastly, the "adequate corrective" would have been supplied, if we had refrained from the absurd attempt to "separate the doctrine from its advocate," and had given vent to the holy wrath against Mrs. Woodhull's personal character which ought to have filled the editorial mind. This is the complaint. Is it just?

1. Mr. McKim twists our disclaimer of "personal knowledge" of Mrs. Woodhull into a confession of complete ignorance concerning her, and insinuates that, having no better basis than pure hypothesis for what we said of her, our tribute to her character was the result of a desire to "apologize for the apologists of lewd freedom."

This is reprehensible. We know nothing personally of Mrs. Woodhull, having never met or even seen her; but we know some persons who have met her, all of whom have expressed a respectful opinion of her private character. This is enough to warrant all that we said; and Mr. McKim plays the part of a mere special pleader in evading this self-evident explanation of our words. It may suit his sense of justice to judge of the character of other people purely a priori; but it does not suit ours. We judge by direct evidence, or not at all.

2. We bore no "testimony" whatever to Mrs. Woodhull's character, having none to bear; we merely expressed our opinion for what it was worth. But, having also no testimony to bear against it, we refrained from the gross injustice of which Mr. McKim would have had us guilty, namely, the inference of personal character from theoretical opinion. This is the old vice of Christianity which has cursed the world till it groans aloud under the curse. We will have none of it.

3. But we have "increased the power for evil of the plea by increasing the prestige of the pleader." It is none of our business what "power" or "prestige" we increase by telling the truth. He who fancies that the world's virtue depends on the suppression or misstatement of his honest thought is ripe for almost any crime in the name of morality. We meant to be simply just to Mrs. Woodhull; and if doing justice brings the social fabric down in ruins, let the crazy old concern tumble as soon as it pleases. It is time for a better.

4. Stripping off all circumlocution and ambiguity, Mr. McKim's position is essentially this:

It is right to publish such a letter as Mrs. Woodhull's, if accompanied by an "adequate corrective."

It being "a very difficult task" to "separate a doctrine from its advocate," logical argument is not an "adequate corrective," however forcible it may be, because that is "a game at which two can play."

Therefore the "adequate corrective" of a mischievous "doctrine" must be denunciation of its "advocate,"—in a word, personal abuse.

If there is any pith or point to Mr. McKim's article, it is that, and nothing else. He does not ask whether the favorable opinion we expressed of Mrs. Woodhull's private character is in fact true or false; in either case he complains of our expressing it. One would naturally think that the truth or falsehood of the opinion to be the previous question: not so Mr. McKim, who has nothing to say on that point.

The doctrine and the advocate are practically one, he argues; the doctrine is bad; therefore—he does not say plainly that the advocate is bad too, but—the doctrine is unrefuted if the advocate's character is praised. He gives premises, and only insinuates the pharisaic conclusion. He does not say explicitly—"Denounce her!" but that is what his reasoning directly leads to. If "holding her to logic" is a failure, what is left but denunciation? Mr. McKim deprecates the former as useless; and guarded as is his language, it is utterly meaningless if he does not recommend the latter.

We object to this style of argument altogether, as at once tortuous, pusillanimous and weak. Mrs. Woodhull is voluntarily before the public; and if Mr. McKim knows her to be a bad woman, he is bound by his own principles to come forward in manly fashion, and, for the sake of the social morality for which he professes such concern, unflinchingly give his testimony. His own argument forbids such shooting round a corner as that in which he indulges. If he thinks the bad doctrine and the bad advocate ought to be attacked together, why does he not attack them together? He is frank enough about the one; why does he stultify himself by not being equally frank about the other? If we cannot hold Mrs. Woodhull "strictly to logic," we can at least hold Mr. McKim to it. He blames us for not doing what he leaves undone himself. When he obeys own prescription, it will be time enough to rebuke us for disobeying it. The simple difference between us is this: we think Mrs. Woodhull personally a respectable woman, and have dared to say so—he thinks her not a respectable woman, and has not dared to say so.

So far as the free-love theory itself is concerned, the question of Mrs. Woodhull's character is of no more relevancy than the old scholastic problem—"How many thousands of angels can dance on the point of a cambric needle?" Mr. McKim might overwhelm her with proofs of her iniquity, but her theory would be untouched. He might refute her, but her theory would still remain to be refuted. This theory has got to be tested by thought alone; and all the odium in the world poured on one poor creature's head would not move the scales of reason a hair's breadth. On the contrary, the more bitter and wrathful is the condemnation hurled at her, the more will multitudes flock to her side in sympathy and pity; and the more will "respectable supporters" be found to protest against the bigotry which seeks to crucify a woman in order to cover up its own poverty of intellect. One never denounces an opponent whom he can out-argue. The world knows that well enough; and it always takes abuse as confession of defeat. None but the feeble-minded ever seeks to overthrow a theory by imputing evil character to the theorizer. As partly appears on a previous page, we have experienced too much of Mr. McKim's policy from our own opponents to hold it in high esteem. If we are justified in denouncing Mrs. Woodhull for promulgating a theory we detest, the Christians who denounce us for promulgating a theory they detest are equally justifiable. No—her character has nothing to do with the truth or falsehood of her theory. Both character and theory must be judged on their respective merits or demerits alone.

"Why did you, then, go out of your way to speak of her character at all?"

Because we do most cordially hate and despise the spirit which condemns Mrs. Woodhull, simply because her theory deserves to be condemned. We will go a long distance out of our way, at any time, to rectify a wrong if we can; and we know no wrong greater than that which condemns man or woman for mere opinion's sake. If one is denounced for what he has done, we have nothing to say except—prove the fact! But if one is denounced simply for what he thinks or says, then it is time to assert the right of free thought and free speech, and eternally to smite the denouncing mouth. Denounce the thought or the word as much as you please; but if you denounce the thinker because of his honest thought or the speaker because of his honest word, you are a tyrant to the extent of your power—all the worse if you quote morality and religion to justify your tyranny. When we see any one persecuted or slandered simply because of his thought or speech, and we have occasion to refer to him in any way, we count it a digression well worth making to say what honest thing we can in his praise. That was why we spoke irrelevantly, but not "gratuitously," of Mrs. Woodhull's character: we willingly went out of our way that we might separate ourselves from the clamor of mere prejudice, and take our stand with the few who listen with reason's ear alone to what reason has to utter. Of Mrs. Woodhull we cannot speak on personal knowledge; but no matter how distasteful or unsavory the associations, we stand with every one who pleads for the right to be heard, and the right of his utterances to be judged on their intrinsic merits. To "separate the doctrine from the advocate" is the only way to be just either; and he who cannot or will not practise it cannot or will not be just. As a matter of policy, surely, Mr. McKim's method is sure to give the "power and prestige" of martyrdom to the advocate of a bad doctrine; the method we adopt on principle stops all clamor about "martyrdom," and compels attention to the main issue. Whether Mrs. Woodhull is Phryne or a Madonna is of no consequence in a discussion of her theory. Show the theory to be false, and you have proved it to be injurious; turn from the theory to denounce the theorizer, and no if you succeed in overwhelming both with abuse, you have won the victory by a cruel, false, wicked trick, which will yet return to plague its inventor.

Mr. McKim recommends a method of controversy which is essentially immoral; we recommend a method which we believe to be the only just and honest one. Let the public decide which is in the right.

MORE PETITIONS.

The following additional lists of names to the resistance against the theological amendment to United States Constitution have been received since our last issue:—

Mr. Anson F. Dibble, Porter Township, Mich., one hundred and twenty-four names; Mr. C. W. Re, Philadelphia, Pa., seventy; Mr. B. Cobb, Jr., Boston, Mass., forty-one; Mr. M. H. Conaway, Archer, N. Y., twenty; Mrs. Rachel Cosad, Junius, N. Y., eighteen; J. M. Barnes, Shawaville, Va., thirty-three; J. F. Woodard, Spring, Pa., thirty-eight; Mr. E. Fisher, Glen Arbor, Mich., twenty-three; Harrison Wood, Holland, O., twenty-seven; Mr. Hannum, Southampton, Mass., seventy-one; Elizabeth M. F. Denton, Wellesley, Mass., three; J. A. Day, Castana, Iowa, twenty-seven; Mr. Einstein, Titusville, Pa., eighty-six; Mr. Peter, Milwaukee, Wis., seventy-one; Mr. Elijah Perry, Salem, O., ninety-two; Mr. Samuel Keese, Neck, Long Island, N. Y., one hundred and eighty. Boston Zion's Herald for April 11 has the following paragraphs, which we leave to speak for themselves without comment:—

The following call has been issued for a public meeting to be held in Tremont Temple, Sabbath evening next, April 14, at 7½ o'clock:—

"Vital questions now up for settlement among us demonstrate the importance of the efforts which are being made to secure the religious amendment of the Constitution of the United States. Repeated and determined assaults have been made in many places on the Bible in the public schools. Renewed assaults will soon have to be met. Attempts are frequent and often successful at breaking down the safeguards of the Sabbath. Other Christian features of our government are assailed. The Constitution is loudly claimed by the assailants to be on their side. They demand that the Bible shall be removed from the schools to bring them into harmony with the Constitution. This demand has awakened multitudes of our citizens to the necessity of explicit acknowledgment of God and the Christian religion in the National Constitution, that we may have an unquestionable legal basis for Christian education in our public schools, and for every other Christian feature of our national life."

Prof. J. H. Seelye, of Amherst, and D. McAllister, General Secretary of the National Association, will address the meeting.

A large number of leading citizens of all denominations, including such men as Messrs. Charles G. Nazro, E. S. Rand, James R. Osgood, Bishop Eastburn, Drs. Webb, Vinton, Miner, unite in the call for the meeting."

"CHRIST IN THE CONSTITUTION.—This movement makes progress, notwithstanding a Massachusetts and Connecticut governor, each having once authorized the use of his name in its approval, afterwards withdrew the valuable gift. A meeting was held in this city endorsing it, and Dr. Miner and Prof. Seelye are to speak in behalf of it, on the 14th, in Tremont Temple. The infidel INDEX raves against it, and tries to scare its half a hundred readers with declarations—'Liberty is not safe under the same roof nor on the same continent with ignorance,' and that this ignorance is so great in the Church that 'religious liberty exists by sufferance alone.' So if the amendment is adopted, we shall probably, on this statement, get this spurious liberty out of this continent. If so, the sooner it comes the better. It is time America acknowledged the King of nations and the Constitution of nations, Christ and the Bible, in its Constitution. Let the scoffer of Christ, who has fancied that he was going to infidelize America, learn that he thus all the quicker Christianizes it."

A NEW DEFINITION.

The latest version known to us of the Unitarian creed—it came to our notice but a day or two since—substitutes for the old article, "Faith in Christ," a new one, "Discipleship to Christ." At first glance, the substitution seems fortunate, as taking the matter in question out of the theological sphere, avoiding all discussion of the Christ's superhuman or transcendental nature and fixing attention on his rational and spiritual significance. It looks like a new statement; but alas! it is only the old one in a new guise. To sit at the feet of Jesus and be his disciple is not, after all, even to the willing spirit, as easy as it appears to be. "The Church of the Disciples" is as mysterious a title as "the Church of the Messiah"—or "the Church of the Savior." To be a disciple one must be sure that the master has a definite doctrine to teach and a supreme authority to teach it, and such assurance faith alone can give. The debate on the precise truths that Jesus taught is as close and stubborn and interminable as the debate on the rank he held in the universe.

To begin with, the authenticity of the gospels must be assumed, the fulness and sufficiency of their report of Jesus' words, their interior consistency and their harmony with one another; then the harmony must be exhibited, the consistency established, and the one doctrine drawn out in strong lines—a task not only of immense difficulty but of hopeless undertaking. It never could be accomplished when the genuineness of the New Testament writings was unquestioned, their inspiration taken for granted, their unanimity of sentiment accepted as a first principle of reasoning, their completeness of statement conceded to be all that a scientific mind could ask. In these days of criticism, when every one of these points is abandoned by men who are entitled to pass judgment, and when the most important of them are held doubtfully even by conservative students, none but the audacious thinkers of constructing a scheme of doctrine from the New Testament to which every chapter or even every book will give assent. Liberal Christians have pretty much abandoned the attempt to reconcile the Bible thoughts with each other in such a way that their sense shall be evidently sympathetic. It is not difficult to fasten a meaning to some portion of the New Testament, passing other portions by, and to call that the gospel; it is not difficult to hold scattered fragments of doctrine without taking the trouble to weld them into a whole; it is not difficult to generalize, to cover up weak points, to put awkward passages out of sight, to read meaning into texts; but to construct a consistent doctrine from the authentic portions of the New Testament is for intelligent criticism a task too arduous.

But suppose it accomplished—another task remains, to establish the authority of the teacher. The disciple must be docile, and to be docile he must believe the teacher to be infallible; and here again faith has a conspicuous part to play. Inquiry breaks the spell of trust. The credentials, where are they? Now that miracle is laid aside as proof of doctrine, nothing remains but the miracle of character. But a character so holy that its thoughts are unerring is already outside the sphere of simple humanity. The teacher whose sole credentials of infallible authority are his virtues is superhuman, for no human virtue will sustain the cross-questioning of thoughtful minds. But a world-saint is no more credible or conceivable than a world-savior. The ancient questioning will arise concerning his nature, his descent, his origin, the source of his endowment. The infallible teacher is as incomprehensible as the all-sufficient redeemer; the perfect character is as unimaginable as the perfect intelligence; we are simply thrown back where we were before; the new definition does not aid us at all; it only reminds us to our theological books which we hoped we had laid by.

The truth is that, the instant we interrogate Jesus, we cease to sit at his feet; the instant we ask, whither goest thou? we cease to follow him. The attitude of the disciple is impossible for him who questions the validity of the text-book. At that moment reason is born, and reason sits at no feet but those of truth; nay, at those she sits not, for they never permit her to rest.

The author of the definition we have been criticizing speaks of Theodore Parker as being a disciple with Channing. Channing called himself a disciple, having first determined what the master ought to teach; he erected the doctrine and then became pupil to it; first chose the lord and then made himself subject. Theodore Parker was caught by no such illusion; he never avowed himself a disciple. The spiritual debt he owed to Jesus was cordially acknowledged, but the best gift he thanked him for was that of moral independence, of soul freedom; the lesson he learned from the "master" was that he should call no man master; should sit at no feet, but stand on his own; should follow no individual, but the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world. He would not install his own master and then go through the form of sitting at his feet; as little was he capable of professing himself disciple of a doctrine that could not be discovered.

O. B. F.

HOME MISSIONARY WORK.

The admirably clear and interesting sketch of Buddha given by Mr. T. W. Higginson in the course of Free Religious Lectures at Boston, and reported in THE INDEX, is another contribution to the great work which is in progress, of familiarizing the mind of the people with foreign modes of thought and faith. Mr. Higginson's rare power of popularizing his subject did admirable service here. For a long time the study of these Eastern religions has been the employment of sansars, but it had no influence upon popular thought. Now, however, the faithful work done in the darkness so long has risen to the surface, and is showing green and fair and beautiful to us all. And the result of this study is ready just in time to meet the political and social changes which are beginning to unite us with these Eastern lands. It is a practical question now how to live in harmony with the Chinese and the Japanese; and the Mohammedan and Buddhist can claim protection from our laws as well as the Jew and the Christian. A basis of respect for each other's religious convictions is very important to the preservation of good understanding, and if we can learn this perfection of tolerance from the Buddhist, we shall do well.

But in order to gain full benefit from the study of other religions, one condition is absolutely essential. We must, for the time being at least, lay aside the assumption of superiority for the faith in which we have been born. Carlyle says (I quote from memory): "The only true method of translation is to go over to the habits of thought and feeling of the writer you would render, not to attempt to bring him into yours." Mr. J. F. Clarke has done great service by his book on the "Ten Great Religions," and perhaps it will be more immediately and generally read because of its constant reference to, and glorification of, Christianity; but that avowed purpose has taken the aroma out of his presentation of the doctrines of which he speaks. Go from the perusal of a Buddhist book (take for instance one of the latest published, Beal's "Catena of Buddhist Scriptures") to his chapter on Buddhism, and you do not accept the latter as giving you the life and spirit of the former. One cannot believe that any sincere and enlightened Buddhist would recognize his view of Buddhism.

Of course Mr. Clarke has a right to criticize Buddhism from his own Christian stand-point, and the criticism and the comparison have their value; but it seems to me, one must first get at the spirit and life by sympathy. The perception of the relation of Buddhism, thus studied, to Christianity viewed in the same spirit, that is, regarding both sympathetically, accepting the best of each as the truest, is one of the most delightful mental experiences. Human nature seems to round itself into a symmetric and beautiful unity, as we catch the same tones of Love and Penitence which have been the key notes of religious music in the West, sounding in this Eastern strain. The superficial peculiarities do not so much impress us as the great underlying identity; and we feel all that is precious and eternal in our own form of religion the more when we find the same phases of thought and feeling under these differing manifestations.

This enlarged study seems at once to liberate and intensify the intellectual faculties, as foreign travel does the affections. Every gain of new knowledge of humanity makes us love and appreciate home the better, since it is no longer a confined and narrow spot, but one which we have found related to the whole world. We hope the work of popularizing these interesting studies will go on. It is not to be done for linguists and philosophers, but for those who will never read a book but in their own language—for the shoemaker who works side by side with the Chinaman at the bench, for the Californian who will throw his vote in regard to the naturalization of the Chinese at the next election, for the school boy who finds a Japanese at the same school, for the missionary who is preparing to go to India to convert the ignorant heathen! Instead of an abstract question for scholars, it is a practical one for every-day life.

E. D. C.

BUDDHIST MORNING HYMN.

On first awaking from my sleep,
I ought to pray that every breathing thing
May wake to saving wisdom, vast
As the wide and boundless Universe.

THE MATERIALIST'S GRAVE.

A brief address, made at the funeral of Mr. Joseph E. Marx, in Forest Cemetery, Toledo, on the fourth of April, is here written down from memory, at the request of his brother, Mr. Guido Marx. The report is of course imperfect, but contains the leading thoughts that were expressed at the time. Mr. Marx was editor of the Toledo Express, president of the Toledo Turnverein, and in various other ways identified with the liberal cause in this city.

MY FRIENDS.—We have met together this bright, cold April day to pay the last tribute of honor, affection and esteem which human friendship can ever render. It is little, sadly little, that friendship can do at such an hour; but we would not leave that little undone. I believe I utter the unspoken feeling of every one here present, when I tender to these sorrow-stricken relatives of the departed—to widowed wife and orphaned children and bereaved brother—the most utterly sincere and heart-felt sympathy. Their grief is also ours. We had all learned to honor the high virtues and noble character of him whom we now lay here for his long sleep in the peaceful grave; and it is with deep pain that we now pronounce the last farewell.

In his home, no man was ever more tender, affectionate, unselfish, devoted. In all his business dealings, he was thoroughly upright and honorable, a man of incorruptible integrity. As a citizen, he was public-spirited and faithful even to a fault, neglecting his own affairs out of regard for public interests, and giving without stint of his time, his energy, his money, in the service of his fellow-men. As a thinker, he was bold, strong, and free. His mind was wholly unfettered by the bondage of superstition. He dared to think for himself; and his thought was as vigorous and clear as it was untrammelled. His influence was powerfully felt in the community, because his tongue and pen were as free as his mind, and because his moral courage and self-sacrifice prompted him on all occasions to use them in the service of liberal principles and great ideas. It is for this reason, friends, that we all have in his death the consciousness of a great public loss. He was a man who did what he could to better the condition of his race, and all who knew his rare worth will gratefully cherish his memory and example in their hearts.

The Christian Church, you know, holds out a high reward for well-doing, and honors all those who do their duty out of hopes to win this reward in another life. But our noble friend was a materialist, and looked for no life to follow this. What he was and did, he was and did out of pure loyalty to the right. For myself, I do not share his belief. I know nothing whatever of the veiled future, and I believe that no man here knows any more concerning it. But if I honor those who do well out of hopes for a future heaven, I have no words to express my reverence for him who, discarding all such hopes and looking only for extinction in the grave, lives nobly because he loves the right and disdains, like our friend whom now we mourn, to tarnish his self-respect while life shall last. Surely such a man as this is by far the more disinterested and heroic; and I yield him such admiration and love as only heroism can command.

I am glad to have taken his honest hand in mine; I am glad to have looked in his kindly, honest face, and known what a man he was. His memory and example, at least, remain to stimulate us all to nobler life. As when in battle a soldier falls, and his sorrowing comrades close up the ranks to win the victory for which such costly price is paid, let us drop a tear on the grave of our dead friend, and carry on the work which was so dear to him. The great cause of liberty and truth for which he toiled demands our toil as well; and we shall best remember him by drawing from his too brief career a fresh devotion to his cause, which has outlasted him and will outlast us all.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

THE CRANIAL AFFINITIES OF MAN AND THE APE (Lee & Shepard, Boston) is the second number of "Half-Hour Recreations in Popular Science," issued monthly by the publishers and paged continuously to form yearly volumes of twelve parts. "The series will be composed of familiar lectures, essays, and other papers on subjects intimately connected with the mental and moral growth of mankind." Only articles of standard value will be included, from such authors as Tyndall, Proctor, Mill, Spencer, Lecky, Darwin, &c. Tinted paper of fine quality, excellent typography, and good wood-cuts, are among the attractions of this series. The present paper is by Prof. Virchow, of Berlin, author of the well-known "Cellular Pathology." Man is not the descendant of any known species of monkey or ape (p. 40); and it should be observed, by the way, that the development theory does not demand such a descent, but regards monkeys and men as descendants of some common ancestor unlike both in many respects. The resemblance of the baby monkey, however, to the human baby, is much greater than that of old monkeys to perfect, full-grown men; and, as it develops, the skull of even the most anthropoidal ape grows more dissimilar to the human cranium (p. 41). The development of the two species is not in the same direction. Of all the parts of the ape's head, it is the brain that grows least; and by progressive development an ape can never become a man (p. 43). Prof. Virchow seems not fully acquainted with the latest forms of the descent-theory; which is not surprising, considering that Mr. Darwin's "Descent of Man" was published subsequently to the paper here translated.—Price 25 cents; the twelve parts for the year, $2.50. For sale by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

ON HEROES, HERO-WORSHIP, AND THE HEROIC IN HISTORY (Scribner, Welford & Co.). There is no more attractive edition of Carlyle's works than this of Scribner's (English print). It is a marvel how it can be sold so cheaply. We have scarcely impertinence enough to attempt in these hurried notices a criticism of a book so world-famous as this one of Carlyle's. No one knows the age who is ignorant of it. Yet, remembering that Carlyle was in the front rank of religious thinkers thirty years ago, we see, in the midst of our admiration of the magnificence of his insight in so many directions, that the world indeed moves—that advance is ever possible. This perception is forced upon us when we read his comments on Benthamism (p. 160):—

"That all Godhood should vanish out of man's conception of this universe seems to me precisely the most brutal error,—I will not disparage Heathenism by calling it a Heathen error,—that men could fall into. It is not true; it is false at the very heart of it. A man who thinks so will think wrong about all things in the world; this original sin will vitiate all other conclusions he can form. . . . Whatsoever is noble, divine, inspired, drops thereby out of life. There remains everywhere in life a despicable caput-mortuum; the mechanical hull, all soul fled out of it. How can a man act heroically? The 'Doctrine of Motives' will teach him that it is, under more or less disguise, nothing but a wretched love of Pleasure, fear of Pain; that Hunger, of applause, of cash, of whatsoever victual it may be, is the ultimate fact of man's life. Atheism, in brief,—which does indeed frightfully punish itself. The man, I say, is become spiritually a paralytic man; this godlike universe a dead mechanical steam-engine, all working by motives, checks, balances, and I know not what; where, in, as in the detestable belly of some Phalaris-Bull of his own contriving, he the poor Phalaris sits miserably dying!"

A splendid passage, truly, lucent with the wonderful genius of the man, yet streaked all through with dark lines of prejudice! We have no greater love of atheism than he; more and more does belief in the Divine master our thought, and give beauty, dignity and hope to this inscrutable life of man. But if our religion enjoins on us one duty more sacred than another, it is that we shall recognize and reverence the Divine wherever it exists, and most of all in human worth. That one should shut his eyes to the moral grandeur of him who believes in no God and yet lives as if he believed in nothing else; that one should thus suffer differences of thought to destroy appreciation of a resplendent moral fact, and let his mental narrowness congeal his better sympathies,—this is in our view the true blasphemy, the only unpardonable sin. "How can a man act heroically?" That is not the question, but—does he? The religion that hinders the honoring of what is honor-worthy in men by erecting a fixed belief of whatever sort as the criterion of character is a stench upon the earth, a nuisance to be abated by any summary process. We insist that this bugbear of atheism shall no longer frighten us from justice. We insist that the atheist shall not be hooted at as a cripple or paralytic, and voted out of his sanity by a conclave of doctrinaires. Action, not opinion, is the test of manhood; and the atheist who lives a heroic life shall overset all religion that cannot make itself big enough to embrace all heroism with joy.—Price ninety cents. For sale by H. S. Stebbins.

THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH, OR, THE FUTURE LIFE ACCORDING TO SCIENCE (Roberts Brothers, Boston), is a conspicuous case of "science falsely so called." M. Figuier has written some works of real merit as convenient compends of other people's discoveries; but this is a master-piece of literary quackery. Not that the author is insincere; we do not mean that. But we mean that the book is a curious compound of fact, fancy, and fool-hardy assumption, put before the world in the name of science. It pretends to have solved the question of immortality; but its solution is such a hodge-podge of nonsense as to repel every trained thinker, to deepen the darkness which overhangs the future before our peering eyes, and not a little to increase the distrust felt so sadly by vast multitudes concerning the reality of any individual existence after death. It is true that we also look to the developments of science alone for such light as can be found on this great question; and it is true that all first attempts in the direction of scientific investigation of it will naturally be crude and unsatisfactory. But the spirit of true science is so alien to the rash and sensational manner in which Figuier treats his subject, that we see no real importance in his book at all, except the indirect confirmation it yields of the belief that the mind of the age turns away impatiently from the old fables of the churches, and is beginning earnestly to interrogate science for such light as it can throw on the problem. As a straw on the surface of public opinion, the book indicates the general set of the current; that is all. Such immortality as consists in getting into new bodies, floating about in space, gravitating to the sun, and so on ad nauseam, has nothing in it to charm or satisfy. Better darkness than delusive light. In no such form as this will the final answer come.

A passage in the Introduction deserves notice in connection with what we have already quoted from Carlyle:—

"It is not petroleum which set fire to the monuments of Paris; it is materialism. It is plain enough that, the moment one is convinced that all is finished on earth, that there is nothing after this life, we have only, one and all of us, to appeal to violence, to provoke disturbance and anarchy everywhere, to find in this propitious disorder the means of satisfying our brutal desires, our ambition, and our sensual passions. Civilization, society, and morals are like a string of beads, whose knot is belief in the immortality of the soul: break the knot, and the beads scatter."

It is time to affirm with deep emphasis the non-dependence of moral law on any favorite belief. Moral law is a part of the universal law of Nature, no more to be escaped, ignored, or violated with impunity than the law of gravitation. Mortal or immortal, man is a moral being, and might as well seek to shake off his relationship to the soil he treads as to the moral idea. What bigotry and insolence to charge to "materialism" the excesses of the Commune! It is a cheap trick. Christians charge responsibility for these excesses to the "infidelity" which characterizes Figuiere himself, who coolly upsets the Christian notion of heaven and hell in order to promulgate his own theory. And so it goes to the end of each chapter. Every man charges to the speculative doctrines he dislikes all the ills that flesh is heir to. Doctrines doubtless have their practical influence, sometimes a terrible influence; but the materialism Figuiere has denounced is no more responsible for the crimes of the Parisian mob than is the materialism he defends. For, strange to say, his theory is intensely materialistic, as indeed must be every theory which essays to define to the imagination the idea of future existence. There is no help for that. If we are determined to have an imaginable heaven, it must be a mere glorification of this earth, as the author of "Gates Ajar" well knew; and Figuiere's will do as well as any, if we cannot rest easy with none.—Price $1.75; sold by H. Stebbins.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errata.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

A PLEA FOR DENUNCIATION.

EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—To the discussion which has lately been going on in your columns on the proper limitations of sexual liberty, I beg to add a few words.

With apologists for lewd freedom I have no controversy; my concern is with those who apologize to the apologists.

Immorality as such has no advocates; vice needs only to be recognized to be hated. But, dressed in the robe of innocence and called by virtuous names, it tempts the weak to destruction, and by specious pretenses sometimes deceives even the elect.

False doctrines of morality, plausibly advocated and systematically spread, constitute one of the chief dangers of civilized society.

The fundamental laws of morality, written upon our heart and recognized by universal reason, forbid murder, theft, false-witness and unchastity. Any thing which to any extent annuls any of these laws, to that extent injures mankind and undermines duty.

Virtue is the only pure basis of human happiness. Chastity is the crucial test and bright consummate flower of all virtue. So emphatically is this attested that the usage of our language makes Chastity and Virtue, in the female sex, interchangeable terms.

To the question—what does the law against unchastity forbid?—the clear though not exhaustive answer is—fornication and adultery. These are terms which need no defining. Their immorality cannot be onjured away by euphemism, nor can any jugglery release them from the sentence of condemnation.

They are self-evident and axiomatic crimes, fitting of no defence and calling for no palliation.

A newspaper, especially a religious newspaper, which affords a place in its columns for a plea for unchastity, that is, for a plea for sexual license, without accompanying it by an adequate corrective, aids—unconsciously and against its will—in giving effect to the doctrine and sway to its evil influence. A newspaper gratuitously bears testimony to personal purity and honest conscientiousness of author, it adds to the power for evil of the plea increasing the prestige of the pleader.

There are some alleged pleas for sexual license, the ring of which is ambiguous; but the following is of but one construction:—"My declarations to two persons to do whatever they may agree to, in their individual spheres. They do not perceive party first to compel another party to accompany and afterwards submit to her demands. My y permits any two persons to contract sexually."

"It would be less indecent for a man to a 'respectable' Greene street institution than it is for him to contract gout." "But the society does not know of the act, are its laws then invaded?"

Each aspect of these teachings is not improved if author—garbling and misapplying Scripture, unjoining for herself a verdict of acquittal—the sanction of Christianity, thus: "I remember certain conversation recorded in a highly read book which may not be applicable to this—'And he said to the woman—where are thy sins?' Also, 'Neither do I condemn thee.'" publish an article containing these doctrines as of justice to a woman who has been assailed in purposes of refutation is to act in a paltry spirit; but to accompany the refuting argument with uncalled-for tributes to the author's purity and conscientiousness is to exceed the obligations of courtesy and to aid in the maintenance of a false position.

Yet the editor of THE INDEX, in his reply to the obnoxious article, thus speaks of its author: "Against her we have no stones to throw—a vile and mean warfare worthy only of the basest of mankind. More than that we are strongly inclined (knowing nothing of her personally) to respect her as a woman brave even to heroism in facing an adverse world, and faithful in a rare degree to the duty of uttering her convictions honestly held. We doubt not she obeys her own conscience and has a right to meet the world's gaze unflinchingly."

But we must add that our respect is based wholly on the supposition that her womanly instinct is truer than her unwomanly speech—that she is an enthusiast for an idea with which her practice is wholly inconsistent. She presents the sad spectacle of one intellectually fascinated by an ideal far below the law she lives by. Her action is higher than her thought."

That the testimony here borne to character is gratuitous, is evident from the admission by the writer that he "knows nothing personally" of the party referred to, and that what he says he says wholly on "supposition;" a supposition, by the way, which finds no support in the document under consideration, nor any countenance in facts elicited by the discussion.

It is due to the editor to say that he condemns most emphatically the sexual-license theory, and labors diligently to overthrow it; and that, if he does not fully succeed, it is owing neither to lack of ability or good will on his part. He has imposed upon himself a very difficult task. A writer who separates a doctrine from its advocate—pronouncing the advocate pure and the doctrine impure—and then proceeds to demolish the doctrine, undertakes a task in which it is hard to succeed. Not that the abstract argument is on the side of impurity; not that the interests of society do not strongly forbid sexual license; not that the moral law against lewdness does not rest on an immovable foundation; but because the field of inquiry into which this aspect of the subject opens is so boundless that the ablest casuist might chase a wily antagonist forever without catching her. It is possible that the editor of THE INDEX may accomplish this feat, but that he has not yet done so, I respectfully submit is evident from his closing argument, which thus culminates:

"The remedy is to hold her more strictly to logic and compel her to prove the principle she assumes, namely, that the sexual contract concerns only the two parties to it. She cannot prove this. The sexual contract involves the birth of new beings who are third parties most vitally affected by it."

A nimble disputant like the one THE INDEX is after is not to be caught by such a syllogism as this. Holding people "strictly to logic" is a game at which two can play. The gentle theorist here will be at no loss for a reply. If she could say to R. P. H.: "But suppose society does not know of the act, would its interests then be invaded?" she would hardly hesitate in saying to the editor of THE INDEX: "But suppose no new beings are born, where then is your third party?"

Doubtless the editor would be prepared with an answer if the question should be openly put. He might probably say: "The third party is the public, which is already suffering from the promulgation of your doctrine; the injury done to society is seen in the fact that your doctrine finds vogue; that it has plausible and indefatigable propagandists; that these propagandists have respectable supporters; and that, thus advocated and respectably supported, its sophistries make their way into the hearts of the weak and tempted and lure them to destruction."

But meanwhile, I again respectfully submit, the propagandist here stands better,—that is, less badly,—before the public, in consequence of the editor's reply than she would have done if her bald, bold letter had been allowed to refute itself by its own indecency. She now stands, quoad the reply, with her theory unrefuted and her character strongly endorsed for purity and honest conscientiousness.

Respectfully yours,

J. M. McKim.

ORANGE, N. J., April 3, 1872.

IN A BAD WAY.

PLYMOUTH, Wis., Feb. 15, 1872.

MR. ABBOT:—

I cut the following from a column of the Chicago Daily Tribune, headed "Boston News;" and I wish you or some of your readers who are familiar with Massachusetts laws and customs would inform me whether it is likely to have been true, or whether it is only intended for a hoax. Here it is:

"Dr. McDonough, who was yesterday committed to jail for refusing to kiss the book on being sworn as a witness, reversed his decision to-day, and was discharged from custody. The law, it is said, obliges witnesses to take the oath in whatever form the Court considers most binding."

I know that some forty years ago Abner Kneeland was imprisoned several months for speaking or writing disrespectfully of Jesus Christ and the Holy Virgin in this same city of Boston, State of Massachusetts; but I have seen no traces since of that ancient Christian spirit till now, and really supposed that the old Commonwealth had outgrown her theological swaddling clothes. I hope, for her own sake, that there is nothing on which to build such a paragraph as the above; for it is unpleasant to think of such men as Charles Sumner, Ralph Waldo Emerson, Wendell Phillips, and their peers, being compelled by law, whenever called upon to testify in a court of justice (better, injustice) to pollute their lips by actual contact with this idol of the Christian world!

Before I close, permit me to ask another question. Mr. Mayo, in the Cincinnati Convention, in reply to you, is represented by the public prints as saying that the Constitution of Ohio contains essentially the very clause which that Convention sought to have engrafted on the Constitution of the United States. Is that true of the Ohio Constitution?

EDW. M. MACGRAW.

[It is not true. Rev. Mr. Mayo, who was deeply interested in the Cincinnati Bible-in-schools controversy and wrote much on the subject, could not have been ignorant of the real facts in the case. The Convention aimed to incorporate into the U. S. Constitution a recognition of God, Jesus Christ, and the Bible (under the phrase—"his revealed will"); the Ohio Constitution incidentally mentions God, but not Jesus Christ or the Bible. The Convention sought in this way to make Christianity a part of the organic law of the United States; the Supreme Court of Ohio have unanimously and explicitly ruled that "neither Christianity nor any other system of religion is a part of the law of this State." [Bloom vs. Richards, 2 Ohio State Reports, 337.]—ED.]

THE BRAHMIN'S REPLY.

BOGGY DEPOT, CHOCTAW NATION,
INDIAN TERRITORY, February 18, 1872.

DEAR SIR:—

To-day I was pleased to receive a bundle of THE INDEX TRACTS.

I had first an opportunity of seeing THE INDEX in Springfield, Illinois, and immediately took a fancy to its pages, as it contained views of religion which coincided with my own, but which I had never had the pleasure of seeing placed boldly and honestly before me in the clear, vivid, and able manner of the articles in THE INDEX generally.

Circumstances prevented my getting the benefit of my subscription to the paper for several months; but I now again welcome them back as the visits of an old, respected, and trusted friend.

The liberality with which the opinions of all creeds are handled is a recommendation alone, and to me such a mode of treating these subjects develops a system of true religion consistent with the spirit of abstract Christianity, which inculcates "love to one another and doing to others as you would be done by." Practical Christianity, however much it may pretend to practise this, fails to do so, and in its various denominations shows the same weaknesses which are prevalent in secular communities.

Appropos to the dissolution of the American Missionary Society, I find in your tract on "Christian Propagandism" much that recalls to me experiences during a sojourn of several years as an officer in the English Army in India.

During that time I entered the Government Engineering College at Madras, and studied side by side with Hindu gentlemen both of the Brahmin and other castes.

To one of these Brahmin gentlemen I put the following question: "What is the reason that we, who spend so much money in sending missionaries out to India, should have such ill-success in converting you and your people to Christianity?" He said to me: "Amongst the higher and educated classes of Hindus there is no more idolatry or superstition than amongst your people of similar condition and position. We have ignorant and unlearned countrymen who do not, as we do, believe directly in the great God whom we call Brahma, who rules the universe, and whom you call God Almighty; but they worship allegorical representations of the Supreme Being solely through ignorance. We worship the true God, as you do under another name; and I have no doubt superstitions have crept into our creed as well as into yours, and it is not so pure as it was originally. The plain fact of the matter is, we do not want your Bible. Our books are quite as old, if not older, and teach us a moral law which can bear the broadest and most liberal comparison with yours. We disobey it. So do you. We should disobey yours, if we adopted it; and therefore we think we are quite as well off as you are, and do not see any advantage in your sending your missionaries at all except to get something to try to do and get paid for trying. If we are not as well off as you, hundreds of thousands of our people must be suffering in that terrible hell of yours from which your padres say there is no escape, but which, I think, is a pure invention of your people, and a belief which does not argue well for the character of your God. True it is that we have a Destroyer in our theology; but I myself think he is as great an invention with us as your hell is with you."

Such was the conversation I had with the young Brahmin, whose education was of the highest order; for he was well acquainted with English literature, and was one of the best mathematicians I ever met.

I am, dear sir, yours truly,

R. A. STUVE, C. E.,

M. K. & T. R. R.

The following is said to be the form of oath in some Western county courts: "Sommy swatheatemy you shaginkase nowtrill shabby truth nothin buttty truth seppy gob washy name."

INDEX TRACTS

No. 1.—Truths for the Times, or REPRESENTATIVE PARAS FROM THE INDEX, contains the "Fifty Affirmations" and "Modern Principles." It gives a bird-eye view of Free Religion as conceived by the Editor of THE INDEX, and states the "irrepressible conflict" between it and Christianity. Mr. CHARLES DARWIN, author of "The Origin of Species," says, in a letter to the Editor not originally intended for publication, but subsequently authorized to be used:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word." PRICE—One hundred copies for One Dollar, or a less number at the same rate, namely, One Cent a copy.

No. 2.—Fear of the Living God, an eloquent and beautiful discourse by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, exposes the debasing character of the popular notions of God, and presents concepts of him that are worthy of the nineteenth century. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 3.—Lecture on the Bible, by the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of England, who has recently been deprived of his boudoir by the ecclesiastical courts on account of his bold and outspoken heresies, is an overwhelming demonstration of the imperfections and errors of the Bible, both in the Old and the New Testaments. Passages sustaining the argument are copiously quoted, with references to chapter and verse in every instance; and no abler, fairer, or more high-toned treatise on the subject can be found in the English language. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 4.—Christian Propagandism, by F. E. ABBOT, is a complete exposure of the weakness, costliness, and inefficiency of the System of Foreign Missions. Full of Figures, Facts, and Interesting Extracts. Also, a very remarkable article by a Siamese Buddhist is appended, giving an account of a spicy conversation between himself and a missionary. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Six copies Fifty Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 5.—"God in the Constitution?" Would it be right to incorporate Religious Dogmas into the United States Constitution? By Rev. ARTHUR B. BRADFORD. A very clear, pointed, and able argument against the Proposed Theological Amendment to the United States Constitution, which ought to be circulated throughout the country. PRICE—Single Copies Ten Cents; Six Copies Fifty Cents; Twelve Copies One Dollar.

No. 6.—"The Sabbath," by PARKER PILLSBURY, is a scathing denunciation of Sabbatarian superstition. New Edition. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

No. 7.—"Compulsory Education," by F. E. ABBOT, maintains the right of every child to be educated, and the duty of the State to ensure it an education. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 8.—The Present Heaven, by O. B. FROTHINGHAM, is a singularly felicitous treatment of a subject that interests everybody. PRICE—Single copies Five Cents; Twelve copies Fifty Cents.

No. 9.—The Christian Amendment, by F. E. ABBOT, contains in full the Call for the Cincinnati Convention of the "National Reform Association," which proposes to interpolate the Evangelical Christian Creed in the U. S. Constitution,—the list of its most prominent supporters,—and a full exposure of the dangerous and revolutionary character of the movement. PRICE—Single Copies, Five Cents; Twelve Copies, Fifty Cents.

Also, The Bible Argument Against Woman Suffrage, a pungent pamphlet by A. J. GROVER, is for sale at THE INDEX Office. PRICE—Single copies Ten Cents; Twelve copies One Dollar.

Address, THE INDEX,
90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, OHIO.

SOW THE SEED!

THE "IMPEACHMENT OF CHRISTIANITY," published in the first number of the third volume of THE INDEX, has been electrotyped, and an edition of Ten Thousand Copies has been printed in the form of

A Cheap Tract for Gratuitous Distribution!

It is intended to circulate One Hundred Thousand Copies during the current year. In order to accomplish this purpose, we must rely upon the co-operation of our active sympathizers.

☞ Packages of these TRACTS, containing any desired number of copies, will be mailed to any address on receipt of enough money to defray postage, and whatever additional sums, large or small, the generosity of distributors may prompt them to add.

Of course, money will be needed to carry out our intentions; but we urge every one who believes that THIS TRACT WILL DO GOOD, and who is willing to distribute copies of it, to send in an order at once, even if unable to donate more than the simple postage and the time required for distribution. Do not hesitate because you cannot give more. We are convinced more than ever by the character and objects of the late Cincinnati Convention, that such plain speech as this TRACT contains is greatly needed at the present time. In the name of Christianity,

A most Dangerous Attempt is now Making to Subvert the Religious Liberties

of the American People; and the mighty magic of that name is still powerful over multitudes even of otherwise liberal minds. Let the world learn that the protest made against Christianity is not made by hatred of Goodness and of Truth, but rather by a love for these that can no longer be satisfied with shams. Be wofully misjudged this Tract who thinks it has no higher aim than to "make a sensation." It was meant to tell needed truth so plainly that it must be heard. And it will be heard. All we ask is—give it a chance.

☞ Address your orders to THE INDEX,
Drawer 33, Toledo, Ohio

☞ The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. ABBOT; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. ABBOT. This series contains in the aggregate two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, 90 St. Clair Street, Toledo, Ohio.

Lake Shore & Mich. Southern R. R.

1872.

ON and after Sunday, Jan. 14th, 1872, Passenger Trains will leave Toledo daily (Sundays excepted) as follows (Cleveland time):

CLEVELAND & TOLEDO DIVISION.

LEAVE TOLEDO.

8:00 A. M. Atlantic Express East, daily, arrives at Cleveland at 7:35 A. M.
6:50 A. M. Day Express will stop at Kilmore, Fremont, Clyde, Bellevue, Monroeville, Norwalk, Townsend, Wakeman, Oberlin, Elyria and Berea, arrives at Cleveland at 10:30 A. M.
10:55 A. M. Cincinnati Express, stopping at all stations, reaches Cleveland at 8:45 P. M.
6:20 P. M. Special N. Y. Express, will stop at Fremont, Clyde, Monroeville, Norwalk and Elyria, arrives at Cleveland 10:15 P. M. Sleeping cars to Buffalo and Rochester.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

10:40 and 10:55 A. M., and 7:40 and 11:00 P. M.

MICHIGAN SOUTHERN DIVISION.

TRAINS DEPART.

MAIN LINE—8:15 A. M., Mail; 11:15 A. M. Special Chicago Express; 5:35 P. M., Coldwater Accommodation; 8:00 P. M., Night Express.

AIR LINE—11:03 A. M., Accommodation; 11:30 P. M. Pacific Express.

DETROIT—6:00, 11:30 A. M., 5:30 and 8:00 P. M.

JACKSON—11:15 A. M., and 8:00 P. M.

KALAMAZOO AND GRAND RAPIDS—11:15 A. M., and 8:00 P. M.

TRAINS ARRIVE.

MAIN LINE—6:20 and 10:35 A. M., and 5:40 & 6:50 P. M.

AIR LINE—2:50 A. M., and 5:35 P. M.

DETROIT—10:40 and 12:31 A. M., and 6:05 and 9:00 P. M.

JACKSON—10:35 A. M., and 8:15 P. M.

COLDWATER ACCOMMODATION—10:35 A. M.

CHAS. F. BATES, Gen'l Supt.,

Cleveland, Ohio.

S. B. WARING, Ticket Agent, Toledo, O. [901f]

St. Louis, Quincy, Hannibal, Keokuk, Toledo, Wabash & Western R. R.

PULLMAN PALACE SLEEPING CARS!

THE Toledo, Wabash & Western Railway Co., having recently extended its line of Railway to the City of Saint Louis, will commence running all its regular passenger trains through to that city on and after the 14th day of May, 1871. The day trains will be equipped with new and elegant passenger coaches, and all night trains with the much celebrated and popular Pullman Palace Sleeping Coaches.

	Special Thro' Express.	Pacific Express.
Leave Toledo.....	11:10 A. M.	11:15 P. M.
Ar. Ft. Wayne.....	8:00 P. M.	3:30 A. M.
" Lafayette.....	7:40 "	8:30 "
" Danville.....	10:05 "	11:50 "
" Springfield.....	10:35 A. M.	4:10 P. M.
" Quincy.....	8:45 "	9:35 "
" Keokuk.....	9:50 "	10:45 "
" St. Louis.....	7:00 "	7:15 "

Trains arrive from the West at 8:15 A. M., 8:40 P. M., and 5:00 P. M.

GEO. H. BURBORN,

Gen'l Superintendent.

JOHN U. PARSONS,

Gen'l Ticket Agent.

[901f]

NEW TRACTS,

Intended to Teach Religion without Superstition

(FIRST SERIES, NO. 1 TO 20.)

Second Series, Just Published—

21. Fanaticism: how displayed by well-meaning people in their judgment and action respecting religion in others.
22. Let your Faith honor God, not calumniate Him: reject all testimony that speaks ill of God.
23. Who Wrote It? a proper and needful inquiry when an unreasonable claim is urged on the ground that "It is written."
24. Periodical Prayer: ask when you want to ask; thank when you want to thank; be honest in prayer.
25. Hear the other Side: seek an intelligent faith, instead of blindly following ignorance and prejudice.
26. Man's Duty to God: above all things do not neglect it; but take care, too, not to be misled in regard to it.
27. Penny-wise, Pound-foolish: to claim divine inspiration for unworthy imputation on the divine character.
28. A Touchstone for false Teachers: God certainly gave reason and conscience to be our guides.
29. Justice and Love vs. Mercy: God's actual method better than the supposed "plan of salvation."
30. Prepared to Die an unveiling of some clerical false pretences.
31. "Even as Others" showing a point of resemblance between the "evangelicals" and those believers whom they stigmatize as "unbelievers."
32. Do Men need Salvation? a look towards God directly, not through the dark-stained church-windows.
33. Unbelievers will God ever refuse to welcome the repenting and returning sinner?
34. Lost Sinners: men sometimes love their children: did God ever lose, can he lose, His children?
35. Times and Seasons: two false notions considered; one about Friday, one about Sunday.
36. Do they really believe it? cases where Orthodoxy follows tradition in opposition to Scripture.
37. The Boston Revival and its Leader's methods of operation of Rev. A. B. Barlow, professional revivalist.
38. He Rejects the Bible: a false charge refuted, and the opposing truth clearly shown.

☞ EITHER SERIES, 50 CENTS; BOTH 50 CENTS.

Address CHAS. E. WHIPPLE

[69-1f.] 19 Pinckney St., Boston.

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 23 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. BALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
Prof. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
Rev. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 33, Toledo, Ohio.

JUNIOR UNMASKED! or, THOMAS FAINE the author of the "Letters of Junius" and the "Declaration of Independence." A DEMONSTRATION. Royal 16mo, pp. 32. Price, $1.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.
Address JOHN GRAY & CO.,
113-3m* P. O. Box 639, Washington, D. C.

AGENTS WANTED for "JESUS." By Charles F. Deema, D.D. His Divinity established and Rationalism routed. The most popular and rapidly-selling religious work ever issued. For Circulars, address D. S. PUBLISHING CO., N. Y., Cincinnati, Chicago or St. Louis. 117-129.

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

☞ Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $5.00 each.

☞ All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,

110-161eow. Box 2338, St. Louis, Mo.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Weiss, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucetta Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

The ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WORSHIP OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. B. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (30 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's Essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (20 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER, Secretary.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, APRIL 27, 1872.

WHOLE No. 122.

The Index

Accepts every result of science and sound learning, without seeking to harmonize it with the Bible. It recognizes no authority but that of reason and right. It believes in Truth, Freedom, Progress, Equal Rights, and Brotherly Love. The transition from Christianity to Free Religion, through which the civilized world is now passing, but which it very little understands, is even more momentous in itself and in its consequences than the great transition of the Roman Empire from Paganism to Christianity. THE INDEX aims to make the character of this vast change intelligible in at least its leading features, and offers an opportunity for discussions on this subject which find no fitting place in other papers.

N. B. No contributor to THE INDEX, editorial or otherwise, is responsible for anything published in its columns except for his or her own individual contributions. Editorial contributions will in every case be distinguished by the name or initials of the writer.

FRANCIS ELLINGWOOD ABBOT, Editor.
OCTAVIUS BROOKS PROTHINGHAM, THOMAS WESTWORTH HIGGINSON, WILLIAM J. POTTER, RICHARD P. BALLOWELL, WILLIAM H. SPENCER, MRS. E. D. CHENEY, REV. CHARLES VOTSEY (England), PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN (England), REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY (England), Editorial Contributors.
P. H. BATESON, Business Agent.

[For THE INDEX.]

The Death of Professor F. D. Maurice.

BY REV. M. D. CONWAY.

LONDON, April 2, 1872.

We have lost one of the best men in England. On yesterday morning died the Rev. Frederick Denison Maurice, D.D., Professor of Moral Philosophy in the University of Cambridge. Professor Maurice was not only one of the best of men, but he was, perhaps, the most representative figure in the present transitional phase of English Theology. Although he was the son of a Unitarian minister, he passed the greater part of his career—he was near seventy at the time of his death—in connection with the Church of England. But his change is in no wise to be identified with the various perversions in America to which you have been accustomed. Professor Maurice had gone bravely through the crosses and losses of Unitarian opinion. He was unable to receive the prizes and the Fellowship at Cambridge University because of his adherence to the faith in which he was trained; and even after he did change, he so completely set aside the received dogmas of the church on several points—particularly that of eternal punishment—that he had a severer martyrdom to undergo than his friend Martineau, for instance, has ever had. More able and learned than three fourths of the English Bishops, he has seen compliant men far inferior to himself made Prebends, Canons, Deans. He has never had the slightest recognition from the Church; has been ignored; and when he was recently, after his work of life was nearly done, appointed by the Government to the chair of Moral Philosophy at Cambridge, it was in the face of a most disgraceful opposition from the Church. So Professor Maurice did not pass from a life of hardship to flowery beds of ease in entering the National Church; but the reverse, he entered upon a struggle to liberalize the Church which brought him unusual hardships,—hardships before which he never bent, though the highest promotions were easily obtainable by a little more compliance.

Before mentioning what seems to me the significance of Dr. Maurice's career, let me give a brief outline of it. Born in 1805, he entered Trinity Hall, Cambridge, at an early age. There he formed an intimate friendship with John Sterling, whose life Carlyle has so eloquently written. Sterling always felt that he owed more to him than to any other except Coleridge. The two—Sterling and Maurice—afterward married sisters, and their friendship thus made more intimate continued to grow, notwithstanding the fact, not generally known, that Sterling became toward the end of his life entirely liberated from the belief in historical Christianity, and, indeed, a pantheist. It was after Maurice had left Cambridge that he resolved to take up his association with the more liberal wing of the National Church. Having done so, he determined to go through another college course and entered Exeter College, Oxford, where he graduated in 1831. Subsequently he was made Professor of Divinity in King's College, London, and Chaplain of Lincoln's Inn. His impressive sermons before the law-students at the Inn, and his lectures before the Divinity students at the college, attracted larger audiences than either of those institutions has ever known before or since. These lectures were issued from the press in rapid succession, and old graduates of Divinity College, Harvard, will remember how profoundly they impressed that trust of thinkers, the late Dr. Noyes, and how much he made out of them. But while the theology propounded by Dr. Maurice was welcomed at Harvard, it produced a very different impression here. It was some years before in the case of the Essays and Reviews Lord Westbury, as the epigram of the Jews has it, "non-suited the Devil and dismasted hell with costs," and Maurice's warm denunciation of the dogma of everlasting punishment, though now in accord with the general sentiment of the Church, brought a swarm of dogmatic hornets around him, which managed to expel him from the Theological chair of King's College. The Benchers of Lincoln's Inn, however, did not yield to the clamor, and Dr. Maurice continued his fine discourses there for some time yet. However, his position was not comfortable there; the clergy can at least make a heretic uncomfortable; and so he gradually recognized the fact that no amount of work, ability, or scholarship could, at that period, make the destiny of an independent and outspoken thinker anything but a hard one. So he accepted the call of a comparatively obscure congregation worshipping at Vere Street. In that gloomy little church he passed the greater part of his labors, and, unattractive as it is, he has made it for some of the noblest men and women the most consecrated spot in London. Among those who sat under his eloquent and elevating teachings there were Thomas Hughes and his family, who regarded it as a calamity to miss one of his sermons. Professor Maurice had in his first years of London life completely identified himself with the small company of earnest philanthropists known as "Christian Socialists." Chief of these was Thomas Hughes, who had a warm assistant in Charles Kingsley, then writing those radical books which, it is to be feared, he now regards from his Canon-point-of-view as the follies of his youth. Earl De Grey was also one of this earnest fraternity, which had for its aim the establishment of the poor in associated labor and associated homes. To the end of his life Maurice toiled for the poor, and only when his health utterly broke down did he give up the presidency of the Workingmen's College which he had been the chief force in establishing. His last act in connection with that flourishing college was to inaugurate a movement, now drawing near success, for amalgamating it with the Workingwoman's College in the same neighborhood. He became deeply interested in the method of Antioch College, Ohio, and came to the conclusion that the co-education of the sexes was the true principle. He left the Vere street congregation only a year or two ago, on his appointment at Cambridge, where he has exerted a very high influence.

The change of Dr. Maurice from the Unitarian to the Broad Church made no difference in the friendly relations which had always been preserved between him and the leaders of the former denomination. The ablest Unitarians must have felt that the change did not indicate a downward movement. It must be regarded as a fair criticism upon Unitarianism that it was unable to satisfy a man so devout and absolutely disinterested as Maurice. It was a critical, scholarly religion, but passionless, bloodless, without any ardor of humanity. Boston Unitarianism, as we have known it in the days when Transcendentalism arose, was hard and dry; it gained some fire-baptism from the importation of German thought, and still more from that great moral and human conflict with slavery into which so many of his adherents entered. But Unitarianism here had no such fresh baptism; and though, through the increasing influence of such men as John James Taylor and James Martineau, it has, since Maurice escaped from it, lost much of its dryness and coldness, it must still be regarded as a religion which can never satisfy such ardent souls as that for whose departure we now mourn.

But did he find anything better in the Church of England? At that time, yes; the Broad Church was then in the days of its first love. It was gathering together many pious, aspiring hearts who were united by the dream which Coleridge had kindled and Arnold fanned, of making the Established Church the great home of the national heart and soul, wide enough to include all views, all individualities, all creeds. The dream has preceded a sad awakening, but it was a grand one, and it was bravely pursued.

The Broad Church movement was a romance. So literally was this so that nearly every prominent man in it began his theological life by writing a religious novel. Many of these have been suppressed, but some remain; and there is no way by which a student can get so near to the heart that beat in that movement as by reading such books as Sterling's "Arthur Coningsby," Kingsley's "Yeast," Arnold's "Oakley," Froude's "Nemesis of Faith," Clough's "Boothie of Tooper-na-Vuolich," and Maurice's "Eustace Conway." These books mark an epoch in the religious life of England. In them we see the old, hard, dogmatic strata softening, crumbling off into tender stems and buds, and struggling to mingle in the life of man. In Maurice's novel, which was suppressed, is seen what has been the transforming force in him. He was in the first glow of a conviction which afterwards became the all-absorbing one of his mind and life, that the great centre and soul of religion lay in the idea of Incarnation. Around it all Christianity revolved; to it all the religions of the East pointed; and around it, at last, all creeds would come,—just so soon as the other dogmas which now invested it and rendered it repulsive had been cleared away. The labor of his life was to tear away the dogmatic environment of this one idea; to rationalize it; to make it alive. He saw the unity of the religious world in it,—the world turning around the Incarnation as the earth on its axis.

Already a higher idea had begun to dawn above this theorem of Coleridge and his school. Already the thought of Goethe, of Pichte, of Carlyle and Emerson, was mounting upward, destined to change these earnest men into heralds of clearer light. It was to be made known that Ascent is nobler than Descent,—that the word of the future is not Incarnation but Apotheosis. "Nothing," so wrote Bettina to Goethe,—"Nothing that is celestial passes over; but that which is earthly passes over by the celestial." The sun cannot help us by descending, but by remaining where it is—by shining there! Let the Ideal never bend, never stoop to conquer; its power is in its elevation; so are we uplifted by inward energy toward the uncomplacent Perfect.

But in listening to Maurice I could well see that, even if he had come close to this newer idea, he could never have entered into it. He did indeed come close to it; for he was a near and dear friend of Carlyle. One of our finest artists has, in an admirable work, caught the vast distance between the two men. It is in a picture called "Work," by Madox Brown. Rough laborers are engaged on the streets in all manner of labor—with brick and mortar, wheelbarrows, and other street labors. They have made a great mess. Some dainty ladies are trying to pass without soiling their silks. There are two spectators of the scene, standing side by side—Carlyle and Maurice. Carlyle's face is breaking into contemptuous laughter at the fine ladies, who can see work only as so much nuisance; but Maurice looks with sadness on the toiling men. The expressions are characteristic. Carlyle sees in hard labor only so much happiness; the implements the laborer wields are, in his eyes, wings, bearing him upward. Maurice felt to the end that all this toil meant a hard, weary lot; and as he was anxious to pass his own life descending among the laboring poor to uplift them, the doctrine of the descent of the Son of God similarly to save the world was the most congenial to him.

Well do I remember the Sundays I have passed listening to him. Seated in the pew of my dear friends, Thomas Hughes and his wife, I listened to one on whom every high aim had impressed itself. His hair was white and silken, falling about a fair white forehead full of noble purity; the blonde face, smooth as a woman's, and the soft light eyes, beamed through the sombre church like a bit of blue sky. The voice was pure and flexible,—now deep and sonorous with its emotion, now rising to a vigorous argumentative tone, again affectionate and cordial. He had all the physical attributes of an orator, and he had the temperament of an orator. That he was not a perfect orator was, I think, due to a certain lack of mental clearness. When he ceased to speak, one felt a sense of elevation; there was left a feeling of hopefulness, a tendency to dream out the old visions of youth again. But for the rest,—as concerns the actual contribution to one's intelligent conviction that one derived, I cannot state the case better than to give you the following incident: When at the end of about forty years of labor, on nearly every Sunday of which time Dr. Maurice had preached at Vere street, he gave up his charge there, the closing of a connection of such long standing was looked upon as an event of public importance. A great deal was written in the public press on the subject. But one of the most interesting things was a letter which appeared in the Pall Mall Gazette, written by one who during all those years had attended Dr. Maurice's ministry. In this letter he gave a statement of what had been the great principles which the preacher had steadily advocated during that period. I need not say more than that the principles which Dr. Maurice was, in the letter of this parishioner, represented to have maintained were such as are more familiar to Martineau's hearers than to church congregations. Well, this same letter was immediately followed, in the same journal, by a letter from another of Dr. Maurice's parishioners, declaring that he too had sat through all those years and gathered from what he heard principles precisely opposite to those gathered by the other! The two letters were written with equal ability, and both in evident good faith; they were not vague, but went into Dr. Maurice's preaching on all points of doctrine; but the conclusions of these two parishioners could not have been more discrepant as to what they had been hearing for forty years, if, in that time, one had been listening to Parker at one end of the church and his neighbor to Dr. Beecher in the other end!

I am satisfied that there was just this unconscious vagueness in Dr. Maurice's preaching, that it rather excited the mind than instructed it; so that the roused mind of the hearer was permitted to get higher glimpses of its own thoughts. The two parishioners had projected their individual tendencies upon their preacher's mind. His thoughts had an indefinable sheen and lustre, like that of the pigeon's neck; and how they impressed the eye depended upon the position of the eye as much as upon the thoughts themselves. He was imaginative, poetic, spiritual; and he had the defects of that kind of intellect when harnessed to the wretched ambiguities and half-way statements of a Church whose boasted broadness has gradually declined to a miserable compromise between superstition and rationalism, which has the effect of the sun trying to shine through a London fog. Bishop Butler introduced his famous "Analogy" by saying that he had not been more obscure than the nature of his subject rendered necessary; and I doubt not as good an apology may be urged for Maurice. But in both cases the apology suggests that the subjects might have been better left until they became clear enough to be treated clearly.

My own memories of Prof. Maurice and his preaching incline me to believe that he was in reality a mystical or transcendental rationalist. I have spoken of his piety and his spirituality; but I must warn my reader against the supposition that he was anything like the type of consumptive soul ordinarily called pious and spiritual. He was a hearty worker, a genial lover of human nature, loved to see young folk dancing, loved fun as well as any Englishman living. He had a contempt for shams as hearty as his friend at Chelsea had, and a contempt for sentimental priestism. At a little circle which used to meet for religious readings and discussions, Prof. Maurice was the chief speaker. On one occasion he had delivered an extended disquisition on the characters of Jacob and Esau. He took these as to some extent typical of the natural man and the spiritual man. Jacob was of course the spiritual man. After having got through with the allegory and analysis, Professor Maurice said: "There is one thing I would say in conclusion; that is, that the story of Jacob in the mess of pottage affair indicates, what has been observed in all ages, the tendency of the 'spiritual man' to be a scoundrel and a sneak!"

But whatever vagueness of opinion might have been observable in Professor Maurice's pulpit discourses, there was no want of clearness in his life. It was devoted to every high and noble service to man. He stood by every honest and just cause. He toiled for the poor. He would leave the finest drawing-room and the best company, and plunge through the worst weather, to meet the workmen of the Ormond Street College when they expected him. The last time I saw the brave, high-minded old man was there among those to whom he had given their nobler aims,—sorely will they miss him!—and by his side his son, who is already well-known for his ability and his devotion to his father's aims. His son? No man has died in England these many years whom more young minds have looked upon as a father than Frederick Dennison Maurice.

A well-known physician in one of our large cities was walking one evening, when, coming up behind a rather forlorn-looking couple, he perceived that they were jangling about something; and as he passed, the husband reproved what had evidently been some expression of repining on the part of the wife, in the following terse though morally unsound proposition:—"You was drunk yesterday, and you was drunk day before yesterday, and I should like to know what more you could have unless you was an angel in heaven!"—Galaxy.

Some travellers halted close by the reputed tomb of Lazarus, looking down toward Jericho and the Jordan. The dragoman in attendance appeared about to communicate some important bit of information. With a sweep of his hand of indescribable grandeur, covering in one extensive swing the entire landscape from the Dead Sea to Bethel, he exclaimed, "Dere is the place where our Savior he got his donkey!"

THE CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT.

[The following report of the late meeting in Boston, April 14, in furtherance of the Christian Amendment project, has been kindly forwarded by a friend. It is from a local paper, name not given.]

MEETING IN TREMONT TEMPLE—ADDRESSES BY REV. D. McALLISTER AND PROF. J. A. SEELYE.

The Temple was well filled last evening, on the occasion of a meeting in favor of a religious amendment to the Constitution, so that there shall be an "unquestionable legal basis for Christian education in our public schools, and for every other Christian feature of our national life." The chair was occupied by the Rev. E. M. P. Wells. The proceedings were opened with prayer.

The Rev. D. McAllister of New York, secretary of the National Association, first made a brief address, in which he said that, until within comparatively a few years, there was no question of America being a Christian nation. But of late there has been a denial of the fact, and an attempt has been made to break down whatever is distinctively Christian in this country. Settled as the country was by Christian people, with a civilization based upon Christianity, we have institutions all around us of a Christian character, which, however, give apparent offence to a great many people, who claim their right not to be insulted by institutions of the kind. Not believing in Christianity, they claim that, when the nation acts as a nation, it shall not favor Christianity any more than any other religions. They say that under the Constitution of the United States they have a right in this country to send their children to schools where they will not be insulted in the reading of a book in which they do not believe, claiming that, as they pay for the common schools, they have a right to expect that there shall not be produced in them a book to which they have the most decided objection. There is more persistent determination expressed by this class of people whenever the question springs up anew. The effort made in Cincinnati two years ago was the most persistent one the speaker had ever seen, and renewed efforts, he thought, might now be expected. In a clause of the bill now before Congress, urging a national system rather than a State system of education, it reads: "No sectarian book shall be allowed in the system of education in the United States." This was a clause generally overlooked. If that meant a denominational book, it would be all right, but the cry is made in this connection that the Bible is a sectarian book, and the friends of the bill boldly express the determination to have the Bible put out from the system of education in this country.

In regard to the controversy at Cincinnati, the speaker said the opponents of the Bible went quietly to work, and got a majority upon the school committee, and then proposed the resolution that made so much talk. The next morning petitions poured in, signed by thousands and thousands of citizens, protesting against the expulsion of the book. The school board knew there would be a sensation, and they were wise enough not to act in the matter at once, but to let it lie on the table until the excitement had died away, and then they again took up the resolution, passed it, and the next morning some of the members actually went and stopped the reading of God's word in some of the schools. The question was brought before the superior court of Ohio, where Judge Hagan, decided that, as the constitution of the State expressly acknowledged God and religion, the reading of the Bible was legal. The matter will be taken before the supreme court of the State in a few weeks, but it will not probably end there, as the opponents will take it before the national courts; and if we had in our national Constitution that acknowledgment we had in nearly every State constitution, it would not only sustain the decision of the Ohio judge, but would greatly strengthen the friends of our Christian system of education. And it is the aim of the association to have that undeniable legal basis in our Constitution, so that there will never be any question raised about the matter, and so that when men stand up to resist the Bible we may say, "No; we recognize the Christian religion as a fundamental law of our Constitution." [Applause.] There are many men in the country, men of intelligence and many Christian virtues, among them the editor of the Independent and the pastor of the Plymouth Church, who say in carrying out the theory of our national Constitution, interpreting it by its failure to acknowledge God, that the Bible must give way and go out of our common schools; but to such he would say that it is no sacrilege to lay hands on the Constitution, as they seem to think, for that article was made to meet the wants of the people, and it was never intended that the people should deny themselves any of their precious privileges in order to conform to the Constitution. Holding, then, to the standard of Christian religion in our common education, we have a right as a Christian people to take the Bible as an exponent of that standard, and we have this right, furthermore, and if driven to the wall would use it, as stating in the fundamental law of the nation that as a nation we acknowledge that book as the bulwark of our civil and religious liberty. [Applause.]

Professor Julius A. Seelye, D. D., said that in most disputes among men the whole trouble rests upon some cardinal misunderstanding between the disputants. A misunderstanding which, as long as it continues, prevents all harmony, can never be adjusted unless the parties are at the outset to occupy some common ground. So he started, therefore, that evening with the ground on which we all ought to stand. He took it that such ground is found in the fact that nations and civil governments have always been connected with some sort of religion. A nation without some religion is no more to be found than a nation without a government; but if in some instances a community of men have been discovered, they are only found in the wildest and the rudest of the human race. Looking at it simply as a matter of fact, we find that nations and governments and religion always stand connected together. This fact is no more apparent in the earliest than in the latest periods of history, and it is the most prominent historic fact of all time that it does not change with other changes; whatever else may be submerged, this one truth rides the billows as did the ark the deluge.

I have said, continued the speaker, that no tribe could be found lacking in religion unless it was also found to be lacking in nationality. But take any such tribe, and let it be penetrated with no matter what sort of religious faith, and immediately the instinct of organization becomes apparent, the people begin to show some signs of nationality, and law and order take the place of chaos. The Hebrew code still holds its place and is recognized by the five or six millions of Jews on the globe to-day; the Mohammedan religion is still fervently believed in by a hundred and eighty millions; and the Buddhist faith by vast numbers, showing you that a community having once adopted a faith never loses it. To be, one of the profoundest of recent ethical writers in Germany, says that Christianity is essentially a political principle, and a political power. It is constructive of the state, and bears in itself the power of forming the state and of developing it to its full completeness. We find that the first, the last, the ever-present element is religion; we find it is not so much the flower or the fruit, as it is the seed and root of all political life. But if religion is to serve a nation, it is from its singleness, for you can no more bring two religions and have them exercise an equal power on a government, than you can have two repellant forces of nature acting in the same time and place. A nation cannot serve God and mammon any more than can an individual, and if a nation is founded on two religions, it must ever have internal dissensions, as witness Turkey to-day. It follows, therefore, that no nation can be indifferent to the fact of its religion; that would be simply indifference to its own well-being.

I contend that we are a Christian nation. An atheistical nation is from the nature of the case an impossibility and an absurdity, and we need not to be put into that class. I take it that the doctrine of the fathers and the spirit of our history all indicate a distinctively Christian influence in the origin and continuance of the nation. The thought of a Christian nation, to be formed and maintained, was the clear doctrine of the fathers. Says the first governor of Massachusetts, Winthrop,—"The civil State must be raised out of the churches." Barry, in his history of Massachusetts, says that with the Puritans religion was the basis of the civil as well as of the ecclesiastical government; while Benjamin Franklin in the convention for founding our national Constitution says, "We have been assured in the sacred writings that, except the Lord build the house, they labor in vain that build it. I firmly believe this, and I also firmly believe that without his concurring aid we shall succeed in this political building no better than the builders of Babel." A resolution passed by Congress in 1778 declared that religion and good morals are the only bases of good government. Mr. Webster, in his Plymouth oration, said that our ancestors established the system of government on morality and religious sentiment, and Mr. Justice Story, in giving a decision in the Girard will case, declared that Christianity is a part of the common law of the State. I take it that this is not to be any longer denied; but who does not see the coming influence of Christian principle in our institutions and will acknowledge it as either unwise or insincere? You might as well take out the heart from a living body, and expect the body to continue all its functions, as to expect a nation to exist without Christianity. Christianity is woven with our own government very much as Phidias wove his own name in the shield of Athens, which could not be effaced without destroying the entire structure. And now because this is true, I would have it declared in our national Constitution, which expresses the fundamental law of the nation. Why should it not be declared? It is not only true, but it is the most fundamental truth that can be made. It is the top stone, the corner stone, and shapes the whole of our civil structure. Why should it not be placed where it can be known and read of all men? A written constitution is no patchwork, it is not made to clothe the nation according to the fancy of some constitutional convention; but it must be made to fit the nation, or the nation will not wear it. It can only express that which has already been deeply graven in the hearts of the people, and clearly uttered by their history. A written constitution does not make the fundamental law of the land, it only declares; and that written constitution is the most defective where the highest and the deepest and the most controlling power of the government is withheld.

It is said that Christian principle needs not this declaration. But that is not the question. Gravitation did not need that Newton should discover its laws and declare them, but the human mind needed the discovery and announcement, and Newton's utterance of it was a glory to him and an inspiration to his race. The self-evident truths with which the declaration of independence opens does not need this declaration. They were truths before the declaration, and would have remained such had the declara-n never been written. Christian principle can take of itself, but the nation needs this declaration; it is to utter it in order that under this truth there be no mistake respecting it, and that it may be owned and read of all men. It is not, therefore, as the poor phrase that we need this principle introduced; it is because the principle is so blessed that would have it give light to all in the house. If the government at Washington could appeal to a people on just this principle, it would serve in a measure to dissolve the complications between a nation and Great Britain at the present time. A claim of indirect damages ought not to prevent litigation, ought not to be put forth in a manner to peril the peace of the nations. I do not find any who is at all well informed at the present day, that feels it to be a grave mistake to have originally presented such a claim; and we find the administration organs and men well up in the councils of the State avoiding the question, and seeking to blame one else. It is the old story of the fall—the man gave me and I did eat; and the serpent tempted me and I did eat. I do not arraign the government; I recognize the grave responsibilities of public office, and that its acts, though not superior to fanaticism, can only be fairly judged by the eye that sees in all its bearings. But it is said we have sought the question up to this point, and cannot relate. Why not acknowledge the mistake, and take proper course? That would be derogatory to the unity of the nation, is the answer. But what is the unity of a nation or of a man who refuses to acknowledge an error that is pointed out him? Could a government suffer a loss of dignity by acknowledging an error into which it had fallen? But we are the eve of an important election, and it is much easier to rouse the passions and excite the prejudices of a large class of voters than at other times, and the government does not like to give the cue to feelings of this sort which such an acknowledgment would give, and at the dawning of the glorious day of peace is again turning into night. We claim that such an amendment as we desire would kindle Christian sentiment to a new enthusiasm, and inspire to renewed loyalty to truth hearts whose unflinching love of truth and unfeeling love of God the interests of the nation are bound. With the State, the religion is valued for what it will produce; to the individual religion is an end; to the State a means for the securing of further ends of civilization and freedom. The State uses religion in order to achieve the highest condition of society in respect to these earthly and temporal blessings belonging to present life. The highest hopes of man can find Christianity their highest results. Are not these things which the State may seek—its highest civilization and freedom? Our common school system is a vigorous growth. Every hamlet has the shelter of its spreading branches, every home the refreshment of its healing leaves. But it grows only on Christian soil. In conclusion, I claim the Christian creed is so vital that the State cannot leave it for other interests.

THE OPPOSING FORCES OF CHRISTIANITY AND INFIDELITY.

in the Union and Advertiser, Rochester, N. Y., April 16, 1874.

dispatch yesterday announced that a meeting held in Tremont Temple, Boston, on Sunday 1st, "in favor of a religious amendment to the constitution, providing for an unquestionable basis for christian education in our common schools, and for any other Christian feature of our natural life." E. M. P. Wells presided. After prayer by Rev. J. Clark, Rev. D. McAllister of New York, Secy of the National Association, and Prof. J. H. Hyde, D. D., of Amherst College, made speeches, parts of which appear in the Boston papers. Simultaneously there comes a loud blast from THE INDEX, the organ of the opposing force, to this effect: them agitate. The struggle between Christianity and infidelity for the control of this country is inevitable, it will only be hastened by agitation. While these revolutionaries are urging their demand, the liberals will more vigorously urge their own. What are they? 1. demand that churches and other ecclesiastical property no longer be exempted from just taxation. 2. demand that the employment of chaplains in Congress, State Legislatures, in the army, navy and militia, prisons, asylums and all other institutions supported by public money, shall be discontinued. 3. demand that all public appropriations for sectarian, moral and charitable institutions shall cease. 4. demand that all religious services now sustained by taxation shall be abolished; and especially that the Bible in the public schools, whether ostentatiously or slyly as a book of religious words shall be prohibited. 5. demand that the appointment, by the President of the States or by the Governors of the various States, of all in festive and feasts shall wholly cease. 6. demand that the judicial oath in the courts and in all departments of the government shall be abolished, and its affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury be established in its stead. 7. demand that all laws that do not directly enforce observance of Sunday as the Sabbath shall be repealed. 8. demand that all laws looking to the enforcement of immorality shall be abrogated, and that all laws conforming to the requirements of natural morality, rights and impartial liberty. 9. demand that not only in the Constitution of the States and of the several States, but also in the proclamation of the same, no privilege or advantage be conceded to Christianity or any other special religion, our entire political system shall be founded and added on a purely secular basis; and that whatever shall prove necessary to this end shall be consistently and promptly made. 10. we think the people of this country will be comply with all the demands of THE INDEX it is by no means certain that they will not fully acquiesce in some of them as the only means of deliverance from the injustice and oppression of the holier-than-thou sects which are in organization for the purpose of controlling mind and matter with the power and machinery of government according to their own view, while excluding and proscribing all others—Christians and Infidels alike—as "sectarians" who have no equal rights that they are bound to respect. THE INDEX people have the merit of directness, honesty and equality in their propositions. The Boston religious amendment people, on the other hand, propose a recognition of Christianity, but only their Christianity. They desire, in the words of Prof. Seelye, of Amherst, that "the common school system shall rest on a religious basis," but that basis must be of their religion. In harmony with their talk and action are the talk and action of the pious people who make up the majority of our State Legislature at Albany. The Assembly on Saturday last sent up to the Senate for concurrence a proposed constitutional amendment prohibiting the Legislature or the corporate bodies of any county, city or town from loaning or appropriating money to "sectarian" schools or other institutions, and at the same time, for concurrence also, a bill appropriating $125,000 to academies, nearly all of which are "sectarian." The Senate, fresh from making a donation to the Rev. Dr. Peck's Methodist University at Syracuse, which has been built to a large extent with the public money, concurred in the appropriation. Senator Lowery moved to strike it out. We quote the Evening Journal's report:—

Mr. Lowery said: By far the greater portion of the academies, as at present managed, are sectarian schools. Many of them were established by the different religious denominations, and are now conducted in their interests. Unless the State is prepared to go to extreme lengths in support of sectarian institutions, the proposed aid ought not to be granted. The proposed tax is an unjust one, because there are over 700 towns in this State which contain no academy. Why should the people of those towns be taxed for the benefit of private institutions which are of no practical value to them? And lastly, the number of pupils attending academies is about 30,000. The proposed appropriation is therefore at the rate of over $4 for each pupil in attendance. This is much more liberal in proportion than any appropriation the State makes for the support of common schools. The State tax of one and a quarter mills for the support of common schools yields a little more than $2,500,000. The number of pupils attending the common schools is considerably more than one million. Why should the State pay over $4 for each academic pupil, and less than $2.50 for each common school pupil?

The motion to strike out was lost. Mr. Madden moved to amend the section by providing in effect that no part of the fund shall go to the support of any private or sectarian academies. Messrs. Madden, D. F. Wood, Lowery, Benedict, Woodin, J. Wood, Lord and Johnson discussed the motion at great length, when the question was taken and lost.

Here, in this action of the Legislature at Albany—this lavish appropriation of public money to the select "sectarian" schools of the rich from which the poor are debarred by high rates of tuition, while a mere pittance is denied to the charity week-day schools of the State which take in and educate the orphan and the outcast, the people see a practical exemplification of the spirit and "principle" of the people who advocate a religious amendment of the federal constitution and anti-religious amendment of the State constitution. They are alike bigoted, pharisaic, tyrannical, proscriptive. Is it any wonder that the people turn from such burlesques of Christianity and common honesty—that men turn from churches and religious societies and go to the extreme of infidelity, when they see how professed Christians, and professed believers in the equal rights of all, belie their professions, and, where they have the opportunity, wield the power of government to tax the masses and appropriate their money to "sectarian" objects of their liking, while prohibiting the loaning or appropriation of a dollar to the "sectarian" objects of others? From such "Christianity," in or out of the Constitution, the prayer of the people is, "Good Lord, deliver us." In view of the way in which professed Christians now act towards each other, and toward those who do not profess Christianity, there is scarcely a doubt that, if the religious amendment programme and THE INDEX programme were to be submitted to a popular vote of the people of the United States, the latter would receive ten votes where the former would receive one. Paradoxical as it may seem, it is Christianity, as exemplified by those who most ardently profess it, that produces infidelity, and even makes allies for it of Christians oppressed by fellow Christians. It is not the want of God in the constitution that is the matter, but the want of His golden rule in the heads and hearts and hands of those who profess to believe in him.

THE RELIGIOUS TEST IN THE CONSTITUTION.

[From the Boston Commonwealth, of April 18.]

Those who have made light of the attempt to engraft a theological bias upon the national constitution have hardly considered the enthusiastic welcome with which the idea will be received by a considerable portion of the community. Instead of being the aim of only a few and comparatively obscure portion of the public, it is seen that there are many interested whom it might have been thought would have a larger and more catholic conception of the grandeur of a non-sectarian fundamental basis for a popular government like ours. A call has appeared in the daily journals of this city for a meeting of sympathizers in this movement to-morrow (Sunday) evening, to which are appended names like those of Jacob Sleeper, Samuel G. Bowdler, Cyrus Carpenter, Pliny Nickerson, James R. Osgood, and others known as warm and devoted friends of civil and religious freedom. That the clergy, to a considerable degree, should constitute the bulk of the signers of the call, was to be expected; but we confess that we did not anticipate finding laymen like those we have named favoring a scheme that must proscribe, if adopted, a large share of their fellow-citizens. With God and Christ in the constitution, no Israelite or Mohammedan, no atheist or "disbeliever," can honestly swear allegiance to the government. We establish the old theocracy once more; and there is no hospitality for men of all creeds or of none. To our mind our political system can receive no hurt so irreparable as this. We have little faith in the success of the movement; but, nevertheless, we are not unmindful of the influences being brought to bear for its consummation. The attempt, even, is fraught with danger. It will enkindle the worst passions of all who are to be set aside as unworthy to live under the amended constitution. It will engender hate towards many excellent men, strong in their religious convictions, yet nobly disinterested in labors for the general good. It will invite the dissensions of a past age in the old world upon the fresher soil of the new. A better way is to let our religious opinions work in their accustomed channels. If they cannot control the community, we must accept the fact that, in a republic of equal privileges, matters of religious belief are no part of the public concern.

The only place the wife of a Congressman can fairly trust him—and we write this advice in behalf of virtuous innocence—is the Washington Club. The Washington Club is composed almost entirely of heads of families, sober, steady, quiet business men, who meet in its elegant rooms for a little relaxation from their many cares. The Club is always opened of an evening with prayer, and afterwards these pious gentlemen sit around and read good books, or discuss light doctrinal points, such as "Transubstantiation," "Infant Baptism," "Can a man marry his aunt?" or "Is it moral or in any sense in accordance with revealed religion, to kill your mother-in-law?"—Washington Capital.

LOCAL NOTICES.

FIRST INDEPENDENT SOCIETY.—The regular meetings of this Society are held in the ODEON, in the new EXPRESS BUILDING on St. Clair Street, opposite the WHEELER OPERA HOUSE, on Sunday mornings, at 10½ o'clock. The public are cordially invited to attend.

PUBLISHER'S NOTICES.

Cash Receipts for the Week ending April 20th.—Jno Winslow $2.50; Mrs. Lucia H. Cowles, 10 cts.; Henry F. Dunckel, 50 cts.; Joseph Atkins, 25 cts.; Zerah Masters, 75 cts.; J. S. Morrill, 50 cts.; O. Brooks, 50 cts.; D. A. Robertson, $2; Wm. L. Prentiss, $2; Dr. V. W. Sunderlin, 50 cts.; E. Kier, $2; A. Bootham, $2; H. P. Hyde, 25 cts.; W. F. Johnson, 25 cts.; Henry Townsend, $5; Rev. Zerah Masters, $4.50; Mrs. O. Gillett, $5.50; S. D. Bardwell, $2; E. F. Dickinson, 75 cts.; J. Shackleton, $2.50; G. H. Briggs, $1.25; L. S. Hoque, 75 cts.; F. E. Baker, $1.50; Reuben Frible, $2.70; M. Hayden, $3; James Allen, $4.50; Jno. M. Haynes, 10 cts.; Silas N. Walker $2.50; J. F. Wilson, $2; Jas. W. Graham, 25 cts.; M. C. Riggs $2; Mrs. Julien & Wilson, 75 cts.; Dyer D. Lum, $6; L. G. Felch, $2; J. D. Zimmerman, $4.50; A. A. Knights, $2.50; J. T. Blakeney, 50 cts.; H. G. Spencer, $2.75; Dr. J. H. Fork, $3; J. Sedgwick, $3; C. M. Nye, 50 cts.; Rev. C. H. Brigham, $2; Jas. B. Tyler, $1; Mary S. Hughes, $1; J. Whitaker, $3.75; J. W. Pike, $1.50; C. C. Niccum, 50 cts.; Geo. B. Boutelle, $2.50; Theodosia B. Shepherd, 65 cts.; C. G. Clark, $2; Dr. Jas. Fischer, 60 cts.; Eliza H. Beares, $2; La Mott Blanchard, $2; H. L. Green, $5.50; T. R. Davis, $1; S. W. Ayers, $1.50; W. H. Spencer, $2; L. Adams, 10 cts.; Wm. Wadsworth, $2; J. A. Clark, 20 cts.; E. G. Baldwin, $2; H. Smith, $2.

All receipts of cash will be acknowledged as above, and no other receipt sent unless specially requested. Persons who do not see their remittances acknowledged within two or three weeks after sending, will please notify us.

N. B.—Orders for Tracts or Single Numbers of THE INDEX which are not on hand will, if of small amount, be otherwise filled to the same amount without further notice.

RECEIVED.

A MANUAL OF THE ANATOMY OF VERTEBRATED ANIMALS. By THOMAS B. H. LILLIE, LL.D., F. R. S., Author of "Lay Sermons," "Man's Place in Nature," "Origin of Species," etc. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 549 and 551 Broadway. 1873. pp. 321.

INSTRUCT: ITS OFFICE IN THE ANIMAL KINGDOM AND ITS RELATION TO THE HIGHER POWERS IN MAN. Lowell Lectures, 1871. By P. A. CHADBOURNE, LL.D., Author of "Relations of Natural History," "Natural Theology," etc. New York: GEO. P. PUTNAM & SONS, Association Building. 1873. pp. 307.

THE WORLD BEFORE THE DELUGE. By LOUIS FIGUERE. Newly Edited and Revised, by H. W. BIERSON, F. R. S., F. G. S., of the Geological Survey of Great Britain. Hon. Fellow of King's College, London. With 235 illustrations. New York: D. APPLETON & Co., 1873. pp. 518.

SPIRITUALISM ANSWERED BY SCIENCE. By EDWARD W. COX, S. L., F. R. G. S. New York: HENRY L. HINTON, Publisher, 744 Broadway. 1873.

THE VICTORY OVER DEATH. A Sermon by O. H. FROTHINGHAM, preached at Lyric Hall, March 31, 1873. New York: D. G. FRANCIS, 17 Astor Place. 1873.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE NATIONAL CONVENTION TO SECURE THE RELIGIOUS AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES. Held in Cincinnati, January 31 and February 1, 1873. With an Account of the Origin and Progress of the Movement. Philadelphia: JAS. B. RODGERS & Co., 53 and 54 North Sixth Street. 1873.

SPIRITUALISM AS MANIFESTED THROUGH THE MEDIUMSHIP OF THE WOMAN OF ENDOR. By A. B. MARLEY. Springfield, Mass.: A. B. MARLEY.

THE ALDINE for May, 1873. JAMES SUTTON & Co., 38 Liberty St., New York. $5.00 a year.

THE JOURNAL OF SPECULATIVE PHILOSOPHY for April. St. Louis: E. P. GRAY. $2.00.

THE OHIO MEDICAL AND SURGICAL REPORTER for March. Cleveland, O.: L. B. WITTE, 17 Monumental Park. $1.50.

THE INDUSTRIAL for April, 1873. Richmond, Ind.: ISAAC KIRLEY, Editor and Publisher. $1.50.

ng of the Christianizers in Boston; and we now append the list of those who signed it, as reported in the Boston Journal:—

Charles G. Nazro, E. B. Webb, A. A. Miner, E. M. Wells, Jacob Sleeper, Charles D. Gould, Moses H. Argent, Increase N. Tarbox, Henry F. Durant, Manon Eastburn, John S. Blatchford, Edward S. Rand, Jonathan French, Jos. B. Tilton, G. M. Dexter, S. J. Bowdler, G. M. Clark, S. F. Upham, Wm. R. Jark, David Snow, Cyrus Carpenter, Pliny Nickerson, Wm. V. Garner, Louis B. Schwarz, James White, A. Van Wagener, W. S. Houghton, Ebenezer, James R. Osgood, A. J. Gordon, H. M. Parsons, George C. Lorimer, Alex. H. Vinton, Wm. H. Hoyt, S. H. Hayes, Wm. Graham, and others.

N. B.—We shall be greatly obliged if all those who are now circulating the counter-petition will send in their lists at least as early as June 1; and we respectfully ask the liberal papers which have promised to send their lists to us to do so at their earliest convenience. Unless special reasons for delay shall arise, it is our intention to send the entire list as soon as possible after that date to the Hon. Charles Sumner, who, as our readers will remember, has promised to present the remonstrance "with pleasure and sympathy."

NO FAULT OF OURS.

I sometimes see a sharp arrow shot by some sectarian newspaper against the Free Religious Association, and feathered with this particular complaint: that whereas we began by specially inviting individual opponents or well-known non-sympathizers to our platform, we do so no more. The charge is a madness, for it justifies us in pointing to facts of which we are rather proud.

Perhaps no new movement ever tried harder than ours to open its platform to its opponents—as this right hand knows, which painfully wrote many letters of solicitation. As Garrison began the anti-slavery movement by exhausting all efforts to induce leading clergymen to take it up, and, that failing, undertook the easier task of abolishing slavery himself—so we first made long and faithful efforts to fill our platform with our opponents, and this failing, found our consciences quite clear to occupy ourselves. There is a point where such self-abnegation ceases to be a virtue. Some of our best friends thought that we went to the very verge of self-respect thus offering to give up our precious hours to those who had no sympathy with us. Yet we did it; and for one am very thankful that we did it so thoroughly. It has at least saved us the need of ever doing it again.

At our first anniversary, Rev. Merrill Richardson was invited to represent the Orthodox Congregationalists, Rev. J. F. Clarke and Rev. Robert Collyer to represent the Unitarians, Rev. Olympia Brown for Universalists, Rev. J. P. Hubbard for the Episcopalians, and Rev. C. H. Malcom for the Baptists, and her Hecker for the Catholics. All but the first last came and spoke; Mr. Malcom in a tone of friendly sympathy which won our hearts, Mr. Hubbard and Dr. Clarke in strong antagonism to our principles, as we expected. To show under what circumstances of opposition one at least of these gentlemen spoke on our platform, I may say that, after Mr. Hubbard had accepted our invitation, I received a letter from a high official—I think he was the President—of the Boston Young Men's Christian Association, beseeching me to release Mr. Hubbard, for the sake both of his health and usefulness, from his promise. This letter was written out Mr. Hubbard's knowledge, and was addressed to me, as having conducted the correspondence. It simply forwarded by me to the gentleman most concerned, and the decision left entirely to him. He, his accustomed manliness, refused to be excused his promise, and came to the meeting. I have always honored him for it.

Next year, being resolved still to be faithful to our opponents, we wrote to those whom we thought courageous and progressive in different denominations, earnestly striving to secure some "evangelists." We explained, as clearly as we could, why we did this simply for love of free speech, and the more frankly they spoke their mind on our side, the better we should like it. We wrote to Rev. Merrill Richardson again, Rev. Phillips Esq., Rev. Dr. Quint, Rev. J. L. Corning, Rev. A. Abbott, Rev. W. H. H. Murray, Rev. Proctor Diman, Rev. Wm. E. Park. Their answers were found in our report for that year. All their answers were courteous; all recognized our personal respectability and apparent honesty of purpose; but all declined. This uniformity of response settled our future policy. Having done our duty, we find our consciences clear. Henceforth, I take it, we shall welcome all comers, but solicit none.

T. W. H.

GOOD-FRIDAY REFLECTIONS.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I am writing on Good Friday morning, and the reflections caused by what I see from my windows are strangely different from those which I used to have, on this day, in my boyhood.

The blinds would be drawn down or the shutters closed, as in a house of mourning. Dry bread and water for breakfast; boiled rice for dinner, without any sugar or jam; "cross buns" for tea, with a compensation for the day's fasting in the shape of an egg. A very heavy dose of church service, at eleven, helped to complete the oppressive gloom of the day. I thought we should never get to the end of that painfully reiterated story of the crucifixion, standing up for an interminable period to hear the last chapter of it read. Some dismal hymn about the "Precious Blood" followed; and then, to my extreme disgust, we had the whole story over again in the pulpit, only this time with the abominably orthodox assertion that it was "all our doing." I don't think I was ever as a child persuaded into believing such a monstrous fiction as that; but I do well remember how I came to hate and abjure the very names of Lent, Passion-week, and most of all Good-Friday, as the symbols of all that was gloomy and wearisome in religion.

The day, however, used to be redeemed for one short half hour, when my father would call us one by one into his study and talk lovingly to each in turn, exciting all that was good in our natures by his sweet, tender earnestness, and then making us kneel down with him and pray that God above would help us to be good. The fragrance of that little oasis is fresh in my heart to-day; and not all the Good-Fridays since have been able to weaken the influence of that blessed season. But now I am free from the fetters of clergy, I would as soon go into a shambles as go to church on Good-Friday; and nearly every one else seems to be of my opinion.

There are thousands and thousands—I may truly say millions—of people passing to and fro for nothing but pleasure. Holiday-making is the single idea associated with this day in the minds of four-fifths of the population. The remaining fifth are at church, poor things! The question naturally arises, if this outward disregard for the day is so prevalent, the inward disregard of the event which it signifies must be nearly as prevalent. Then why is this called a Christian country? If the "Day of Atonement" be revelled in as a day of mere animal enjoyment, of rest and excursion, with what feelings must the Atonement itself be regarded if thought upon at all? The truth is that this central dogma of Christianity has lost its hold over the mass of the English people, and I don't think it can ever be replaced.

The churches may thank themselves entirely for their own decrepitude. Instead of teaching men that they were in horrible peril of everlasting torment, and were rescued from it by the commission of a political murder, they might have taught men that the freedom and security which they enjoy to-day are in part due to the life, the teachings and the martyrdom of Jesus of Nazareth. Good-Friday, even as a religious festival, might then have had some pious uses. But the frightful, unbelievable, and repulsive conception of that man's history as a Divine tragedy—as a sacrifice, propitiation and oblation, a "sweet-smelling savor" in the nostrils of Deity by which his attention was abstracted for a moment from offending humanity, and he let fall the thunderbolts of his frenzied wrath by mistake, as it were, upon the wrong head! Such a picture as this is enough to empty the churches and to drive all who can go out into the open fields.

It is certainly true, as another side of the picture, that there has been a great "revival," as they call it, in all the churches and sects, and that an amount of outside show in religious ordinances is being made on a scale never before attempted. But to those who look closer into things than the surface, this will not be an unfavorable omen. The flame of the dying candle, like the heightened intelligence of a dying man, brightens up into an unwonted brilliancy in the last paroxysms of the vital struggle. Like Rome before the final overthrow of paganism, Christianity wears an aspect of unusual freshness, and does not yet betray the rottenness at the core. But it is doomed, nevertheless. On one side the unreasonableness of the Christian dogmas will not stand the crucial tests which modern thought has brought to bear upon them; and, on the other hand, the whole contest between freedom and authority has to be fought out afresh, and, as I believe, for the last time in Christendom. Races of slower development than ours may have to tread hereafter in our footsteps of to-day; but the Teuton, Scandinavian and Celt are approaching a contest on this subject which will be final. India is almost ready for it, too; and when three such immense and influential portions of mankind as India, Europe and America, unite for the ratification of such a treaty of peace, infallible guide of every creed under heaven—in pope, priest, or parchment—will be swept out of the pathway of mankind.

I am, sir, very truly yours,

CHARLES VOYSEY.

CAMDEN HOUSE, Dulwich, S. E.,
March 20, 1872.

CHURCH AND STATE.

The idea of an Established Church is repugnant to the sentiments of a vast majority of the people of the United States, and it is therefore asserted with great confidence that the present effort to Christianize the Constitution will result in ridiculous failure. Are we not too sanguine? The scheme will no doubt fail; not, however, because it is regarded with indifference, but because it is met at the threshold.

Every one will probably admit that religious freedom is better understood here, and is more securely guaranteed to this nation than to any other. The spirit of our institutions demands religious liberty; but who will maintain that we enjoy it according to the full meaning of democracy? The principle of liberty is the corner-stone of our American government, but in the process of building other material became a part of the structure. In the beginning democracy was confronted by despotism in its grossest form, and the contest has but just ended. We have broken the fetters of the negro—our first duty—and the hour has now come when we may say to break our own.

The advocates of the Christian amendment rely upon the limitations of democracy, upon misconceptions of liberty; we must seek to remove the limitations, to teach the true meaning, if we expect to baffle them. They appeal with confidence to the past and present attitude of our government toward what are termed, in legal phraseology, "religious societies," and a large part of the record is against us. Let me cite a few cases.

We are taxed to support religious societies. It is true that no one sect can impose a tax for its own support, as in England, but it is also true that the whole people are taxed to maintain all the sects. This taxation may be indirect, but it is none the less burdensome. I cannot state the exact value of property held by church organizations, but it is safe to say that millions of dollars are invested in such property, from which government derives not one cent of revenue.

It may be said that the motive which led to the exemption of church property from taxation was a good one; that the intention was, not to establish ecclesiastical despotism, but to encourage moral education. To what extent this end has been accomplished I will not now consider. It is well enough understood, however, that with the majority of churches morals are secular, and theology alone is religious, at least is predominant. This plea of good motive is urged by politicians to-day to justify large and direct appropriations of money for the exclusive benefit of sectarian organizations. The most indifferent of us will be startled when we hear the sums annually contributed by the State legislatures to maintain Roman Catholicism and other forms of Christianity. At this moment there is a bill before the Massachusetts legislature which appropriates one hundred thousand dollars to Amherst College, a sectarian institution, and substantially an ecclesiastical mill for the manufacture of evangelical Christians. For the motive good or bad, the fact that we are taxed to support Christian churches is clearly established, and it is a precedent that can be used by skillful advocates to very great advantage.

Again, our Congress and State legislatures employ chaplains. Only a week or two ago the Boston Journal, referring to the Massachusetts legislature, suggested that "all the members . . . at the top of the Speaker's hammer, rise in their places and reverently repeat—the chaplain leading in the exercises—the Lord's Prayer." Liberals smile at such a proposal to-day, but does it not in some degree indicate a popular readiness to make further concessions to ecclesiasticism? After the legislators have learned, parrot-fashion, to repeat the "Lord's Prayer," how easy it will be to teach them the Apostle's Creed! This time-honored and too often time-serving office of chaplain is not only a precedent apt for the purposes of religious enthusiasts, but it is an expensive one to us; these clergymen in the navy and elsewhere are maintained by the public at an annual expense of thousands of dollars. During the late war the cost of regimental chaplains alone must have been enormous.

If we examine into legislation touching religious books, we find the Christian Bible has been persistently recognized as "the word of God." The Bible is read in our public schools, not as history, but as absolute religious authority, and the children understand that it is the divine authority upon which the claims of the sects are based.

It would be easy to extend the list, but these illustrations will suffice. Christian zealots point to such facts and demand consistent action. Consistency, they say, will incorporate into the Constitution & recognition of what is already established. Our reply is, let us have consistency, but let it come by the abolition of all customs that conflict with and subvert the organic law of the land.

They are strong because they are united, because they have the precedents of a century and the religious prejudices of the people behind them. They are weak because they reason from false premises and demand a further violation of the theory of our government. Our strength lies in the fact that we find our warrant in the organic law, and plead for a true development and a correct application of the principle of liberty. We are weak because we are scattered and because we refuse to push our principle to the overthrow of previous custom and present usage. Our house is divided; we compromise with the enemy. Of the many thousand names now appended to Mr. Abbot's protest, how many can be secured for an attack upon the present active and vital recognition, by our government, of the special claims of Christianity? Are we content to act on the defensive, or shall we accept the challenge offered by the churches, and go forward with a resolve to continue the contest until religious freedom is secured, until the chains that now bind us are broken?

Christianity, from its own stand-point, is perhaps justified in this new assault upon freedom; and it will in time succeed if it is not met by a counter-attack. The present anomalous condition of society cannot be permanent. Either Christianity must release its grasp on the State and relinquish what it has already secured, or it must triumph and liberty sustain a terrible defeat.

We may find precedents that will be of service to us—the treaty with Algiers for example—but they are the exceptions. The practice of this government has, in the main, denied its profession, and we shall lose time and waste strength if we stop to plit precedent against precedent. The organic principles of our government are not only right, but the people accept them, and herein lies our hope. Develop these principles to their legitimate conclusions, and with a theoretical development combine a practical application. Convince the American people of the logical results of the principles announced in '76, reaffirmed in '87, and endorsed by the Bill of Rights of nearly every State in the Union. Convince them that true republicanism cannot exempt church property from taxation, cannot contribute public money to religious societies, cannot employ chaplains, cannot enforce a religious observance of the Sabbath, cannot recognize the Christian Bible any more than the Hindu Vedas or the Koran as authority. Christians will listen to-day as they never would before, for their own church has invited the discussion.

Here, then, is our opportunity. The time for aggressive warfare has come. We must not compromise; compromise cost this nation years of slavery, hundreds of thousands of lives and billions of dollars; we cannot compute its injury to morals, its disastrous effect upon civilization. The argument does not invade the sects; our demand, in this connection, leaves them untouched. We do not, in this discussion, ask men to abandon Christianity or to repudiate their Bible. The sects may flourish, the Christian shall acknowledge his "Lord and Master," and the Bible shall stand as his authority. What we do demand is that the sects shall not invade the government; that they shall keep their hands out of our pockets and their chains from off our necks.

The hope of the American people is based upon their faith in the ultimate triumph of democracy. The love of justice peculiar to the American citizen is strengthened by his rare ability to interpret its obligations. An honest, earnest, intelligent appeal to these qualities will overcome the bigotry of the churches and the popular theological prejudice, begotten of education, precedent and custom. We have but to do our whole duty "without concealment, without compromise," and we shall not only defeat the Christian amendment, but we shall secure a religious freedom that will guarantee the rights, while it repudiates the special claims, in government, of Atheist and Theist, Jew and Gentile, Christian and Pagan, Orthodox and Heterodox.

R. P. H.

EDITORIAL BOOK NOTICES.

MOUNTAINEERING IN THE SIERRA NEVADA (J. R. Osgood & Co., Boston), by Clarence King, is a record of travel on geological expeditions. Science and narrative, description and adventure, are pleasantly mingled in its pages. The last chapter has interesting notes of the days of 1849—1855, the Vigilance Committees' summary vengeance on innocent parties for horse-thieving (the one crime of crimes in Californian eyes), the dilapidated and deserted mining-towns, and so forth. The style is rather agreeable, but marred by a too evident straining after the graphic and picturesque.—Price $2.50; sold by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

FATHER TAYLOR, THE SAILOR PREACHER—INCIDENTS AND ANECDOTES OF REV. EDWARD T. TAYLOR (B. B. Russell, 55 Cornhill, Boston) is a biography of one of the most remarkable men that ever figured in the Methodist pulpit. It is nominally of composite authorship, bearing on the title-page the names of Rev. Gilbert Haven, editor of Zion's Herald, and Hon. Thomas Russell, "Collector of the port of Boston." Such a span, one would think, ought to draw a heavy load. But the load is not "heavy" in this case. The book is very lively, piquant and full of quaint, epigrammatic wit. We suspect that the "Collector" had small share in the making of it, for on almost every page we detect the hand of the clerical editor, whose piety is ever on the roar. In fact, his Methodistian everlastingly alternates between a groan and a horse-laugh. But it is honest, out-spoken, and with all its bigotry by no means unkindly. We confess that we like Zion's Herald better than any other of our Evangelical exchanges, though it is the narrowest and most saucy of them all; and the qualities that make it attractive to one who can appreciate genuineness mark this book from beginning to end. The writer has a fervid admiration of the man he is describing; and though "Father Taylor" had genius while his biographer has only talent, there was so much in common between them that probably nobody else could have given us so capital a book as this. We are glad that no rationalist had it in charge. The "Infidel Index," as Mr. Haven never omits to say, can yet appreciate the intensity of religious feeling which burned in the sailor-preacher's heart, and gave him his peculiar power. There was no sham about Father Taylor's religion. Even when it blazed out in grotesque shapes, it was honest fire, and meant heat. He had the blood of poet, wit, mystic, and apostle in his veins. But he was no reformer and no thinker. He never knew what do with rationalism. If he had had a grain of logic in his composition, he would never have hob-nobbed with the Unitarians as he did, but rather have thundered his fiercest anathemas at their Christ-crucifying heresies. But his heart made a fool of his head, as it does of every Christian who remains gentle towards unbelievers. No Christian ever realized the true bearings of the dogma of "salvation by Christ alone," without submissively accepting the stern logic of the persecutor as the voice of God. But Father Taylor knew as little of logic as a babe; and to the end of his days he let the half-patronizing but kindly advances of Unitarianism evaporate away his Christian consistency. Of his flashing wit and eccentric but veritable genius we can say nothing now, but may hereafter quote his sayings occasionally.

LEGENDS OF THE PATRIARCHS AND PROPHETS (Macmillan & Co.), by Rev. S. Baring-Gould, is a work of curious results in a scantily-worked field. It is a collection of Jewish, Mussulman, and various other traditions concerning the heroes and worthies of the Old Testament; and a similar collection concerning those of the New Testament is conditionally promised by the author. The legends here brought together are very unequal in interest. Some are ludicrous in the extreme, and others are beautiful. The chief lesson to be got out of them is one not intended by the compiler, namely, that the marvellous narratives of the Bible belong to a vast family of which they are merely exceptionally favored members, having been singled out for the world's adoration as specially inspired. Many of the Old Testament stories are no less grotesque and childish than these; and it is well to know that they were drawn out of an inexhaustible well. Here is one amusing enough:—

"God then made a covenant with Adam's successors. He rubbed Adam's back, and lo! from out of his back crawled all generations of men that were to be born, about the size of ants, and they ranged themselves on the left and on the right. At the head of those on the right stood Mohammed, then the other prophets and the faithful, distinguished from those on the left by their white and dazzling splendor. Those on the left were headed by Kabil (Cain).

"God then acquainted Adam with the names and fate of all his posterity; and when the recital arrived at David, to whom God had allotted only thirty years, Adam asked God, 'How many years are allotted to me?'

"Allah replied, 'One thousand.'

"Then said Adam, 'I make a present to David of seventy years out of my life.'

"God consented; and knowing the shortness of Adam's memory, at all events in matters concerning himself inconveniently, he made the angels bring a formal document of resignation engrossed on parchment, and required Adam to subscribe thereto his name, and Michael and Gabriel to countersign it as witnesses." [p. 49.]

As it turned out, God was none too cautious or shrewd in thus securing a legal record of the contract.—

"Finally, when Adam had reached his nine hundred and thirtieth year, the Angel of Death appeared under the form of a goat, and ran between his legs. Adam recoiled with horror, and exclaimed, 'God has given me one thousand years; wherefore comest thou now?'

"'What!' exclaimed the Angel of Death, 'hast thou not given seventy years of thy life to the prophet David?'

"Adam stoutly denied that he had done so. Then the Angel of Death drew the document of transfer from out of his beard and presented it to Adam, who could no longer refuse to go." [p. 64.]

Here is a legend of another kind:—

"One day, as Moses was tending his flock in a barren place, he saw that one of the lambs had left the flock and was escaping. The good shepherd pursued it, but the lamb ran so much the faster, fled through valley and over hill, till it reached a mountain stream and drank.

"Moses now came up to it, and looked at it with troubled countenance and said,—

"'My dear little friend! Then it was thirst which made thee run so far and seem to fly from me; and I knew it not! Poor little creature, how tired thou must be! How canst thou return so far to the flock?'

"And when the lamb heard this, it suffered Moses to take it up and lay it upon his shoulders; and, carrying the lamb, he returned to the flock.

"Now whilst Moses walked, burdened with the lamb, there fell a voice from heaven, 'Thou who hast shown so great love, so great patience towards the sheep of man's fold, thou art worthy to be called to pasture the sheep of the fold of God.' [p. 261.]

Much amusement and enjoyment can be derived from this book.—Price $2.00; sold by H. S. Stebbins, Toledo.

"Bewildered," says Diderot, "in an immense forest during the night, and having only one small torch for my guide, a stranger approaches, and thus addresses me: 'Friend, blow out thy light if thou wouldst make sure of the right path.' The forest was the world—the light was my reason—the stranger was a priest."

The "stranger" invited Diderot to blow out his own light; the Christian Amendment fanatics would blow out ours themselves. But they have not breath enough for the occasion.

We are indebted to the publishers of the New York Christian Union, of which Rev. Henry Ward Beecher is the editor and which is said to be increasing its circulation with great rapidity, for a pair of oil chromos, "Wide Awake" and "Fast Asleep," which are issued as premiums to all new subscribers to that paper on receipt of $3.25. They are very pretty. Address J. B. Ford & Co., 27 Park Place, New York.

Communications.

N. B.—Correspondents must run the risk of typographical errors. The utmost care will be taken to avoid them; but hereafter no space will be spared to errors.

N. B.—Illegibly written articles stand a very poor chance of publication.

LETTER FROM THE EDITOR OF "FREE-LIGHT," A LIBERAL THINKER'S MAGAZINE, ENGLAND.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE INDEX:

Sir,—I thank you for so often sending THE INDEX across the wide sea on a message of good-will. Let me state at once that I am not what is called a Theist; neither am I a mere vulgar Pantheist. I may say, with my contributor Goodwyn Barmby, that, if I am Unitarian, I am not lost in Unitarianism, but "gone before." I think you will read Mr. Barmby's "Incarnation and Apotheosis," when I forward the sixth number of the magazine to you, with interest. But I do not exactly identify myself with Mr. Barmby, though he is also a Universalist. Indeed, it is not desirable that any two beings on God's earth should think alike. If I were to say I am of the religion of the Holy Ghost, you would call me, most likely, a mystic. But I sincerely believe in the "Spirit of all Truth," whom the world cannot receive. I sincerely believe that, in the order of Providence, Jehovah was lost in Jesus; and the worship of Jesus will cease when there is a Divine Universal Church of Unity.

The Jewish God was evidently a God of a sect—and a very small sect indeed. The ideal of Christianity is far more liberal, and embraces the human race; but, at present, each petty denomination seems to think it has the whole truth, and that any denomination that thinks otherwise believes in a lie, to its damnation! The awful apostasy, therefore, of every church must be purged by much tribulation. The "infidels" are sent by God to demolish the wretched theology of the churches; but the great philosophers of Germany will rebuild Faith.

The calumniated Spinoza (a true Universalist), Kant, Fichte, Hegel, Schelling, Oken, Oersted, and my friend J. E. Smith, the author of "The Divine Drama of History and Civilization," will, if I mistake not, become the true interpreters of Nature and of Revelation. What a great book that "Divine Drama," with its catholicity and its all-embracing faith in Providence! I may mention that it may be had of my publisher, Mr. Burns, 15 Southampton Road, London. I have many sympathies also with trans-Atlantic voices, such as Emerson's and Theodore Parker's, Channing's and several others. All these men of genius must have their mission; but at present Germany is ahead of all nations in depth and power. I was listening yesterday to Beethoven's music in St. James' Hall (perhaps the greatest in the world), and I thought this "music of the Future" opens to our souls divine, immortal truths which even metaphysics and poetry fail to grasp. The giant Beethoven! What a vast genius was that! His music is almost a revelation of Infinity!

My cousin, the late W. M. Thackeray, who was a reverential free thinker, I remember on one occasion said to me that he thought scepticism "was a very humble state of mind." It cannot, however, be a final state of mind. Doubt may possess more faith than "half the creeds," as Tennyson conceives; but it is a mere cloud of "our spiritual weather." With fraternal regard, I subscribe myself,

Dear sir, faithfully yours,

RICHARD BEDINGFIELD.

16 SAINT AUGUSTINE ROAD,
Camden Town, London. }

PROTEST OF WEST VIRGINIA MINISTERS.

WHEREAS, We, ex-ministers of the Gospel and citizens of the United States and State of Virginia, have reason to believe that a formidable combination has been formed having for its object a radical change in the Constitution of the nation, by the introduction of theological and religious tests in the preamble and body of the fundamental law of the land. During the last eighty years the Supreme Ruler of the Universe has dealt with us as with no other nation. Our fields have been crowned with plenty, and our cup has well nigh run over. Deep-seated forms of wickedness, the growth of ages, have been thoroughly eradicated, upturned, rooted out and destroyed. Education, the Arts, and the Sciences have progressed in advance of any other nation. Under our present Constitution, Bible societies, Missionary societies, Sunday schools, and free schools, have sprung up with a rapidity and in such great numbers that in their contemplation we are like them that dream. From the time Independence bell rung out its peals of freedom, it has been the boast of this nation that here was an asylum for the oppressed of all nationalities; that here every one worshipped according to the dictates of conscience, none daring to molest or make afraid. There are not wanting instances in which nations, by a single legislative act, lost their liberties in a day, and did not miss them for years. We fear like results would attend this suicidal act. Why cut our own Ship of State loose from its moorings, where it has anchored in safety these eighty years? Why depart from the foundations laid so securely by the great and good Washington, and Franklin, and Hancock, and Jay, and other of those patriotic and Christian statesmen whose memory is enshrined in the great heart of the good of all nations? The Bible is the religion of this nation without any forced legislative enactments to make it such. Therefore—

Resolved, That we do protest against the introduction of any such tests, and that we will repel this radical innovation, as dangerous to the peace of the country; and that we will labor, according to the ability that God giveth, to preserve inviolate to us and our posterity the guarantees of religious liberty contained in the Preamble, Constitution and Laws of the United States, under which the people of every church, creed and belief may, as heretofore, enjoy equal religious security and peace.

WM. SLAUGHTER.
Z. WARNER.

WESTERVILLE, Franklin Co., O.,
March 21, 1872.

COLONEL E. M. DAVIS:

My Dear Sir,—You will remember that I attended a couple of meetings of your Radical Club in your office, when in your city recently, when you were kind enough to hand me some envelopes containing a petition to Congress against certain proposed changes in our national Constitution. On my return to my home, I attended a Convention of Clergymen at Hartford, Mason county, West Virginia. Some fifty clergymen were present, so it occurred to me that it would be a favorable time to agitate this vexed Constitutional question; and, taking the reading on the outside of your envelope as a guide, I hastily drew up the within paper, which, after much discussion, was adopted unanimously and with enthusiasm. After the Secretary had made copies for the press, I took the original and, thinking you might be interested in knowing something of public sentiment in the West on this subject, I herewith send it. The West will not endorse this movement.

Truly,

WM. SLAUGHTER.

[The above papers have been kindly sent to us for publication by Colonel Edward M. Davis, of Philadelphia.—Ed.]

WORDS OF WISDOM.

CHELMSFORD, Mass., April 18, 1872.

F. E. ABBOT:

Dear Sir,—Through the kindness of a friend I am in weekly receipt of THE INDEX. There is in every number of it something that does not please me, and this is one of my many reasons for liking the paper—that something being said just as I would like to say it if I thought it. Now that you have commenced visiting me, I mean to have the visits continue as long as you and I do.

My object in writing to you is to obtain some copies of the counter-petition. On Sunday last I spoke as earnestly as possible upon the question of the Religious Amendment apropos of the meeting advertised to be held in Boston that evening for the furtherance of the movement. Deeds do more than words, and forty names to a counter-petition will be better than forty addresses against the movement, if those addresses are not responded to by those to whom they are delivered. So I want to see whether my words were only wind by giving to those who heard them an opportunity to help make the million of names which ought to be on the list of protestants.

I thank you for taking hold of this matter as you do. The most dangerous error liberals can entertain is to think there is no need of a sturdy opposition to the proposed invasion of religious freedom in this country. The Amendment movement is not going to die of inertia. That it will fail I do not doubt for a moment; but it will fail only because of this very opposition which some of our liberal friends think uncalled-for. We must kill the cub if we do not wish eventually to have a lion to fight with. Within a very short time, during this week in fact, I have found that a large proportion of sincere and liberally inclined persons are disposed to look with favor upon the Amendment movement. They see but one side of the question. Being Christians, they would like to have the country Christian. Such people would sign a petition for the amendment at once. But it is not hard to show to these the danger there is in the success of such a thing. A few words do the work, and I know of men who would yesterday have signed an amendment petition, and would refuse to do so to-day because of a simple showing of the question in another light. Urge liberals to agitation, then, and head off this new phase of fanaticism in every direction.

The way the thing was done in Boston is the same old way—names to the call for the meeting obtained by misrepresentation. Is this not as bad as forgery? If the Christian Amendment is added to the Constitution, there should be added another one to provide that no crime shall be crime, if committed for the glory of God and the advancement of the Christian religion.

Yours,

F. W. WEBBER.

[Accompanying the above were extracts, with the name and date of the papers from which they were taken; and for the latter circumstance we especially thank Mr. Webber. One of these extracts was the following from the Boston Globe of April 18:—

UNWARRANTED.—In speaking, Saturday, of the meeting called for Sunday evening in behalf of the "Religious Amendment" to the Constitution, we hinted our doubts as to the genuineness of all the signatures which were appended to the call. Among the signatures was that of James B. Osgood, Esq. Mr. Osgood now states that he is opposed to the movement, not in favor of it, and that he signed the call with the understanding that the meeting was to be for free discussion; yet the managers of the same put him before the public as one of their followers. The people have not yet forgotten the cases of Governors Washburn and Jewell, and the Cincinnati meeting, and will presently learn if they have not learned already, that on the names appended to all calls for meetings in behalf of this object, some discount is to be made. Further comment is needless.

The cases of Governors Washburn and Jewell were satisfactorily explained. For the good name of the managers, we trust the case of Mr. Osgood will be explained as satisfactorily.—Ed.]

F. W. NEWMAN—INTUITION.

The first contribution of Prof. Newman to THE INDEX—"No Science Without Intuition"—gives a glimpse of his mode of thought and quality of character, and is full of promise of future and fuller statements. It is well so rare and true a man, who speaks from within, should be heard. His statement that "Geometry is manifestly built upon axioms furnished by intuition" is surely a fit illustration of his idea. Plato said—"God geometrizes;" and man, made in the image of the Infinite, having in his spirit kindred qualities with the Great Intelligence, intuits the axioms of geometry, and "is the measure of all things" besides.

I see one of your correspondents calls intuition "inherited instinct," and others seem to dimly hope that inductive experiment and experience may explain or include it. You speak of a possible time when science shall "include whatever mental phenomena the word intuition really stands for."

It seems to me the inductive method of Science, if used without recognition of deduction and intuition, is and ever will be poor and imperfect, compared to a method which examines and classifies facts and also recognizes fully intuition and deduction, and tests the one by the other. For instance, Buckle says the discovery of the law of gravitation by Sir Isaac Newton was an intuition, coming like a stream of golden light through his mind. Full of joy at his great discovery, he verified it by close experiment and it stands to-day, and will stand forever. Truly man is related to all things, as well as "the measure of all things," and let him keep open doors in his inner temple, and all laws and principles and ideas enter at once as guests and kindred. Deduction and intuition discover—induction verifies and confirms. Man is microcosmic, made up in his body of all material elements, with something of all lower forms and types in his substance—in his spirit compounded of all subtle essences and forces; and thus it comes that truth is within, and intuition and deduction are but the swift going-forth of man's spiritual qualities to meet and recognize their kindred.

In the realm of morals this seems especially clear, and Free Religion falls to the ground unless it recognizes the truths of the soul, for it trusts the soul with a confidence which can only last and grow with the belief that truth is there, while the theology it must overthrow does not and cannot trust the soul, in which it recognizes no truth or power to see truth in spiritual things, and therefore resorts to the cramping process, using creeds and dogmas as its food.

Justice, Purity, Freedom, Fraternity, &c., are in and of the spirit of man. The shame that follows an unjust act, the blush that mingles the cheek of even the impure in his moments of thought, are testimonies that they are false to that which is within them. "The soul is its own witness," and the effort to prove Justice and Freedom by inductive experiment or comparison before we recognize them, is absurd. We know these exist as eternal verities, and then we can well use the facts and experiences of life to confirm and illustrate them.

What was Plato? In golden words he spoke the truths of the soul, and we listen in wonder and reverence to-day. Who move the world? Not your moral logicians who see not beyond their logic, but Buddha, Jesus, Fox, Channing, Emerson, Davis and others, to whom the soul is its own witness, and whose words of love and wisdom came from the inner shrine of the spiritual temple.

G. B. STEBBINS.

DETROIT, Mich., April 6, 1872.

CURIOUS JUDGMENT.—Judge Blatchford of the United States District Court received from one Walter T. Miller recently a singular communication, claiming exemption from jury service on this ground: that he is a member of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, the testimony of which church maintains that it is wrong for its members to incorporate with the Government of the United States under the present Constitution, inasmuch as it does not acknowledge God as the author of national existence and the source of all power and authority in civil government, and Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations, and the Bible as the foundation of law and the supreme will for the conduct of nations. THE JUDGE, HOLDING THAT A MAN WHO COULD WRITE SUCH A LETTER WAS INCAPACITATED FROM ACTING AS A JUROR, PROMPTLY ORDERED THAT MILLER'S NAME BE STRICKEN FROM THE PANEL.—Banner of Light.

POPULAR RELIGIOUS BOOKS!

ASK YOUR BOOKSELLER WHAT WORKS OF PERMANENT VALUE and interest are being most called for, and he will probably name—

"RADICAL PROBLEMS." By Rev. C. A. BARTOL, D.D. (Second Edition.) One Volume. 16mo. Cloth. Price, $2.

[From the Worcester Daily Spy.]

"This is a good book to have, and to read, and all through it are scattered sentences that we can gather as we gather flowers or shells, beautiful and bright in themselves, and suggesting the richness and beauty of the fields and the shore where they were gathered."

[From the Boston Courier.]

"Among the refined, thoughtful and scholarly minds which distinguish Boston, every one, for a long time, has given place and name to Dr. Bartol. He is, as becomes him, a quiet, unobtrusive man. No noisy declamation, no startling fulmination, no strange pyrotechny attract the crowd towards him. But year after year, for more than a quarter of a century, great numbers have gathered in solemn silence around the altar where he ministers, and have listened with satisfaction and love to the wise and beautiful words of faith and hope and charity which he speaks. Now he has given to the public the fruits of his labor. This, his latest, volume we regard as eminently worthy of publication. In it he discourses of Radical Problems—those questions which vex every human life, and which every thoughtful man has to resolve. Dr. Bartol is a fearless though reverent thinker. He listens to every honest suggestion of doubt, and takes counsel of every clear understanding. He has no veneration for an old error, and no reverence for usurped authority. That which is true to him commands his homage; that which is right to him compels his obedience."

"THE INFINITE AND THE FINITE." By THOPHILUS PARSONS, author of "Deus Homo," etc. (Third Edition.) One neat 16mo. Volume. Cloth. Price, $1.

[From the Rutland Transcript.]

"Passing by some doctrinal points, we come to a theory beautiful as it is strange, that, as natural science demonstrates that heat is the primal force in nature, spiritual science will teach us that the heat is the form that Divine Love assumes in its workings through nature, thereby substituting Wisdom and Light for Love and Heat. These views, generally esteemed so mystical and incomprehensible, are presented by Mr. Parsons in a clear, simple style, palpable to any inquirer, and in a courteous and generous spirit worthy so able and earnest a writer."

"THE TO-MORROW OF DEATH; or, THE FUTURE LIFE ACCORDING TO SCIENCE." By LOUIS FIGUEROA. Translated from the French, by S. R. CROCKER, editor of "The Literary World." One Volume. Third Thousand. 16mo. $1.75.

"Reader, you must die. Perhaps you will die to-morrow. What is going to happen to you, and what will you be on the to-morrow of your death? I speak not of your body; but your soul, whither will that go?"

These BOOKS may be had of all Booksellers, or will be mailed, post-paid, by the publishers,

ROBERTS BROTHERS,
BOSTON.

SOW THE SEED!

THE "IMPROVEMENT OF CHRISTIANITY," published in the first number of the third volume of THE INDEX, has been electrotyped, and an edition of Two Thousand Copies has been printed in the form of

A Cheap Tract for Gratuitous Distribution!

It is intended to circulate One Hundred Thousand Copies during the current year. In order to accomplish this purpose, we must rely upon the co-operation of our active sympathizers.

Packages of these TRACTS, containing any desired number of copies, will be mailed to any address on receipt of enough money to defray postage, and whatever additional sums, large or small, the generosity of distributors may prompt them to add.

Of course, money will be needed to carry out our intentions; but we urge every one who believes that THIS TRACT WILL DO GOOD, and who is willing to distribute copies of it, to send in an order at once, even if unable to donate more than the simple postage and the time required for distribution. Do not hesitate because you cannot give more. We are convinced more than ever by the character and objects of the late Cincinnati Convention, that such plain speech as this TRACT contains is greatly needed at the present time. In the name of Christianity,

A most Dangerous Attempt is now Making to Subvert the Religious Liberties

of the American People; and the mighty magic of that name is still powerful over multitudes even of otherwise liberal minds. Let the world learn that the protest made against Christianity is not made by hatred of Goodness and of Truth, but rather by a love for those that can no longer be satisfied with shame. He woefully misjudges this Tract who thinks it has no higher aim than to "make a sensation." It was meant to tell needed truth so plainly that it must be heard. And it will be heard. All we ask is—give it a chance.

Address your orders to THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio

The series of "INDEX TRACTS" (No. 1 to No. 10) will be sent postpaid on receipt of sixty cents. These include "Truths for the Times" (of which Mr. Charles Darwin, author of "The Origin of Species," says:—"I have now read 'Truths for the Times,' and I admire them from my inmost heart; and I agree to almost every word"); "Lecture on the Bible," by Rev. Charles Voysey; "Christian Propagandism," by F. E. Abbot; "God in the Constitution," by Rev. A. B. Bradford; "The Sabbath," by Parker Pillsbury; "The Present Heaven," by Rev. O. B. Frothingham; "The Christian Amendment," by F. E. Abbot. This series contains in the aggregate two hundred pages of closely printed reading matter. Address THE INDEX, 90 St. Clair street, Toledo, Ohio.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION.

Capital, $100,000.

Shares, $100.

OFFICERS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, President.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Vice President.
P. H. BATESON, Secretary.
A. E. MACOMBER, Treasurer.

DIRECTORS:

THOMAS WENTWORTH HIGGINSON, Newport, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, New Bedford, Mass.
J. EDWARD BUTTS, New York, N. Y.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, Boston, Mass.
FRANCIS E. ABBOT, Toledo, O.
A. E. MACOMBER, " "
CALVIN CONE, " "
EDWARD BINSSELL, " "
P. H. BATESON, " "

SUBSCRIPTIONS TO STOCK.

D. R. LOCKE,	Toledo, O.,	Twenty Shares,	$2,000
A. E. MACOMBER,	" "	Fifteen "	1,500
C. CONE,	" "	" "	1,000
EDWARD BUTTS,	" "	" "	1,000
F. E. ABBOT,	" "	Forty "	4,000
H. L. HOLLOWAY,	" "	Ten "	1,000
GUIDO MARK,	" "	" "	1,000
P. H. BATESON,	" "	" "	1,000
F. E. BASSSETT,	" "	Three "	300
H. E. HOWE,	" "	" "	300
W. C. FINE,	" "	" "	300
J. M. RITCHIE,	" "	" "	300
V. KERN,	" "	" "	300
ALANSON WOOD,	" "	" "	300
WILLIAM KRAUS,	" "	Five "	500
J. G. HOLZWARTH,	" "	One "	100
JOS. E. MARX,	" "	" "	300
C. ANDREWS,	" "	" "	300
ASA E. BUTTS,	New York, N. Y.,	Thirty "	3,000
T. W. HIGGINSON,	Newport, R. I.,	Two "	200
ALEX. COCHRAN,	Franklin, Pa.,	Five "	500
Geo. Hoadley,	Cincinnati, O.,	Two "	200
Miss A. Hall,	Defiance, Ohio,	One "	100
G. N. JENNINGS,	Northampton, Mass.,	" "	100
J. SEDGWICK,	Tonica, Ill.,	" "	100
CARL POST,	Falunville, O.,	" "	100
HENRY MILLER,	Monroe, Mich.,	Three "	300
L. R. SUNDERLAND,	Sacramento, Cal.,	Five "	500
J. L. WHITING,	Quincy, Mass.,	One "	100
LOUIS BRISTOL,	Boston, N. H.,	" "	100
J. E. SUTTON,	Croydon, N. H.,	" "	100
S. L. LUKER,	Olathe, Kan.,	" "	100
J. M. HADLEY,	" "	" "	100
S. L. HILL,	Florence, Mass.,	Ten "	1,000
W. H. SPENCER,	Haverhill, Mass.,	Two "	200
JON. F. BARNETT,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	300
E. W. WELLS,	La Grange, Ind.,	" "	300
FRANK PRATHER,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
E. P. DICKINSON,	Wellsville, Kan.,	One "	100
J. T. DICKINSON,	New York, N. Y.,	Two "	200
W. J. POTTER,	Middlefield, N. Y.,	Fourteen "	1,400
G. C. GLATTE,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
W. C. GANNETT,	Kendallville, Ind.,	" "	300
Miss M. C. PARKINS,	Boston, Mass.,	" "	300
Mrs. S. EMMERSON,	Dover, N. H.,	One "	100
Miss E. EMMERSON,	" "	" "	100
W. H. DOWNES,	Dorchester, Mass.,	" "	100
B. B. SMITH,	Dorchester, Mass.,	" "	100
R. B. SMITH,	Dorchester, Mass.,	" "	100
W. C. RUSSELL,	Warren, Pa.,	" "	100
WM. CLARKE,	Ithaca, N. Y.,	" "	100
C. L. SMITH,	Toledo, O.,	Three "	300
J. N. LITMAN,	" "	One "	100
L. G. FELCH,	Cincinnati, Ohio,	" "	100
A. FOLSON,	Monroe Centre, Mass.,	Three "	300
L. O. BASS,	Boston, Mass.,	One "	100
S. E. SEWALL,	Colbrook, Conn.,	" "	100
ELMER WRIGHT,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
R. B. WARD,	Detroit, Mich.,	Twenty "	2,000
A. D. WILT,	Dayton, O.,	One "	100
S. S. BOWEN,	Keokuk, Iowa,	" "	100
WM. JONES,	Peckskill, N. Y.,	" "	100
S. H. DAME,	Oakaloosa, Iowa,	" "	100
J. H. YORK,	Dover, N. H.,	" "	100
JOS. HAYES,	" "	" "	100
G. P. FOLSON,	" "	" "	100
"A FRIEND,"	" "	" "	100
Mrs. H. E. PERKINS,	" "	" "	100
WILLIAM GREENE,	Boston, Mass.,	Two "	200
"A FRIEND,"	Orange, N. J.,	One "	100
D. B. STEEDMAN,	Lowell, Mass.,	" "	100
Mrs. F. W. CHRISTIAN,	Brattleboro, Vt.,	" "	100
G. W. PARSONS,	New York, N. Y.,	" "	100
EDW. M. DAVIS,	Kelley's Island, O.,	Two "	200
Mrs. LUCRETIA MOTT,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	One "	100
Miss M. A. WRIGHT,	Morris City, N. J.,	" "	100
A. S. BROWN,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
EDWIN BROWN,	" "	" "	100
P. H. HALLOWELL,	Boston, Mass.,	Five "	500
BENJ. RODMAN,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Three "	300
H. B. CLARKE,	" "	" "	300
FRANK J. SCOTT,	Toledo, O.,	Six "	600
M. L. HOLZBROOK,	Houlton, Me.,	Ten "	1,000
W. H. BOURGTON,	New York, N. Y.,	One "	100
HENRY H. RICHARDSON,	" "	" "	100
E. G. BURNETT,	Webster, Mass.,	Two "	200
J. E. FOLLETT,	Winona, Minn.,	One "	100
JOS. WARRASSE,	Newton, N. J.,	" "	100
T. M. LAMER,	Franklin, Pa.,	" "	100
W. H. DYKE,	Worcester, Mass.,	" "	100
W. H. SPALDING,	Prairie du Chien, Wis.,	" "	100
LOUIS BELBORE,	Duluth, Minn.,	" "	100
LEWIS KUTZE,	Philadelphia, Pa.,	Two "	200
SAM'L WARRASSE,	Augusta, Kan.,	One "	100
W. L. RAYNE,	La Fayette, N. J.,	" "	100
W. EMMERSON,	La Fayette, N. J.,	" "	100
C. H. HORRICK,	Amherst, Mass.,	" "	100
MISS I. THOMSON,	Dover, N. H.,	Two "	200
BENJ. HALLOWELL,	Sandy Spring, Md.,	" "	100
Mrs. M. R. VAN RENSSELAER,	N. Y. City,	" "	100
R. B. STONE,	Aberdeen, Miss.,	" "	100
H. ROTCH,	Fall River, Mass.,	Two "	200
J. WHITAKER,	New Bedford, Mass.,	Five "	500
S. H. ROPER,	Kerhonkson, N. Y.,	" "	100
Mrs. R. D. FRANCIS,	Boston Highlands, Mass.,	Two "	200
CHAR. BONNALL,	New York, N. Y.,	One "	100
G. H. BRIDGE,	Salem, O.,	" "	100
J. T. CLARKSON,	Ainslee, Mass.,	Two "	200
C. W. NEWTON,	Castleton, Ill.,	One "	100
HENRY KLEIN,	Toledo, O.,	One "	100
OTTO KLEIN,	" "	One "	100
H. G. NEUBERT,	" "	Two "	200
A. HUNERT,	" "	One "	100
TOLEDO PRINTING CO.,	Detroit, Mich.,	Thirty "	3,000
T. E. PROX,	Co. Toledo, O.,	Two "	200
	Westminster, Ct.,	One "	100

$20,900

CULTURED FREE THOUGHT.

THE INDEX ASSOCIATION,

With offices at 90 St. Clair Street, TOLEDO, O., and 23 Vesey Street, NEW YORK CITY, has been organized with a Capital Stock of ONE HUNDRED THOUSAND DOLLARS, for the purpose of publishing Tracts, Books and

THE INDEX,

A Weekly Paper devoted to Free and Rational Religion.

It is the object of THE INDEX to give public utterance to the boldest, most cultivated and best matured thought of the age on all religious questions. THE INDEX is edited by FRANCIS E. ABBOT, with the following list of Editorial Contributors:

O. B. FROTHINGHAM, of New York City.
THOMAS W. HIGGINSON, of New Bedford, R. I.
WILLIAM J. POTTER, of New Bedford, Mass.
RICHARD P. HALLOWELL, of Boston, Mass.
WILLIAM H. SPENCER, of Haverhill, Mass.
MRS. E. D. CHENEY, of Jamaica Plain, Mass.
REV. CHARLES VOYSEY, of London, England.
PROF. FRANCIS W. NEWMAN, of Bristol, England.
REV. MONCURE D. CONWAY, of London, England.

Every Liberal should subscribe for THE INDEX, as the best popular exponent of Religious Liberalism.

Every Christian minister and every thinking church-member should subscribe for it, as the clearest, most candid and most scholarly expositor of the differences between Free Thought and Evangelical Christianity, and as the best means of becoming well informed of the arguments which the Church will have to meet in the future.

Almost every number contains a discourse or leading article which alone is worth the price of one year's subscription.

Send $2.00 for one year, or 50 cents for three months on trial.

Address THE INDEX,
Drawer 88, Toledo, Ohio.

JUNIUS UNMASKED; or, THOMAS PAINE the author of the "Letters of Junius" and the "Declaration of Independence." A DEMONSTRATION. Royal 16mo. pp. 329. Price, $1.50. Sent post-paid on receipt of price.

JOHN GRAY & CO.,
P. O. Box 689, Washington, D. C.

AGENTS WANTED for "JESUS." By Charles F. Deems, D.D. His Divinity established and Rationalism routed. The most popular and rapidly-selling religious work ever issued. For Circulars, address U. S. PUBLISHING CO., N. Y., Cincinnati, Chicago or St. Louis. 117-129.

Back Numbers of the Index!

FOR 1870 AND 1871.

It is no longer possible to furnish a complete file of THE INDEX from the beginning, whether bound or unbound. But we have on hand a large number of single copies, some of them containing the most valuable articles hitherto published. These will be mailed to any address at

Twenty-five Cents a Dozen!

Persons ordering copies of any particular date will be supplied, if possible. It is hoped that friends interested in the Free Religious movement will send in their orders at once, as much good can be done in this way at small cost.

Address THE INDEX,
Toledo, Ohio.

The Journal of Speculative Philosophy,

PUBLISHED QUARTERLY IN ST. LOUIS, MO.

It is intended as a vehicle for such translations, commentaries, and original articles, as will best promote the interests of Speculative Philosophy in all its departments.

Terms of Subscription.

Two dollars per volume; single number, 50 cents. Vols. I. and II., bound in one volume in muslin, will be sent post-paid by mail for $5.00. Vol. III., Vol. IV., and Vol. V. in muslin, $3.00 each.

All subscriptions (within the United States) should be addressed to the Editor,

WM. T. HARRIS,
110-161ccw, Box 5398, St. Louis, Mo.

PUBLICATIONS

OF THE

Free Religious Association.

The Report, in pamphlet form, of the ANNUAL MEETING of the FREE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATION for 1871, can be obtained by applying to the Secretary, W. J. POTTER, NEW BEDFORD, MASS. It contains Essays, by John Wales, on "THE ATTITUDE OF SCIENCE TO RELIGION;" by O. B. Frothingham, on "SUPERSTITION AND DOGMATISM;" and by Wm. J. Potter, on "THE NATURAL GENESIS OF CHRISTIANITY;" also a report of addresses by Dr. Bartol, T. W. Higginson, Lucretia Mott, Prof. Denton, A. M. Powell, and others, together with other proceedings of the meeting. Price 35 cents; in packages of five or more 25 cents each.

THE ANNUAL REPORTS for 1868, 1869, and 1870 (at 25 cents each), Rev. Samuel Johnson's Essay on "THE WOMEN OF JESUS" (50 cents), Rev. W. H. Channing's Essay on "THE RELIGIONS OF CHINA" (30 cents), Col. T. W. Higginson's Essay on "THE SYMPATHY OF RELIGIONS" (50 cents), and an Essay on "REASON AND REVELATION," by Wm. J. Potter (10 cents), all published through the Association, can also be obtained as above.

W. J. POTTER, Secretary.

The Index.

Two Dollars a Year.

LIBERTY AND LIGHT.

Single Copies Five Cents.

VOLUME 3.

TOLEDO, O., AND NEW YORK, MAY 4, 1872.

WHOLE No. 123.

The Index

